Sonata for violin and piano. G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Allegro appassionato, G minor.—Alla siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major.—Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor.
(First time. MS.)
Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.

Songs with piano—
a. "An die Tauben".....Brahms
b. "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"...Moszkowski
c. "Die Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Stewart.

Quartet in D minor.....Schubert

Mr. Foote's violin sonata is beyond question his best work as yet. It is a thoroughly admirable composition. The first movement especially is finely conceived and carried out; the themes are striking and melodious, and the essentially modern contrapuntal treatment is of the most finished nature. In fact the movement is so thoughtful and of so high a conception that the audience failed to thoroughly grasp and understand its beauty at a first hearing. The alla siciliano is very lovely in its melody and arrangement, but it is unfortunately too strongly reminiscent of Bach. The little intermezzo, which acts a species of trio to the siciliano, is delightful. The slow movement is based on a noble melodious phrase, and its quiet dignity is admirably sustained throughout, while the last movement is stirring and brilliant. In short the whole work is of the highest character and reflects the greatest credit on its composer. Its chief fault, perhaps, is that there is rather too much of it.

Miss Stewart accompanied herself—this is, perhaps, a mistake for a lady; and certainly she gave way to the great temptation of a singer who accompanies herself, that is, she drowned her own voice; she also had the piano half open for some unknown reason. Her voice is pleasant and sympathetic in the lower and middle register, but her high notes are metallic and uncertain in intonation. Her method and general style of singing are also admirable, but she does not seem at home in the school of the "Deutsche Lied," and above all things, she would do wisely to give up playing her own accompaniments.

The beautiful Schubert quartet was most exquisitely played by the Kneisel Quartet. This organization is one of the most admirable of its kind in this country or any other. Its four members are, individually, artists of unusually high attainments, and their ensemble is almost perfect. Their object is to give the work in question a completely artistic interpretation, and no one of them ever asserts himself in the least. In short, it is a true quartet ensemble, and not a group of four virtuosi, each of whom is trying to be heard alone. Mr. Kneisel is immensely patient and painstaking in his rehearsals, and he deserves the greatest credit for the perfection which he and his colleagues have attained.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC. 3.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

A New Sonata by Arthur Foote Performed at Chickering Hall.

The opening number of the Kneisel quartet concert last evening was especially interesting from the fact that it had never before been performed in public, and that the composer played the piano part. It was a sonata for violin and piano in G minor (op. 20), by Arthur Foote, and was written by that gentleman last summer. The movements are: Allegro appassionato, G minor; alla siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; adagio molto, E flat major; allegro assai, G minor. The second movement is particularly taking, and was finely played. It is a fortunate thing for a composer to have a new piece so finely rendered and make such a favorable impression as did the sonata. Mr. Kneisel's playing in this number proves that he maintains his rank as the first violinist of Boston. Mr. Foote's playing was very satisfactory and added to his fame as a pianist. The selection played by the quartet was the string quartet in D minor by Schubert. This artist composed many string quartets, but the one in D minor and its companion in G major, op. 161, are undoubtedly the greatest of them all. This was the second performance of this composition at the Kneisel concerts, and it is unnecessary to state that the artists gave a splendid interpretation of the music. The andante con moto movement, an air with variations, the theme being the same as the part of Death in Schubert's song, "Der Tod und das Madchen," is specially interesting. The scherzo is very melodious, as is also the trio. The audience was very enthusiastic at the finish of the second movement, and the artists bowed their acknowledgments of the compliment of recall. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Rose Stewart, who sang "An Die Tauben" by Brahms, "Schlaf Buebchen Schlaf" by Mos kowski and "Die Loreley" by Liszt. Miss Stewart was very pleasing in the second song, which is sympathetic and beautiful, and as she played her own accompaniments her voice made an excellent impression.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

For the second concert of the series by the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, Monday night, the following was the programme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—.....Brahms
"An die Tauben".....Moszowski
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....Liszt
"Die Loreley".....Schubert
Quartet in D minor.....

Miss Rose Stewart was the singer, Mr. Arthur Foote the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist.

Mr. Foote's new sonata, performed for the first time, proved interesting and pleasing, worthy of his reputation as a serious and ambitious musician, and indicative of progress. With the exception of the last movement, which sounded patchy, it is spontaneous and flowing, reminding one of Schumann in the breadth of phrase and general melodic treatment of the Adagio, and of older masters elsewhere. For the rest, its workmanship is good, its themes agreeable and bright, and it is of a discreet and reasonable length. It was extremely well received, and all its good points immediately felt and rppreciated, the charming Sciciliano being applauded with special heartiness.

Miss Stewart's clear, fresh voice was a pleasure to hear; but it must be said that she made a serious error in undertaking to play her own accompaniments. Brilliant as was this display of musical accomplishments, the effect was anything but satisfactory to the audience, many of whom could see nothing of the singer behind the instrument save the ornament in her hair above and her dress skirt below. Furthermore, by this divided attention she was unable to do herself full justice as a singer, as was particularly apparent in the last song of the group. The Schubert Quartet was superbly played.

The third concert will be given on Monday night, Dec. 30.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

At this concert, given in Chickering Hall last night, the following programme was performed: Arthur Foote—Sonata for violin and piano, G minor, op. 20; allegro appassionato, G minor; Alla Siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; Adagio molto, E flat major—Allegro assai, G minor (first time, MS.), Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote. Songs with piano—Brahms, a, "An die Tauben"; Moszkowski, b, "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"; Liszt, c, "Die Loreley," Miss Stewart. Schubert — Quartet in D minor.

A first hearing of the Sonata creates a variety of impressions. The opening movement is disappointing. The themes and their development appear labored, and the appassionato element does not possess that warmth, fire and sustained energy which should characterize a movement so named. Its ending also strikes one as being unreasonable in its abruptness.

The "Siciliano," on the contrary, is charming, and is the most taking portion, at least, of the entire work. There is a half-melancholy melody for the violin combined with an elaborate, obligato sort of accompaniment, the effect of which is both musical and fascinating. The intermezzo offers a striking contrast, with its crisp, staccato chords, and quickened tempo; and the return to the melody brings to an end probably as graceful a bit of writing as Mr. Foote has yet given to the public. The adagio, too, has moments of attractiveness; but its seeming lack of spontaneity stands in the way of its creating a really serious impression. The same may also be said of the last movement. Its quiet ending with the theme of the adagio has an interesting, Brahms-like effect, although a brilliant close would possibly be more in harmony with the general tenor of the work. As a whole, the sonata appears to embody a series of disconnected ideas, rather than the expression of one distinct and dominating thought. Nevertheless, it is more than likely that it would improve decidedly on further acquaintance, especially as Mr. Foote was not at his best as pianist, and as Mr. Kneisel failed to display in his part of the performance his usual strong sense of artistic proportion.

Miss Stewart, who, we believe, has not been heard in public for some time, undertook the difficult task of singing in public while playing her own accompaniment. This is a feat that a singer is seldom able to accomplish successfully, and, after her attempt last evening, Miss Stewart can hardly be ranked among the chosen few. In juxtaposition with her beautiful, sympathetic voice and her highly artistic method, she brought a clear and accurate, but unsympathetic, touch, which grew harder during her singing, besides being too heavy. This was more noticeable in the first two songs than in the "Loreloy," which was played with considerable taste, and displayed no mean technical proficiency. Her singing gave much pleasure, and left us with a strong desire to hear again the same beautiful songs.

Of the performance of the Schubert Quartet little is to be said except in praise. What a comfort it would be if all grateful listeners to such music could be sure that Schubert had always been able to listen to similar performances of his works!

If there were moments last evening when greater warmth of expression could have been wished for, they were not frequent; and the enthusiasm with which this work, as well as the other numbers, was received was most gratifying.

The next concert is announced for Dec. 30.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889.

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings.

If Nikisch continues to broaden his programs as he is now doing there will be little room left for complaint by the end of the season. Already we have listened to Grieg, Svendsen, Goetz, Glinka, Bruch, Eckert, and two native composers have been honored with places. Last of these was Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in D major, No. 3, op. 21. The Minuet is as beautiful as if it had been voyaged across the ocean fifty years ago. At the close the composer was compelled to bow his modest acknowledgments from his seat in the stage corner of the right balcony. As the program sketch of his new work is highly interesting, it is here inserted.

As is usually the case with modern suites, the old custom of adhering to one key for all the movements has not been followed, so that they stand in these contrasted keys: prelude (allegro comodo), in D-major, 4-4 time; minuetto, in B-flat major, 3-4 time; air (adagio), in G-major, 3-4 time; and gavotte, in D-major again, 2-2 time. A certain unity is, however, gained by transforming the theme of the prelude into a new theme for the gavotte. The prelude is naturally of simple structure, without even a second theme; but, so far as development and change of keys go, it follows strictly the usual sonata form—that is, beginning in D-major, the first section ends in the dominant (A-major), and is then repeated. After this, the usual working-out section follows, and fragments of the theme are employed in various keys and with different instruments, bringing us back, after a pedal on the dominant (A), to the theme again in B-major fortissimo, the first violins taking it in octaves, and finally working upward with a stringendo and crescendo to the very top of their range (high D) as the climax. They then quite suddenly go down hill again with a diminuendo, and rise again pianissimo to the high D.

The minuet calls for no special description, except that the trio is made up of, first, a solo for 'cello (with accompaniment of muted strings), and, after a short violin solo, of a little duet between the two, after which the main part is naturally repeated.

The third movement is practically an air for first violins solo, with accompaniment, although in the middle of it the voices move in freer and more interesting part-writing.

The gavotte, as said above, is based on the theme of the prelude, slightly changed. In the trio (musette) the old bagpipe effect, which is really an essential part of the dance, is obtained by accented fifths in the lower instruments; while the second violins keep up an animated accompaniment in eighth notes, also largely in empty fifths, on open strings."

The suite was written last summer and this is its first performance.

The singer was Gertrude Edmands. First she gave Raff's song, The Dream King and his Love, and then Remembrance, by Brahms,—both in German, and both finely; but it was a delightful change when she wound up with English, in another Brahm's number, The Little Dustman, a lovely cradle-song. She never sang anything with better effect, and the words (which differed by a whole stanza from the translation on the program) were as distinct as the tone was expressive.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony raised a din of criticism. One objector wrote a column to the Herald, denouncing Nikisch's view, in such language as one applies to a blood-and-thunder melodramatic style of rendering Shakespeare. He even went so far as to declare that musicians who joined the applause will be ashamed of it in their saner moments. On the other hand, a musician who has heard the noble Fifth hundreds of times, says that this presentation excelled every other in his experience.

The new wine of music can not be put into old bottles. Beethoven was himself an innovator, denounced by musicians of his day; and in our day, who dare assume a knowledge of Beethoven's precise wishes? As well insist that Mansfield is wrong, because his Richard differs from Tom Keene's, or Salvini, because his Othello is unlike Booth's, as to demand that a young leader, of the romantic school, shall take a certain view of a Beethoven symphony, because leaders generally have done so. Macbeth and Lear were acted in current costumes, and boys played women's parts, till the English world came into better light.

Remembering these censures over the Fifth, we waited with some special interest to see what Nikisch would do with the Eighth. Well, the performance was thoroughly enjoyable. After all, is not that the test? Never before did it seem so brief, or its odd transitions more abrupt.

The overture was Schumann's Genoveva.

For the Eighth Concert there are these three numbers: Symphony No. 3, in F, by Brahms,—opening the program, instead of closing it; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Preludes; the Tannhauser Overture.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1889.

The Ninth Symphony Concert.

A Romantic Programme.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Weber. Overture, "Der Freischütz."
Brahms. Symphony in F, No. 3.
Liszt. Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."
Wagner. Overture, "Tannhäuser."

Brahms, although born into the romantic period of music, can hardly be called a romancer, but the other composers represented by this programme are the high priests of the epoch. Weber and Wagner are also reformers, while Liszt, whose final place in the Walhalla of composers is as yet undetermined, is at least an innovator, who converses brilliantly, though his vocabulary is meagre. No other quartet of musicians of the present decade can be named who have exerted equal influence with these. The germ of dramatic unity which "Der Freischütz" contains, developed through the genius of Wagner, a new and wonderful art; Brahms links us to the classic names of the great past, and in a manner decorous and noble, while Liszt, as pianist, composer and litterateur, exercises a distinct individuality which, through his disciples, is felt in two hemispheres.

In the interpretation of this programme, Mr. Nikisch's emotional qualities stood out conspicuously. The lovely coloring of the "Freischütz" overture, the brilliant vehemence of the "Preludes" and the poetic contrasts of the glowing "Tannhäuser" music were all expressed most beautifully. The playing of the symphony was somewhat unequal. In the "working out" portions of the first movement one was called upon to admire Brahms's impressive treatment, his absolutely sure touch, but the symphony as a whole, notwithstanding moments of beauty in the middle movements, does not gain in warmth or inspiration. The playing of the orchestra was more robust and brilliant than ever; the spirit of dramatic expression which now possesses it is of infinitely more value than the ability to run parallel to a mettonome for hours on a stretch. As to precision and finish of detail, the performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture was superb in these respects.

At the next concert an unfamiliar symphony by Hayden, entitled "The Bear," will be heard; also, Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play, for the first time in Boston, Brahms's violin concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The enthusiastic and sympathetic audience which greeted the Kneisel Quartet on their second appearance of this season evinced the enviable position which this organization holds in the hearts of the music-loving people of this city. The programme opened with a sonata for violin and piano by our own American composer and pianist, Mr. Arthur Foote, who himself rendered the piano part in a manner equal to Mr. Kneisel's artistic work upon the violin. The composition itself shows that Mr. Foote knows how to handle themes in a refined and delicate way without becoming weak and effeminate, as a man of lesser talent might do.

It opens with an allegro in G minor, in which the sonata form is elaborately worked out. The second movement, a dreamy, poetic little piece in the form of a Siciliano, is interrupted strikingly by a most quaint and original intermezzo as brisk, breezy and bright as an October day. The following movement, the adagio, gives each instrument an opportunity of doing bits of interesting solo work, on the whole, quiet and serious in character. In the allegro assai, in G minor, Mr. Foote, instead of following the usual rondo form, has returned to something on the plan of the ordinary first movement — the opening theme full of animation and the second broad and melodious, in fine contrast to the first. The working out gave the audience a fine opportunity to realize the technical ability of the two artists, and the coda returning to the theme of the adagio brings the whole to an end quietly. The unaffected simplicity of Miss Rose Stewart in singing her three beautiful German songs was the more refreshing because of its departure from the stereotyped concert airs of most concert singers. The three selections were "Andie Tauben" by Brahms, in which Miss Stewart sung an English translation, a sweet little lullaby by Moszkowski, "Schlag Bubchen Schlag," and "Die Loreley" by Liszt, and gave evidence of the versatility of the young artist in the thrilling tenderness of the second, and pathos and dramatic power of the third.

The final number on the programme was the Schubert Quartette in D minor, played by the strings without assistance. This and its companion piece in G major are among the greatest of Schubert's works and pre-eminent among his 20 quartettes, romantic and full of the most charming melodies. They are too well known to need full description beyond calling attention to the air with variations in the andante, which is the same as that given to "Death" in Schubert's song, "Der Tod und das Madlun," and also to the fine treatment of the theme in the Pusto for the four instruments in unison and the abandonment of the unison alternately for full chords in F and B flat major at the end of each section of the theme.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889

THE SECOND KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The second concert of this series in Chickering Hall last evening was very well attended, the programme being as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano. G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Allegro appassionato, G minor.--Alla siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major.—Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor. (First time, MS.)
Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.

Songs with piano—
a. "An die Tauben".....Brahms
b. "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"...Moszkowski
c. "Die Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Stewart.

Quartet in D minor.....Schubert

Mr. Foote's violin sonata is beyond question his best work as yet. It is a thoroughly admirable composition. The first movement especially is finely conceived and carried out; the themes are striking and melodious, and the essentially modern contrapuntal treatment is of the most finished nature. In fact the movement is so thoughtful and of so high a conception that the audience failed to thoroughly grasp and understand its beauty at a first hearing. The alla siciliano is very lovely in its melody and arrangement, but it is unfortunately too strongly reminiscent of Bach. The little intermezzo, which acts a species of trio to the siciliano, is delightful. The slow movement is based on a noble melodious phrase, and its quiet dignity is admirably sustained throughout, while the last movement is stirring and brilliant. In short the whole work is of the highest character and reflects the greatest credit on its composer. Its chief fault, perhaps, is that there is rather too much of it.

Miss Stewart accompanied herself—this is, perhaps, a mistake for a lady; and certainly she gave way to the great temptation of a singer who accompanies herself, that is, she drowned her own voice; she also had the piano half open for some unknown reason. Her voice is pleasant and sympathetic in the lower and middle register, but her high notes are metallic and uncertain in intonation. Her method and general style of singing are also admirable, but she does not seem at home in the school of the "Deutsche Lied," and above all things, she would do wisely to give up playing her own accompaniments.

The beautiful Schubert quartet was most exquisitely played by the Kneisel Quartet. This organization is one of the most admirable of its kind in this country or any other. Its four members are, individually, artists of unusually high attainments, and their ensemble is almost perfect. Their object is to give the work in question a completely artistic interpretation, and no one of them ever asserts himself in the least. In short, it is a true quartet ensemble, and not a group of four virtuosi, each of whom is trying to be heard alone. Mr. Kneisel is immensely patient and painstaking in his rehearsals, and he deserves the greatest credit for the perfection which he and his colleagues have attained.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC. 3.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

A New Sonata by Arthur Foote Performed at Chickering Hall.

The opening number of the Kneisel quartet concert last evening was especially interesting from the fact that it had never before been performed in public, and that the composer played the piano part. It was a sonata for violin and piano in G minor (op. 20), by Arthur Foote, and was written by that gentleman last summer. The movements are: Allegro appassionato, G minor; alla siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; adagio molto, E flat major; allegro assai, G minor. The second movement is particularl taking, and was finely played. It is a fortunate thing for a composer to have a new piece so finely rendered and make such a favorable impression as did the sonata. Mr. Kneisel's playing in this number proves that he maintains his rank as the first violinist of Boston. Mr. Foote's playing was very satisfactory and added to his fame as a pianist. The selection played by the quartet was the string quartet in D minor by Schubert. This artist composed many string quartets, but the one in D minor and its companion in G major, op. 161, are undoubtedly the greatest of them all. This was the second performance of this composition at the Kneisel concerts, and it is unnecessary to state that the artists gave a splendid interpretation of the music. The andante con moto movement, an air with variations, the theme being the same as the part of Death in Schubert's song, "Der Tod and das Madchen," is specially interesting. The scherzo is very melodious, as is also the trio. The audience was very enthusiastic at the finish of the second movement, and the artists bowed their acknowledgments of the compliment of recall. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Rose Stewart, who sang "An Die Tauben" by Brahms, "Schlaf Buebchen Schlaf" by Mos kowski and "Die Loreley" by Liszt. Miss Stewart was very pleasing in the second song, which is sympathetic and beautiful, and as she played her own accompaniments her voice made an excellent impression.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

For the second concert of the series by the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, Monday night, the following was the programme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—
"Au die Tauben".....Brahms
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....Moszowski
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Quartet in D minor.....Schubert

Miss Rose Stewart was the singer, Mr. Arthur Foote the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist.

Mr. Foote's new sonata, performed for the first time, proved interesting and pleasing, worthy of his reputation as a serious and ambitious musician, and indicative of progress. With the exception of the last movement, which sounded patchy, it is spontaneous and flowing, reminding one of Schumann in the breadth of phrase and general melodic treatment of the Adagio, and of older masters elsewhere. For the rest, its workmanship is good, its themes agreeable and bright, and it is of a discreet and reasonable length. It was extremely well received, and all its good points immediately felt and rppreciated, the charming Sciciliano being applauded with special heartiness.

Miss Stewart's clear, fresh voice was a pleasure to hear; but it must be said that she made a serious error in undertaking to play her own accompaniments. Brilliant as was this display of musical accomplishments, the effect was anything but satisfactory to the audience, many of whom could see nothing of the singer behind the instrument save the ornament in her hair above and her dress skirt below. Furthermore, by this divided attention she was unable to do herself full justice as a singer, as was particularly apparent in the last song of the group. The Schubert Quartet was superbly played.

The third concert will be given on Monday night, Dec. 30.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

At this concert, given in Chickering Hall last night, the following programme was performed: Arthur Foote—Sonata for violin and piano, G minor, op. 20; allegro appassionato, G minor; Alla Siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; Adagio molto, E flat major—Allegro assai, G minor (first time, MS.), Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote. Songs with piano—Brahms, a, "An die Tauben"; Moszkowski, b, "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"; Liszt, c, "Die Loreley," Miss Stewart. Schubert — Quartet in D minor.

A first hearing of the Sonata creates a variety of impressions. The opening movement is disappointing. The themes and their development appear labored, and the appassionato element does not possess that warmth, fire and sustained energy which should characterize a movement so named. Its ending also strikes one as being unreasonable in its abruptness.

The "Siciliano," on the contrary, is charming, and is the most taking portion, at least, of the entire work. There is a half-melancholy melody for the violin combined with an elaborate, obligato sort of accompaniment, the effect of which is both musical and fascinating. The intermezzo offers a striking contrast, with its crisp, staccato chords, and quickened tempo; and the return to the melody brings to an end probably as graceful a bit of writing as Mr. Foote has yet given to the public. The adagio, too, has moments of attractiveness; but its seeming lack of spontaneity stands in the way of its creating a really serious impression. The same may also be said of the last movement. Its quiet ending with the theme of the adagio has an interesting, Brahms-like effect, although a brilliant close would possibly be more in harmony with the general tenor of the work. As a whole, the sonata appears to embody a series of disconnected ideas, rather than the expression of one distinct and dominating thought. Nevertheless, it is more than likely that it would improve decidedly on further acquaintance, especially as Mr. Foote was not at his best as pianist, and as Mr. Kneisel failed to display in his part of the performance his usual strong sense of artistic proportion.

Miss Stewart, who, we believe, has not been heard in public for some time, undertook the difficult task of singing in public while playing her own accompaniment. This is a feat that a singer is seldom able to accomplish successfully, and, after her attempt last evening, Miss Stewart can hardly be ranked among the chosen few. In juxtaposition with her beautiful, sympathetic voice and her highly artistic method, she brought a clear and accurate, but unsympathetic, touch, which grew harder during her singing, besides being too heavy. This was more noticeable in the first two songs than in the "Loreloy," which was played with considerable taste, and displayed no mean technical proficiency. Her singing gave much pleasure, and left us with a strong desire to hear again the same beautiful songs.

Of the performance of the Schubert Quartet little is to be said except in praise. What a comfort it would be if all grateful listeners to such music could be sure that Schubert had always been able to listen to similar performances of his works!

If there were moments last evening when greater warmth of expression could have been wished for, they were not frequent; and the enthusiasm with which this work, as well as the other numbers, was received was most gratifying.

The next concert is announced for Dec. 30.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889.

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings.

If Nikisch continues to broaden his programs as he is now doing there will be little room left for complaint by the end of the season. Already we have listened to Grieg, Svendsen, Goetz, Glinka, Bruch, Eckert, and two native composers have been honored with places. Last of these was Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in D major, No. 3, op. 21. The Minuet is as beautiful as if it had been voyaged across the ocean fifty years ago. At the close the composer was compelled to bow his modest acknowledgments from his seat in the stage corner of the right balcony. As the program sketch of his new work is highly interesting, it is here inserted.

As is usually the case with modern suites, the old custom of adhering to one key for all the movements has not been followed, so that they stand in these contrasted keys: prelude (allegro comodo), in D-major, 4-4 time; minuetto, in B-flat major, 3-4 time; air (adagio), in G-major, 3-4 time; and gavotte, in D-major again, 2-2 time. A certain unity is, however, gained by transforming the theme of the prelude into a new theme for the gavotte. The prelude is naturally of simple structure, without even a second theme; but, so far as development and change of keys go, it follows strictly the usual sonata form—that is, beginning in D-major, the first section ends in the dominant (A-major), and is then repeated. After this, the usual working-out section follows, and fragments of the theme are employed in various keys and with different instruments, bringing us back, after a pedal on the dominant (A), to the theme again in B-major fortissimo, the first violins taking it in octaves, and finally working upward with a stringendo and crescendo to the very top of their range (high D) as the climax. They then quite suddenly go down hill again with a diminuendo, and rise again pianissimo to the high D.

The minuet calls for no special description, except that the trio is made up of, first, a solo for 'cello (with accompaniment of muted strings), and, after a short violin solo, of a little duet between the two, after which the main part is naturally repeated.

The third movement is practically an air for first violins solo, with accompaniment, although in the middle of it the voices move in freer and more interesting part-writing.

The gavotte, as said above, is based on the theme of the prelude, slightly changed. In the trio (musette) the old bagpipe effect, which is really an essential part of the dance, is obtained by accented fifths in the lower instruments; while the second violins keep up an animated accompaniment in eighth notes, also largely in empty fifths, on open strings."

The suite was written last summer and this is its first performance

The singer was Gertrude Edmands. First she gave Raff's song, The Dream King and his Love, and then Remembrance, by Brahms,—both in German, and both finely; but it was a delightful change when she wound up with English, in another Brahm's number, The Little Dustman, a lovely cradle-song. She never sang anything with better effect, and the words (which differed by a whole stanza from the translation on the program) were as distinct as the tone was expressive.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony raised a din of criticism. One objector wrote a column to the Herald, denouncing Nikisch's view, in such language as one applies to a blood-and-thunder melodramatic style of rendering Shakespeare. He even went so far as to declare that musicians who joined the applause will be ashamed of it in their saner moments. On the other hand, a musician who has heard the noble Fifth hundreds of times, says that this presentation excelled every other in his experience.

The new wine of music can not be put into old bottles. Beethoven was himself an innovator, denounced by musicians of his day; and in our day, who dare assume a knowledge of Beethoven's precise wishes? As well insist that Mansfield is wrong, because his Richard differs from Tom Keene's, or Salvini, because his Othello is unlike Booth's, as to demand that a young leader, of the romantic school, shall take a certain view of a Beethoven symphony, because leaders generally have done so. Macbeth and Lear were acted in current costumes, and boys played women's parts, till the English world came into better light.

Remembering these censures over the Fifth, we waited with some special interest to see what Nikisch would do with the Eighth. Well, the performance was thoroughly enjoyable. After all, is not that the test? Never before did it seem so brief, or its odd transitions more abrupt.

The overture was Schumann's Genoveva.

For the Eighth Concert there are these three numbers: Symphony No. 3, in F, by Brahms,—opening the program, instead of closing it; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Preludes; the Tannhauser Overture.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CRITERION COURSE,

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.

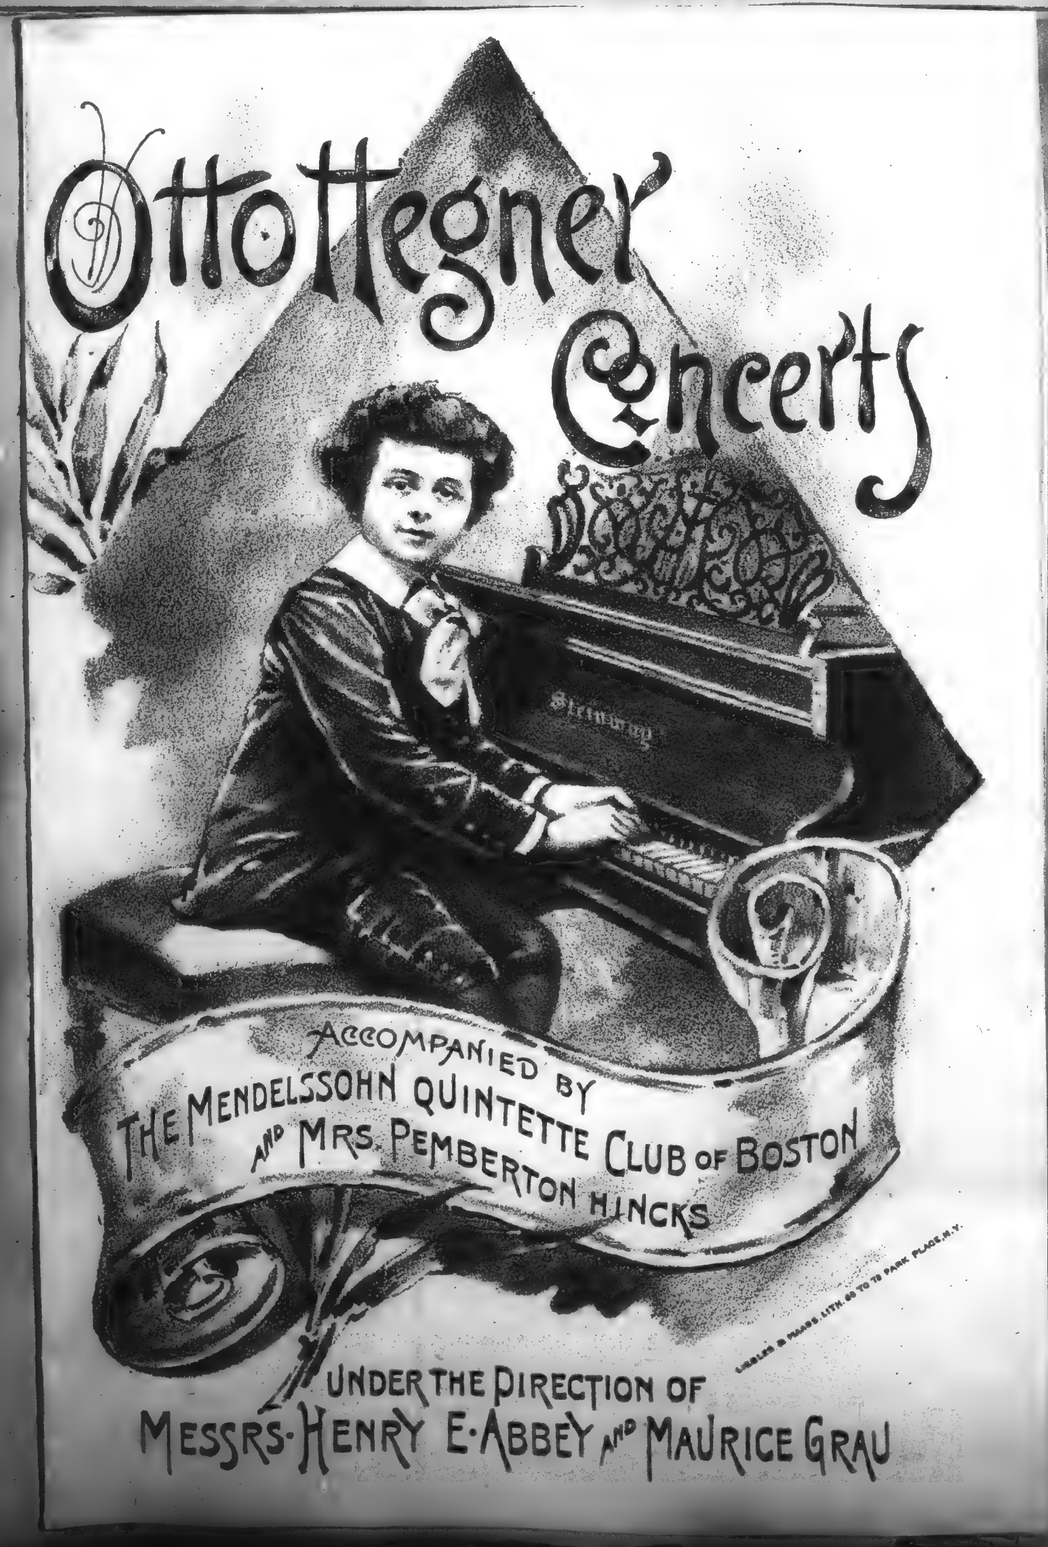
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

Thursday Evening, December 5th,

EIGHT O'CLOCK.



DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.

WORCESTER, DEC. 6, 1889.

NIKISCH IN WORCESTER.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

PROMISING OPENING OF THE CRITERION COURSE—CHARACTERISTICS OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

No orchestral conductor and hardly a musician of any sort has ever been so loudly heralded and so extensively discussed as was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, after leaving his celebrated Leipsic orchestra and coming to Boston. His name has been no stranger to the columns of the Spy, since his coming was first announced, and from time to time his characteristics have been described and his successes duly chronicled. To those who may have heard him last night for the first time, there was, of course, a striking novelty, first of all, in his habit of conducting entirely from memory and without score of any kind, save when there is a soloist in the case. His peculiar way of using his hands—right or left, or both together—sometimes holding both in suspension and absolutely motionless, in the air, gives a sort of ocular demonstration of his method of playing on the orchestra as a soloist plays on his single instrument. The auricular demonstration of this fact is perfect, for every section of the great band obeys the slightest quiver of his fingers as conscientiously as it follows the vigorous sweep of his arms that marks a fortissimo climax.

The first concert in the Criterion Course drew out a fair audience, but by no means of the size that should fill Mechanics Hall considering the musical reputation and pretensions of the city. Again and again Boston critics have been compelled to confess themselves mistaken in their apprehensions as to Mr. Nikisch's programs, and to confess that he knew better than they what the effect of his novel arrangements would be. The program of last evening was an example calculated to produce similar results. If anybody had fears that Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" overture and Beethoven's 8th symphony might be burdensome to the audience he must now confess that the result proved his fears to be utterly unfounded. The of the overture were brought out with supreme effect, and it hardly seems possible that a single bar of this work, perhaps the least promising of all on the program to the average audience, could have been uninteresting to any one.

MYSTICISM, ROMANCE AND POETRY

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Nikisch gave most conclusive evidence of his greatness. Theodore Thomas is admired for the splendid dash and verve that he puts into his orchestra. In accomplishing his main effect, however, Mr. Thomas is prone to ignore details. Wilhelm Gericke was distinguished not only for his efficiency as a drill master, but also for his scrupulous attention to details. The listener might be sure that minor figures and secondary accents would never be obscured. Arthur Nikisch combines in an extraordinary degree the excellencies of both the other great conductors, and to this is owing his rank as one of the four or five greatest conductors in the world. Anton Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as a concert conductor, is hardly to be mentioned in the same category with the others. His supremacy is confined to the opera. An eminent musician and critic once said: "So long as Seidl remains with us, Theodore Thomas is absolutely necessary for the preservation of Beethoven." Thomas and Gericke are pre-eminently concert conductors. Nikisch excels not only in concert but in opera, if his European reputation counts for what it should.

Mr. Nikisch's methods, in the hands of a less skilled conductor, would naturally tend to a corruption of the marvelous purity and unity of tone developed in the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, and to the demoralization of its surpassing discipline. Boston critics have sometimes professed to discover hints of these very misfortunes in the orchestra's performances in that city. The greater freedom allowed the brass and wind divisions, especially, is a radical subversion of the well-bred self-repression and imposed by Mr. Gericke. Nevertheless, there was no trace or suggestion of coarseness of tone or uncertainty or looseness of action last night. The performance of the symphony, though varying somewhat in the matter of tempos from "traditional" or, rather, conventional notions, was an admirable exposition. The almost eccentrically varied rhythms of the first allegro were no hindrance to the strength and impetuosity of the movement, and the delicious daintiness of the allegretto was so exquisitely given as to be one of the most effective performances of the evening. The third movement, tempo di minuetio, played somewhat more rapidly than usual, made, nevertheless, an excellent foil for the masterly combination of delicacy, brilliance, power and nobility that make up the inspiring final allegro of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr. Nikisch did full justice to them all.

ARISTOCRATIC MODERATION

Miss Marie Geselschap is a good pianist, but hardly of the symphony concert calibre. She is not distinguished for musicianly sympathy, her tone lacks breadth and power, and sometimes she is a trifle uncertain. However, she never gives offense and often shows enthusiasm and spirit. Doubtless if she had not been placed against the brilliant background of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, her good qualities (and there are such in her playing) would have shown more resplendantly. The New York papers characterize her as a "new Hollander" pianist.

[3?]

and has had the advantage of [illegible] European instruction. She played with Seidl's orchestra in New York last week for the first time, and then performed the same "concerto" arrangement of Chopin's allegro de concert (op. 46), by Nicode, that she played with the Boston orchestra last night. The new arrangement is more Nicode than Chopin, but, despite the protests that such "arrangements" always evoke, it might be made a very enjoyable composition. Miss Geselschap was inadequate to the task. For her group of solos, Miss Geselschap played Paderewski's simple "Menuet Celebre," imitative of the antique, and Liszt's fantasie on the famous quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto." She was, on the whole, more satisfactory in the Liszt music, which is, of course, intended solely as a test of technique, and her's is facile and sometimes brilliant. The minuet was rather overdone. Miss Geselschap's chief failing is apparently due to immaturity.

The concert closed with a magnificent performance of Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. According to Mr. Nikisch's habit in such passages, and according also to the characteristic Wagner idea, the slow first theme was played more slowly than it is wont to be played, and the effect is thereby enhanced. The long sweeps of the accompanying strings were kept more subordinate than usual, and the climax was held in abeyance till its time came, and then it was reached with tremendous power. The brass was strong and well sustained, but not harsh, and the wooden wind was firm and pure. The beauty of the overture was brought out as never before in this city. The applause, which had never been reluctant during the evening, was then very enthusiastic.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second concert of the series by the Kneisel quartette was given in Chickering hall Monday evening, when an audience of the best quality, and a large audience as well, listened to the performance of the following programme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—
"Au die Tauben".....Brahms
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....Moszkowksi
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Quartette in D minor.....Schubert

Miss Rose Stewart rendered the vocal selections; Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Franz Kneisel interpreted the sonata.

Mr. Foote's sonata is a well-written and able production, nearly all the themes of which are rhythmically clear and melodious. The originality of the composer is at its best in the opening and final allegros of the work, and here too he is most scholarly in his treatment of themes. In other respects there is not so much to be said in favor of the new sonata, as its chief shortcoming is with its lack of spontaneity.

Miss Rose Stewart's singing and her pianoforte accompaniments combined were conspicuously indicative of her ability as a musician. Her voice is admirable as regards compass, is more voluminous than when she was last heard, and is notably clear. She has not the technical control of her tones that would endow her vocal delivery with the very desirable evenness that it does not possess, but in all other respects she is a thorough artist.

The Schubert quartette, which is well known here and has once before been heard at the Kneisel concerts, was charmingly played

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

DECEMBER 7, 188

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, before a fine audience. The novelty of the programme was a Sonata for piano and violin, by Mr. Arthur Foote, which had its first public hearing on this occasion. It is a thoughtful and able work, perfect in form and scholarly in treatment. It does not say anything new, but its themes are well chosen, and are carefully and effectively worked out. The opening allegro is perhaps the most interesting of the four movements for the ceaseless fire that animates it and the skill with which its most characteristic figure is reiterated. A very pretty Alla Siciliano follows, but it is too reminiscent of Handel to be praised for its originality, and the intermezzo that serves for its trio is in such violent contrast with what precedes it as to seem more like an intrusion than a continuation growing logically out of the first part, or in fact having any connection with it. The return to the siciliano emphasizes this incongruity with especial force. The adagio is broad and pleasing in theme, and is marked by fine dignity and by an easy freedom and effect of spontaneity that are not as strongly suggested in any of the other movements. The finale is pervaded by an inspiriting fire and brilliancy, and the "working out" is remarkably ingenious, the contrapuntal skill of the composer showing to admirable advantage. The work is one of the most important and interesting of Mr. Foote's more recent efforts, and is wholly creditable to his skill and musicianship. It was played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel, and was received with every mark of approval. The other instrumental selection was Schubert's beautiful quartet in D-minor, one of the most masterly and most fascinating of all the composer's quartets. It was played in a style marked by the highest finish and the most devoted fidelity to the sentiment of the music. In fact, no finer interpretation of Schubert could be desired than was vouchsafed this lovely work. The quartet has reached a higher point of perfection this season than it has ever before shown. The artists labor together with absolute unity of feeling, and in their efforts quartet playing at its very best may be heard. Mr. Kneisel is to be both complimented and congratulated upon the fine results that have been achieved by him in bringing the organization that he directs to so satisfying a state of efficiency. The soloist was Miss Rose Stewart, who sang "Au die Tauben," by Brahms; "Schlaf Bübchen, Schlaf," by Moszkowski, and "Die Loreley," by Liszt. Miss Stewart sang sweetly and sympathetically, playing her own accompaniments in a thoroughly musicianly style, and fairly earning the warm and appreciative applause that rewarded her. The next concert in the series will take place Monday evening, Dec. 30.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CRITERION COURSE,

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

Thursday Evening, December 5th,

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

The Worcester Spy.
DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.
WORCESTER, DEC. 6, 1889.

NIKISCH IN WORCESTER.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

PROMISING OPENING OF THE CRITERION COURSE—CHARACTERISTICS OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

No orchestral conductor and hardly a musician of any sort has ever been so loudly heralded and so extensively discussed as was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, after leaving his celebrated Leipsic orchestra and coming to Boston. His name has been no stranger to the columns of the Spy, since his coming was first announced, and from time to time his characteristics have been described and his successes duly chronicled. To those who may have heard him last night for the first time, there was, of course, a striking novelty, first of all, in his habit of conducting entirely from memory and without score of any kind, save when there is a soloist in the case. His peculiar way of using his hands—right or left, or both together—sometimes holding both in suspension and absolutely motionless, in the air, gives a sort of ocular demonstration of his method of playing on the orchestra as a soloist plays on his single instrument. The auricular demonstration of this fact is perfect, for every section of the great band obeys the slightest quiver of his fingers as conscientiously as it follows the vigorous sweep of his arms that marks a fortissimo climax.

The first concert in the Criterion Course drew out a fair audience, but by no means of the size that should fill Mechanics Hall considering the musical reputation and pretensions of the city. Again and again Boston critics have been compelled to confess themselves mistaken in their apprehensions as to Mr. Nikisch's programs, and to confess that he knew better than they what the effect of his novel arrangements would be. The program of last evening was an example calculated to produce similar results. If anybody had fears that Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" overture and Beethoven's 8th symphony might be burdensome to the audience he must now confess that the result proved his fears to be utterly unfounded. The of the overture were brought out with supreme effect, and it hardly seems possible that a single bar of this work, perhaps the least promising of all on the program to the average audience, could have been uninteresting to any one.

MYSTICISM, ROMANCE AND POETRY

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Nikisch gave most conclusive evidence of his greatness. Theodore Thomas is admired for the splendid dash and verve that he puts into his orchestra. In accomplishing his main effect, however, Mr. Thomas is prone to ignore details. Wilhelm Gericke was distinguished not only for his efficiency as a drill master, but also for his scrupulous attention to details. The listener might be sure that minor figures and secondary accents would never be obscured. Arthur Nikisch combines in an extraordinary degree the excellencies of both the other great conductors, and to this is owing his rank as one of the four or five greatest conductors in the world. Anton Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as a concert conductor, is hardly to be mentioned in the same category with the others. His supremacy is confined to the opera. An eminent musician and critic once said: "So long as Seidl remains with us, Theodore Thomas is absolutely necessary for the preservation of Beethoven." Thomas and Gericke are pre-eminently concert conductors. Nikisch excels not only in concert but in opera, if his European reputation counts for what it should.

Mr. Nikisch's methods, in the hands of a less skilled conductor, would naturally tend to a corruption of the marvelous purity and unity of tone developed in the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, and to the demoralization of its surpassing discipline. Boston critics have sometimes professed to discover hints of these very misfortunes in the orchestra's performances in that city. The greater freedom allowed the brass and wind divisions, especially, is a radical subversion of the well-bred self-repression and imposed by Mr. Gericke. Nevertheless, there was no trace or suggestion of coarseness of tone or uncertainty or looseness of action last night. The performance of the symphony, though varying somewhat in the matter of tempos from "traditional" or, rather, conventional notions, was an admirable exposition. The almost eccentrically varied rhythms of the first allegro were no hindrance to the strength and impetuosity of the movement, and the delicious daintiness of the allegretto was so exquisitely given as to be one of the most effective performances of the evening. The third movement, tempo di minuetio, played somewhat more rapidly than usual, made, nevertheless, an excellent foil for the masterly combination of delicacy, brilliance, power and nobility that make up the inspiring final allegro of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr. Nikisch did full justice to them all.

ARISTOCRATIC MODERATION

Miss Marie Geselschap is a good pianist, but hardly of the symphony concert calibre. She is not distinguished for musicianly sympathy, her tone lacks breadth and power, and sometimes she is a trifle uncertain. However, she never gives offense and often shows enthusiasm and spirit. Doubtless if she had not been placed against the brilliant background of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, her good qualities (and there are such in her playing) would have shown more resplendantly. The New York papers characterize her as a "new Hollander" pianist.

SHE IS YOUNG AND ATTRACTIVE, and has had the advantage of eminent European instruction. She played with Seidl's orchestra in New York last week for the first time, and then performed the same "concerto" arrangement of Chopin's allegro de concert (op. 46), by Nicode, that she played with the Boston orchestra last night. The new arrangement is more Nicode than Chopin, but, despite the protests that such "arrangements" always evoke, it might be made a very enjoyable composition. Miss Geselschap was inadequate to the task. For her group of solos, Miss Geselschap played Paderewski's simple "Menuet Celebre," imitative of the antique, and Liszt's fantasie on the famous quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto." She was, on the whole, more satisfactory in the Liszt music, which is, of course, intended solely as a test of technique, and her's is facile and sometimes brilliant. The minuet was rather overdone. Miss Geselschap's chief failing is apparently due to immaturity.

The concert closed with a magnificent performance of Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. According to Mr. Nikisch's habit in such passages, and according also to the characteristic Wagner idea, the slow first theme was played more slowly than it is wont to be played, and the effect is thereby enhanced. The long sweeps of the accompanying strings were kept more subordinate than usual, and the climax was held in abeyance till its time came, and then it was reached with tremendous power. The brass was strong and well sustained, but not harsh, and the wooden wind was firm and pure. The beauty of the overture was brought out as never before in this city. The applause, which had never been reluctant during the evening, was then very enthusiastic.

[34]

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second concert of the series by the Kneisel quartette was given in Chickering hall Monday evening, when an audience of the best quality, and a large audience as well, listened to the performance of the following programme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—
"Au die Tauben".....Brahms
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....Moszkowksi
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Quartette in D minor.....Schubert

Miss Rose Stewart rendered the vocal selections; Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Franz Kneisel interpreted the sonata.

Mr. Foote's sonata is a well-written and able production, nearly all the themes of which are rhythmically clear and melodious. The originality of the composer is at its best in the opening and final allegros of the work, and here too he is most scholarly in his treatment of themes. In other respects there is not so much to be said in favor of the new sonata, as its chief shortcoming is with its lack of spontaneity.

Miss Rose Stewart's singing and her pianoforte accompaniments combined were conspicuously indicative of her ability as a musician. Her voice is admirable as regards compass, is more voluminous than when she was last heard, and is notably clear. She has not the technical control of her tones that would endow her vocal delivery with the very desirable evenness that it does not possess, but in all other respects she is a thorough artist.

The Schubert quartette, which is well known here and has once before been heard at the Kneisel concerts, was charmingly played.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

DECEMBER 7, 188

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, before a fine audience. The novelty of the programme was a Sonata for piano and violin, by Mr. Arthur Foote, which had its first public hearing on this occasion. It is a thoughtful and able work, perfect in form and scholarly in treatment. It does not say anything new, but its themes are well chosen, and are carefully and effectively worked out. The opening allegro is perhaps the most interesting of the four movements for the ceaseless fire that animates it and the skill with which its most characteristic figure is reiterated. A very pretty Alla siciliano follows, but it is too reminiscent of Handel to be praised for its originality, and the intermezzo that serves for its trio is in such violent contrast with what precedes it as to seem more like an intrusion than a continuation growing logically out of the first part, or in fact having any connection with it. The return to the siciliano emphasizes this incongruity with especial force. The adagio is broad and pleasing in theme, and is marked by fine dignity and by an easy freedom and effect of spontaniety that are not as strongly suggested in any of the other movements. The finale is pervaded by an inspiriting fire and brilliancy, and the "working out" is remarkably ingenious, the contrapuntal skill of the composer showing to admirable advantage. The work is one of the most important and interesting of Mr. Foote's more recent efforts, and is wholly creditable to his skill and musicianship. It was played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel, and was received with every mark of approval. The other instrumental selection was Schubert's beautiful quartet in D-minor, one of the most masterly and most fascinating of all the composer's quartets. It was played in a style marked by the highest finish and the most devoted fidelity to the sentiment of the music. In fact, no finer interpretation of Schubert could be desired than was vouchsafed this lovely work. The quartet has reached a higher point of perfection this season than it has ever before shown. The artists labor together with absolute unity of feeling, and in their efforts quartet playing at its very best may be heard. Mr. Kneisel is to be both complimented and congratulated upon the fine results that have been achieved by him in bringing the organization that he directs to so satisfying a state of efficiency. The soloist was Miss Rose Stewart, who sang "Au die Tauben," by Brahms; "Schlaf Bübchen, Schlaf," by Moszkowski, and "Die Loreley," by Liszt. Miss Stewart sang sweetly and sympathetically, playing her own accompaniments in a thoroughly musicianly style, and fairly earning the warm and appreciative applause that rewarded her. The next concert in the series will take place Monday evening, Dec. 30.

CRITERION COURSE,

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.

PROGRAMME

Thursday Evening, December 5th,

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

MECHANICS' HALL, Worcester.

CRITERION COURSE

C. A. ELLIS, C. A. BURDITT and F. O. NORTH, - - - PROPRIETORS

SECOND CONCERT,

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10, at 8.

OTTO HEGNER

Under the direction of HENRY E. ABBEY & MAURICE GRAU.

PROGRAMME.

Part First.

1. SEXTETTE (E flat), - - - - - - - - MAYSEDER

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

MR. WILHELM OHLIGER, Solo Violin. MR. MANASSA ADLER, Violin.
MR. THOMAS RYAN, Solo Clarinette and Viola. MR. PAUL HENNEBERG, Solo Flute and Viola
MR. MAX DROGE, Solo Violincellist. The Club assisted by Herr NEUDAHM, Contrabassist.

2. "MUSICA PROHIBITA," - - - - - - GASTELDON

Mrs. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

3. SONATA, E minor (opus 90), - - - - - BEETHOVEN

OTTO HEGNER.

Part Second.

4. "ADAGIO CON EXPRESSIONE," from Quintette (op. 29.) BEETHOVEN

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

5. "CHANSON VENITIENNE," - - - - - - SALVAYRE

Mrs. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

6. FANTAISIESTÜCK, - - - - - - - VOLLBACH

Sextette with Violin Obligato by Mr. Wilhelm Ohliger.

7. { a RONDO CAPRICCIOSO, op. 14 ..... MENDELSSOHN
   { b SPINNERLIED from the "Fliegende Holländer," WAGNER-LISZT
   { c VALSE CAPRICE ..... RUBINSTEIN

OTTO HEGNER.

8. FINALE FROM QUINTETTE in E flat, - - MAYSEDER

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

EXECUTIVE STAFF:

ACTING MANAGER ..... Mr. MARCUS R. MAYER
BUSINESS MANAGER ..... Mr. C. N. SCHROEDER
REPRESENTATIVE ..... Mr. JEFF S. LEERBURGER

CRITERION COURSE

Friday, December 27.

FIRST STODDARD LECTURE,

"THE CASTLE-BORDERED RHINE."

Thursday, January 2,

Mlle. CLEMENTINE DE VERE,

Accompanied by Mlle. MARIE GROEBL, Mr. W. H. RIEGER, Sig. C. BOLOGNA and others, in a GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT.

Thursdays, Jan. 9, 16, 21 and 30.

THE STODDARD LECTURES,

"NAPOLEON (from Corsica to the Throne.)"
"NAPOLEON (from the Throne to St. Helena.)"
"BERLIN IN 1889."
"THE SPLENDORS OF SWITZERLAND."

Thursday, February 6,

GRAND CONCERT

(Artists to be announced.)

Thursday, February 20,

CLOSING CONCERT by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

DAILY ... WORCESTER, DEC. 6, 1889.

... IN WORCESTER.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

PROMISING OPENING OF THE CRITERION COURSE—CHARACTERISTICS OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

No orchestral conductor and hardly a musician of any sort has ever been so loudly heralded and so extensively discussed as was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, after leaving his celebrated Leipsic orchestra and coming to Boston. His name has been no stranger to the columns of the Spy, since his coming was first announced, and from time to time his characteristics have been described and his successes duly chronicled. To those who may have heard him last night for the first time, there was, of course, a striking novelty, first of all, in his habit of conducting entirely from memory and without score of any kind, save when there is a soloist in the case. His peculiar way of using his hands—right or left, or both together—sometimes holding both in suspension and absolutely motionless, in the air, gives a sort of ocular demonstration of his method of playing on the orchestra as a soloist plays on his single instrument. The auricular demonstration of this fact is perfect, for every section of the great band obeys the slightest quiver of his fingers as conscientiously as it follows the vigorous sweep of his arms that marks a fortissimo climax.

The first concert in the Criterion Course drew out a fair audience, but by no means of the size that should fill Mechanics Hall considering the musical reputation and pretensions of the city. Again and again Boston critics have been compelled to confess themselves mistaken in their apprehensions as to Mr. Nikisch's programs, and to confess that he knew better than they what the effect of his novel arrangements would be. The program of last evening was an example calculated to produce similar results. If anybody had fears that Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" overture and Beethoven's 8th symphony might be burdensome to the audience he must now confess that the result proved his fears to be utterly unfounded. The of the overture were brought out with supreme effect, and it hardly seems possible that a single bar of this work, perhaps the least promising of all on the program to the average audience, could have been uninteresting to any one.

MYSTICISM, ROMANCE AND POETRY

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Nikisch gave most conclusive evidence of his greatness. Theodore Thomas is admired for the splendid dash and verve that he puts into his orchestra. In accomplishing his main effect, however, Mr. Thomas is prone to ignore details. Wilhelm Gericke was distinguished not only for his efficiency as a drill master, but also for his scrupulous attention to details. The listener might be sure that minor figures and secondary accents would never be obscured. Arthur Nikisch combines in an extraordinary degree the excellencies of both the other great conductors, and to this is owing his rank as one of the four or five greatest conductors in the world. Anton Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as a concert conductor, is hardly to be mentioned in the same category with the others. His supremacy is confined to the opera. An eminent musician and critic once said: "So long as Seidl remains with us, Theodore Thomas is absolutely necessary for the preservation of Beethoven." Thomas and Gericke are pre-eminently concert conductors. Nikisch excels not only in concert but in opera, if his European reputation counts for what it should.

Mr. Nikisch's methods, in the hands of a less skilled conductor, would naturally tend to a corruption of the marvelous purity and unity of tone developed in the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, and to the demoralization of its surpassing discipline. Boston critics have sometimes professed to discover hints of these very misfortunes in the orchestra's performances in that city. The greater freedom allowed the brass and wind divisions, especially, is a radical subversion of the well-bred self-repression and imposed by Mr. Gericke. Nevertheless, there was no trace or suggestion of coarseness of tone or uncertainty or looseness of action last night. The performance of the symphony, though varying somewhat in the matter of tempos from "traditional" or, rather, conventional notions, was an admirable exposition. The almost eccentrically varied rhythms of the first allegro were no hindrance to the strength and impetuosity of the movement, and the delicious daintiness of the allegretto was so exquisitely given as to be one of the most effective performances of the evening. The third movement, tempo di minuetto, played somewhat more rapidly than usual, made, nevertheless, an excellent foil for the masterly combination of delicacy, brilliance, power and nobility that make up the inspiring final allegro of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr. Nikisch did full justice to them all.

ARISTOCRATIC MODERATION

Miss Marie Geselschap is a good pianist, but hardly of the symphony concert calibre. She is not distinguished for musicianly sympathy, her tone lacks breadth and power, and sometimes she is a trifle uncertain. However, she never gives offense and often shows enthusiasm and spirit. Doubtless if she had not been placed against the brilliant background of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, her good qualities (and there are such in her playing) would have shown more resplendantly. The New York papers characterize her as a "new Hollander" pianist.

... habit in such passages, and a ... also to the characteristic Wag... the slow first theme was pla... slowly than it is wont to be pla... the effect is thereby enhanced. ... sweeps of the accompanying ... were kept more subordinate tha... and the climax was held in abey... its time came, and then it was ... with tremendous power. The b... strong and well sustained, ... harsh, and the wooden wind ... and pure. The beauty of the ... was brought out as never before ... city. The applause, which ha... been reluctant during the even... then very enthusiastic.

THE BOSTON ...

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMB...

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CON...

The second concert of the series b... sel quartette was given in Chic... Monday evening, when an audience ... quality, and a large audience as [we... to the performance of the foll... gramme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in ... nor, op. 20. ..... A...
Songs with pianoforte—
"An die Tauben" .....
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf" .....
"Die Loreley" .....
Quartette in D minor .....

Miss Rose Stewart rendered the ... ions; Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Fr... interpreted the sonata.

Mr. Foote's sonata is a well-writte... production, nearly all the themes of ... rhythmically clear and melodious. ... ality of the composer is at its best i... ng and final allegros of the work, a... he is most scholarly in his treatment ... In other respects there is not so ... said in favor of the new sonata, a... shortcoming is with its lack of spon...

Miss Rose Stewart's singing and ... forte accompaniments combined we... uously indicative of her ability as a... Her voice is admirable as regards ... more voluminous than when sh... heard, and is notably clear. She h... technical control of her tones that ... dow her vocal delivery with the ver... evenness that it does not possess, ... other respects she is a thorough artis...

The Schubert quartette, which is w... here and has once before been hea... Kneisel concerts, was charmingly pla...

Gazet...

SUNDAY MORNING E...

DECEMBER

The second concert of the Kneisel Qu... in Chickering Hall, on Monday nigh... audience. The novelty of the program... for piano and violin, by Mr. Arthur Fo... its first public hearing on this occasion. ... ful and able work, perfect in form a... treatment. It does not say anything new ... are well chosen, and are carefully and eff... oat. The opening allegro is perhaps the ... ing of the four movements for the ca... animates it and the skill with which its ... istic figure is reiterated. A very pretty ... follows, but it is too reminiscent of Hand... for its originality, and the intermezzo ... its trio is in such violent contrast with w... as to seem more like an intrusion than ... growing logically out of the first part, or ... any connection with it. The return to ... emphasizes this incongruity with especi... adagio is broad and pleasing in theme, ... by fine dignity and by an easy freedom ... spontaneity that are not as strongly sug... of the other movements. The finale is ... an inspiriting fire and brilliancy, and ... out" is remarkably ingenious, the contra... the composer showing to admirable adv... work is one of the most important and ... Mr. Foote's more recent efforts, and is wh... to his skill and musicianship. It was ... composer and Mr. Kneisel, and was receiv... mark of approval. The other instrumen... was Schubert's beautiful quartet in D-min... most masterly and most fascinating of ... poser's quartets. It was played in a style ... the highest finish and the most devoted ... sentiment of the music. In fact, no finer ... of Schubert could be desired than was yo... lovely work. The quartet has reached a h... perfection this season than it has ever b... The artists labor together with absolute ... ing, and in their efforts quartet playing ... best may be heard. Mr. Kneisel is to be ... mented and congratulated upon the fin... have been achieved by him in bringing ... tion that he directs to so satisfying a state ... The soloist was Miss Rose Stewart, who s... Tauben," by Brahms; "Schlaf Bübchen ... Moszkowski, and "Die Loreley," by ... Stewart sang sweetly and sympathetically ... own accompaniments in a thoroughly mus... and fairly earning the warm and appreci... that rewarded her. The next concert in t... take place Monday evening, Dec. 30.

CRITERION COURSE,

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.

PROGRAMME

Thursday Evening, December 5th,

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

M

CF

C. A. EL

O

1. SEXT

MR. WILHE
MR. THOMA
MR. MA

2. "MU

3. SONA

4. "AD

5. "OH

6. FANT

7. { a R
b SE c VA

8. FINA

ACTING M BUSINESS
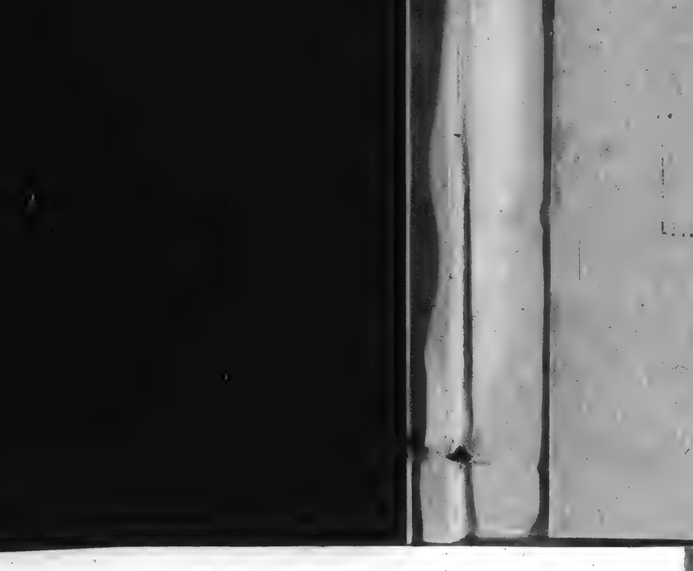
REPRESEN

Steinway & Sons
PIANOS



WAREROOMS
STEINWAY HALL NOS. 107, 109 & 111 EAST 14TH ST.
Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place,
NEW YORK.

DAILY SPY—WORCESTER, MASS., DEC. 6, 1889.

MUSIC IN WORCESTER.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

PROMISING OPENING OF THE CRITERION COURSE—CHARACTERISTICS OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

No orchestral conductor and hardly a musician of any sort has ever been so loudly heralded and so extensively discussed as was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, after leaving his celebrated Leipsic orchestra and coming to Boston. His name has been no stranger to the columns of the Spy, since his coming was first announced, and from time to time his characteristics have been described and his successes duly chronicled. To those who may have heard him last night for the first time, there was, of course, a striking novelty, first of all, in his habit of conducting entirely from memory and without score of any kind, save when there is a soloist in the case. His peculiar way of using his hands—right or left, or both together—sometimes holding both in suspension and absolutely motionless, in the air, gives a sort of ocular demonstration of his method of playing on the orchestra as a soloist plays on his single instrument. The auricular demonstration of this fact is perfect, for every section of the great band obeys the slightest quiver of his fingers as conscientiously as it follows the vigorous sweep of his arms that marks a fortissimo climax.

The first concert in the Criterion Course drew out a fair audience, but by no means of the size that should fill Mechanics Hall considering the musical reputation and pretensions of the city. Again and again Boston critics have been compelled to confess themselves mistaken in their apprehensions as to Mr. Nikisch's programs, and to confess that he knew better than they what the effect of his novel arrangements would be. The program of last evening was an example calculated to produce similar results. If anybody had fears that Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" overture and Beethoven's 8th symphony might be burdensome to the audience he must now confess that the result proved his fears to be utterly unfounded. The of the overture were brought out with supreme effect, and it hardly seems possible that a single bar of this work, perhaps the least promising of all on the program to the average audience, could have been uninteresting to any one.

MYSTICISM, ROMANCE AND POETRY

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Nikisch gave most conclusive evidence of his greatness. Theodore Thomas is admired for the splendid dash and verve that he puts into his orchestra. In accomplishing his main effect, however, Mr. Thomas is prone to ignore details. Wilhelm Gericke was distinguished not only for his efficiency as a drill master, but also for his scrupulous attention to details. The listener might be sure that minor figures and secondary accents would never be obscured. Arthur Nikisch combines in an extraordinary degree the excellencies of both the other great conductors, and to this is owing his rank as one of the four or five greatest conductors in the world. Anton Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as a concert conductor, is hardly to be mentioned in the same category with the others. His supremacy is confined to the opera. An eminent musician and critic once said: "So long as Seidl remains with us, Theodore Thomas is absolutely necessary for the preservation of Beethoven." Thomas and Gericke are pre-eminently concert conductors. Nikisch excels not only in concert but in opera, if his European reputation counts for what it should.

Mr. Nikisch's methods, in the hands of a less skilled conductor, would naturally tend to a corruption of the marvelous purity and unity of tone developed in the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, and to the demoralization of its surpassing discipline. Boston critics have sometimes professed to discover hints of these very misfortunes in the orchestra's performances in that city. The greater freedom allowed the brass and wind divisions, especially, is a radical subversion of the well-bred self-repression and imposed by Mr. Gericke. Nevertheless, there was no trace or suggestion of coarseness of tone or uncertainty or looseness of action last night. The performance of the symphony, though varying somewhat in the matter of tempos from "traditional" or, rather, conventional notions, was an admirable exposition. The almost eccentrically varied rhythms of the first allegro were no hindrance to the strength and impetuosity of the movement, and the delicious daintiness of the allegretto was so exquisitely given as to be one of the most effective performances of the evening. The third movement, tempo di minuetio, played somewhat more rapidly than usual, made, nevertheless, an excellent foil for the masterly combination of delicacy, brilliance, power and nobility that make up the inspiring final allegro of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr. Nikisch did full justice to them all.

ARISTOCRATIC MODERATION

Miss Marie Geselschap is a good pianist, but hardly of the symphony concert calibre. She is not distinguished for musicianly sympathy, her tone lacks breadth and power, and sometimes she is a trifle uncertain. However, she never gives offense and often shows enthusiasm and spirit. Doubtless if she had not been placed against the brilliant background of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, her good qualities (and there are such in her playing) would have shown more resplendantly. The New York papers characterize her as a "new Hollander" pianist.

habit in such passages, and ac also to the characteristic Wagn the slow first theme was play slowly than it is wont to be pl the effect is thereby enhanced. sweeps of the accompanying were kept more subordinate tha and the climax was held in abey its time came, and then it was with tremendous power. The br strong and well sustained, b harsh, and the wooden wind w and pure. The beauty of the o was brought out as never before city. The applause, which had been reluctant during the eveni then very enthusiastic.

THE BOSTON TI

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBE

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONC

The second concert of the series by sel quartette was given in Chick Monday evening, when an audience quality, and a large audience as [wel to the performance of the follo gramme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in nor, op. 20.....Ar
Songs with pianoforte—
"An die Tauben".....
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....M
"Die Loreley".....
Quartette in D minor.....

Miss Rose Stewart rendered the v tions; Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Fra interpreted the sonata.

Mr. Foote's sonata is a well-written production, nearly all the themes of rhythmically clear and melodious.
uality of the composer is at its best in ng and final allegros of the work, an he is most scholarly in his treatment
In other respects there is not so m said in favor of the new sonata, as shortcoming is with its lack of sponta
Miss Rose Stewart's singing and h forte accompaniments combined were uously indicative of her ability as a
Her voice is admirable as regards co more voluminous than when she heard, and is notably clear. She has technical control of her tones that w dow her vocal delivery with the very evenness that it does not possess, bu other respects she is a thorough artist.
The Schubert quartette, which is we here and has once before been hear
Kneisel concerts, was charmingly play

Gazet

SUNDAY MORNING ED

DECEMBER

The second concert of the Kneisel Quar
in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, audience. The novelty of the programme for piano and violin, by Mr. Arthur Foot its first public hearing on this occasion. I ful and able work, perfect in form and treatment. It does not say anything new, are well-chosen, and are carefully and effec cut. The opening allegro is perhaps the ing of the four movements for the cease animates it and the skill with which its m istic figure is reiterated. A very pretty follows, but it is too reminiscent of Handel for its originality, and the intermezzo th its trio is in such violent contrast with wha as to seem more like an intrusion than a growing logically out of the first part, or i any connection with it. The return to t emphasizes this incongruity with especia adagio is broad and pleasing in theme, an by fine dignity and by an easy freedom a spontaniety that are not as strongly sugge of the other movements. The finale is an inspiriting fire and brilliancy, and th out" is remarkably ingenious, the contrapu the composer showing to admirable adva work is one of the most important and in Mr. Foote's more recent efforts, and is wholly to his skill and musicianship. It was pl composer and Mr. Kneisel, and was received mark of approval. The other instrumenta was Schubert's beautiful quartet in D-minor, most masterly and most fascinating of a poser's quartets. It was played in a style the highest finish and the most devoted fi sentiment of the music. In fact, no finer in of Schubert could be desired than was youc lovely work. The quartet has reached a hig perfection this season than it has ever be The artists labor together with absolute u ing, and in their efforts quartet playing best may be heard. Mr. Kneisel is to be mented and congratulated upon the fine have been achieved by him in bringing th tion that he directs to so satisfying a state of The soloist was Miss Rose Stewart, who sa
Tauben," by Brahms; "Schlaf Bübchen,
Moszkowski, and "Die Loreley," by L
Stewart sang sweetly and sympathetically, own accompaniments in a thoroughly musici and fairly earning the warm and appreciativ that rewarded her. The next concert in th take place Monday evening, Dec. 30.

[35]

THE TELEGRAM

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1889.

MR. NIKISCH IN WORCESTER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Criterion Course.

"Will the Criterion course be a success?" has been a frequent question in local musical circles for the past few days. The question could not apply, of course, to the character of the entertainments to be given, but rather to the financial outlook of the venture. In the face of past failures of similar enterprises, the managers of the Criterion course exhibited a wonderful temerity in giving to the public the series of entertainments which opened last evening at Mechanics hall. A square block of seats, from the front back for 16 or 17 rows, was occupied. Around it was a wide border of empty chairs. At the rear were several rows well filled. The west gallery was fairly well patronized, but many of the best seats in the side galleries were unoccupied.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has played in Worcester before, but never under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The orchestra's last concert in Worcester, previous to that of last evening, was given April 5, when Wilhelm Gericke made his final appearance here.

The greatest interest, last night, was manifested in Mr. Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Worcester. It was a little past the hour set for the concert, when Mr. Nikisch made his way through the 'cellos and violins and appeared before the audience. He is short, with a rather pale, sensitive face, very dark and loosely arranged hair, and a quiet demeanor. He made a very low bow to the audience and stepped upon the little stand arranged for him. With no preliminary flourishes, he stood waiting for a moment until the musicians were quite ready. Then his baton gave the signal, and the first strains of Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," came from half a hundred strings.

There is nothing of the steam caliope method about Mr. Nikisch. He is not capricious, nor does his baton do any needless work.

He stood very quietly in his place, scarcely moving his body, save to turn, occasionally, from right to left, and into the movements of his eloquent baton threw a tremendous force and strength of soul that hardly seem to lie beneath the man's calm exterior. An occasional nod of the head and sometimes a motion of the left hand, to accompany the baton, were his gestures, aside from those of the baton.

The program last night was one of bright and happy music, with nothing of gloom by way of interlude. The Mendelssohn overture is brilliant in its coloring, and has at times a strain of joyous song.

Chopin's Allegro de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode, was the second number, and brought forward Miss Marie Geselschap as the pianiste.

There was a tedious wait, which must have been highly delightful for Miss Geselschap, before she could begin. The grand piano was there, but the stool had been forgotten. An ordinary chair wouldn't do. Finally, Mr. Nikisch placed and old green-bottomed chair, with a bass viol cover wrapped up for a cushion. The audience smiled audibly, but it had to do, and Miss Geselschap was ready to play. She rendered the allegro appreciatively and with judicious use of the pedal, but she did not do Chopin full justice. The orchestra performed its part admirably. There was a perfunctory encore.

The long number of the program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F, a work full of spirit and grace. First is an allegro vivace e con brio, which open at once with the full strength of the orchestra, afterwards softening to graceful and even tender little passages, exquisitely rendered. The second movement is an allegretto scherzando, and then comes the third movement in tempo di minuetto, quite unlike the rest of the work and less decisive in its color, but the finale, allegro vivace, brings the whole to a brilliant close. Mr. Nikisch led his orchestra through this beautiful garden of melody with his own poetic appreciation of it visible in every command.

Two soli for the piano, a minuet of Paderewsky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Verdi-Liszt, were rendered by Miss Geselschap. The pretty little minuet was done as well as anything she attempted, and in her last number she was not as satisfactory.

But the orchestra outdid itself in the "Tannhauser." Never did it play the glorious Wagner overture, it would seem, as well as it did last night. But it was not Mr. Gericke's "Tannhauser." Mr. Nikisch has a new interpretation for many passages. He does not despise the brass, and the ff passages are brought out with all possible force. The orchestra never played better and the audience realized it, for when the last loud note sounded, there broke forth the only enthusiastic applause of the evening.

The orchestra had a special train of two cars, which took them to Boston immediately after the concert.

As for Mr. Nikisch, whom Worcester has been waiting so anxiously to see, he will please consider that the freedom of the city is presented to him.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 6, 1889.

CRITERION COURSE.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a good audience at Mechanics Hall, last night, on the occasion of the opening entertainment of the Criterion Course, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though not so large as the music deserved. The weather outside was bad, but within there was steady enjoyment, and at the very end, the audience paid the Orchestra the unusual compliment of breaking out into hearty applause before they took their departure. This was at the admirable performance of the Tannhaeuser Overture. The general verdict was at the moment that it had never been played so perfectly before in Worcester, and writing a little later, we are not disposed to dispute the fact.

Herr Nikisch, the new Conductor, who took up in Boston this season the baton laid down by Herr Gericke, is tall and dark, as quiet and free from mannerisms as his predecessor; he guides his musicians with equal precision and a little more vigor. If Herr Gericke had a fault,—and one was not to be found without some searching,—it was a shade of over-refinement. Nothing could be more delightful than the finished grace and beauty of the lighter passages and airs under his interpretation, nor was he lacking in force when the fortisimo passages were reached, yet as according to report there was a little of the martinet in his despotic control of his players, so there was a faint shade of the same quality, when he took in hand the works of the great masters. Nikisch is freer and a little broader. He may not quite reach the delicate refinements of which Gericke was a master, but his music is a little fresher and there are deeper and more meaning contrasts between the varying passages. This is a popular quality and held in check by thorough intelligence and musical taste, it is an artistic gain. The comparison may seem a trifle finical, but allowing that Wagner was better interpreted at this concert than ever before in this city by the same orchestra, we do not know how else to account for it. Gericke was so excellent that it is not easy to imagine anything more to be desired, and both men must be placed in the first rank of their profession.

It is to be noticed that the fashion of playing without notes has reached conductors. Nikisch uses no score, no matter how long the symphony. The exception is when he has to follow the whims of a solo performer.

Other numbers of the Orchestra were the Mendelssohn Overture called "The Hebrides," or "Fingal's Cave;" and the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. The very learned and elaborate discussion of these works on the programme makes comment here unnecessary, after what we have said of the Conductor. Miss Marie Geselschap, a talented and promising young pianist, played the Allegro de Concert of Chopin, (Op. 46) arranged for the piano-forte and the Orchestra, by Nicode, one of the most successful German musicians of the day. She played alone two other selections, a minuet by Paderewsky and the Rigoletto Fantasie, arranged from Verdi by Liszt.

The Worcester public are indebted to the managers of the Criterion Course, Messrs. Burdett & North, for an unusually valuable series of entertainments. There will follow on Tuesday of next week a concert introducing the famous young Otto Hegner. Later will come Stoddard lectures, and three more concerts, including one by Mlle. Clementine de Vere, and one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of tickets will continue at the music warehouse of C. L. Gorham & Co.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist Saturday night, giving a concerto by Brahms which is new to Boston. It was first played by Joachim in Leipsic, for whom it was specially written, and although a work in which the violin is not as prominent as in many works of this kind, it abounds in technical difficulties, requiring a master hand to perform it as it should be. Mr. Kneisel was at his best, and had composed a cadenza, which was not the least interesting part of the performance. It is a satisfaction to listen to the musicianly playing of Mr. Kneisel, apart from the very pleasing and interesting nature of the work itself. He covered himself with glory; was recalled a number of times, and there was no more enthusiastic applause than from the members of the band, in which Mr. Nikisch heartily joined.

The orchestral numbers were Haydn's "Bear" Symphony. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. This latter was magnificently done; and there was nothing to which exception could be taken in the symphonies. The programme was rather longer than Mr. Nikisch has been accustomed to give us, and many did not remain to hear the closing selection. The disadvantage of beginning with a symphony was shown in the tardy entrance of the audience—there being constant interruptions until after the opening of the third movement. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Teisler is to be the piano soloist at the next concert, and the programme is from the works of Goldmark, Wagner and Schumann.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture are as hackneyed and overworn as "Trovatore," "The Bohemian Girl" or the "Wedding March," and it is quite time that they should be dropped from the Symphony programmes until a new generation has grown up in ignorance of them. It required all Mr. Nikisch's energy and enthusiasm to make them acceptable on Saturday evening, and that the audience enjoyed them well enough to applaud them heartily was a proof of his magnetic influence more than of anything else, and criticism may admit that he has given no better proof of his spirit, his control and his ardor. But the same time might have been better occupied by something new or at least less anciently familiar, and Mr. Nikisch would have won more favor from the after-thoughts of cool reflection by giving some evidence of the catholicity which he professed three months ago on taking his place here.

The concert of tonight, which will be a pretty long one, is to begin with that symphony of Haydn (heretofore unplayed in Boston) known as "The Bear," although it would not be easy to guess wherein that animal is signified or suggested, unless it be in the last movement, where there are a good many sharp out-crying chords and some mysterious rumbles and grumbles and growls in the bass. Written for the critical Paris public of 1786, it shows everywhere its author's best care and cleverest handiwork, and while at times more robust than was his wont, it has many characteristically delicious bits of pastoral tone in the phrases for flute or oboe and in the smoothly flowing string harmonies, together with some vivid and sudden contracts. It was well but not enthusiastically received yesterday afternoon, and would doubtless have been more enjoyed if Mr. Nikisch had held a tighter hand over its forte passages and had educed more graciousness and gentle ease from the strings in the second movement. The finale, with its odd humorous passages for the double-basses and bassoons, has a touch of hurly burly in its working out and comes to a vigorous ending. The score is a pretty full one in effect, although there are no trombones and the trumpets seldom speak except for emphasis. The second number is also a new one here—Brahms's violin concerto in D, written about ten years ago for Joachim. It is in strict form throughout, and although in the long introductory exposition of the first themes the soloist has no part, the work is one evidently intended for an artist of high attainment, because it requires a mastery of all technical difficulties, in scales, skips, trills, double-stops and all the rest of them, and also needs sentiment, a long, smooth, sostenuto as well as spirit, vigor and slancio too. After it once passes the introduction the soloist must be busy, and he is generally accorded all the prominence he could desire, although occasionally—but this mainly in the first movement—Brahms's love for polyphony leads him to fill his score with so much accessory matter that a first hearing will not give nearly all the points to any but the best trained ear. There are exquisite melodies, quiet, idyllic and plaintive in the concerto, and the second movement is especially lovely. Mr. Kneisel played the work with the hand and the sentiment of a master; his tone has gained in fulness, dignity, and warmth and his execution now has not only grace and clearness but dash and sparkle. His own cadenza had appropriateness and virtuosity, and fitted perfectly into its place. The rest of the concert will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" symphony, which is after all rather better as a prologue than an epilogue.

The concert of next Saturday will follow this programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala; Litolff, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, op. 45, (first time in Boston); Wagner, prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," soli for pianoforte; Schumann, overture, Scherzo and finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

At the second Kneisel Quartette concert, on Monday evening at Chickering's, the first place was given to a new piano and violin sonata by Mr. Arthur Foote, which he and Mr. Kneisel played. It is probably his best work thus far, and though it sometimes shows too plainly his study of Bach, it does not smell of the lamp; its themes are melodious and decided and the treatment has learning and care. Schubert's D-minor quartette was at the foot of the programme, and between them was a group of German songs which Miss Rose Stewart would undoubtedly have sung with better balance of tone and more effect if she had not handicapped herself by her own accompaniments, beautifully played though they were. Her style is trained and tasteful, but the upper notes of her compass, although she reaches them easily, give less pleasure than the rest of her voice, except in the fioritura wherein she is skilful.

NEW YORK HERALD

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8,

The first concert of the four which the Boston orchestra will give this winter in Steinway Hall, under the direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch, will take place on the 17th of this month.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7,

SECOND KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

PROGRAM.

Arthur Foote.	Sonata for Violin and Piano. G minor, op. 20. Allegro appassionato, G minor. Alla Siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major. Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor, (First time. MS.) Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.
	Songs with Piano.
Brahms.	a "An die Tauben."
Moszkowski.	b "Schlaf Bubchen schlaf."
Liszt.	c "Die Loreley." Miss Stewart.
Schubert.	Quartet in D minor.

Mr. Foote's sonata for piano and violin is more interesting than the orchestral suite which was lately played at a symphony concert. The different movements are not so long drawn out; he has more to say and yet he says it in fewer measures. The second movement alla siciliano is the most melodious and perhaps the most pleasing, though surely not so original as the first and last. The sonata was well played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel.

The singer of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. She has a light and very agreeable voice of pure quality. She has been exceedingly well taught. She sings intelligently, sympathetically and modestly. She made the mistake of playing her own accompaniments upon a grand piano, the cover of which was raised a little. The results of the double performance were these: many in the audience could not see her; no one could hear the song of Brahms as the voice was drowned in the accompaniment; and she could not do herself justice in any of her selections. Now when people go to hear a woman sing, they wish to see and hear her; they do not care whether she play the piano well or badly; in any song which is really a song, the accompaniment is secondary to the song itself, though however simple it apparently be, it must be played with great care and discretion. Not even the great and only Mr. George Henschel can sing at his best when he plays his own accompaniments. Miss Stewart made another mistake in the selection of Liszt's "Loreley," which is a species of declamation and not a song. And it was as though Miss Stewart played a fantastic piece upon the piano and now and then explained with her voice what she was doing. Too many of our singers have bent the knee to Baal; and they vainly try to sing unsingable songs. The voice and the art of Miss Stewart should not so be desecrated. And the persistent practice of such compositions as "The Loreley" will destroy a keen sense of intonation and will induce forcing of the voice and unpleasant mannerisms.

Schubert's quartet in D minor closed the concert. The "Tod und das Mädchen" variations will no doubt make this quartet a favorite for years to come. The pruning knife could be used freely and with advantage upon the first and last movements. The famous theme and variations were played with genuine, artistic sentiment, which never sank to sentimentality. The other movements were played with the care and finish which characterize the performances of this quartet.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1889.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Favorite Soloist.

The programme of last evening's symphony concert was of more than average interest, presenting two novelties and having for soloist Franz Kniesel. Director Nikisch is certainly deserving of gratitude for his efforts to acquaint Bostonians with unfamiliar works of the masters, and if he is not always happy in his selections, an occasional short-coming can readily be forgiven when surrounded by so much that is enjoyable. The symphony was placed first on the programme, and no doubt gave much satisfaction to those who advocate such an arrangement. A very large number of people came in after the symphony had been played. It would not be complimentary to say that the late arrival of so many was from lack of interest in the presentation of a work with which they were unfamiliar, yet such was, in a measure undoubtedly true.

It was Haydn's symphony in C major which Mr. Nikisch selected to begin his concert. There is little in this composition suggestive of its title, "The Bear." In its gentle and merry spirit it is suggestive of the lamb. It is written in Haydn's characteristic style, and while far from being his best work is a composition to demand admiration, and the artistic, spirited and generally expressive interpretation given by Mr. Nikisch met with hearty favor.

It is rather remarkable that Brahm's concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, should not have been heard here before. Though strictly a classic and somewhat heavy at times, it is such a delightful composition, with so many exquisite passages, that an average audience could not find it but entertaining. There are three movements allegro non troppo, adagio and allegro giocoso in rondo form.

The first is the most interesting and introduces delicious themes which are again heard in the other movements. Near the close of the first movement is left a space to be filled in with a cadenza of the performer's own writing. The composition introduced by Mr. Kneisel was the first work of his own that has been heard at these concerts. Because of Mr. Kneisel's exceeding popularity it was natural that much interest should be created, and it can be said with confidence that the expectations of his warmest admirers were realized. The cadenza is an exquisite bit of writing, and is in artistic accord with the composition in which it is introduced. Mr. Kneisel played with rare brilliancy captivating delicacy and admirable expression. The solo violin is not of usual prominence in this concerto, and the demands upon the orchestra were met with excellent effect.

A welcome addition to the programme was that familiar and masterly production—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. A brilliant and satisfactory rendering was given by Mr. Nikisch's band, and the enthusiastic applause won from those who had heard the symphony so many times before was a gratifying compliment to the director's ability. The concluding number was the familiar Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House." The beautiful march was grandly given, but Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the impressive hymn, which forms the principal feature of the overture, was not quite so satisfactory.

The offerings for this will be as follows:

Overture—
Concerto for Op.
Prelude—
Overture,

THE TELEGRAM

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1889.

MR. NIKISCH IN WORCESTER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Criterion Course.

"Will the Criterion course be a success?" has been a frequent question in local musical circles for the past few days. The question could not apply, of course, to the character of the entertainments to be given, but rather to the financial outlook of the venture. In the face of past failures of similar enterprises, the managers of the Criterion course exhibited a wonderful temerity in giving to the public the series of entertainments which opened last evening at Mechanics hall. A square block of seats, from the front back for 16 or 17 rows, was occupied. Around it was a wide border of empty chairs. At the rear were several rows well filled. The west gallery was fairly well patronized, but many of the best seats in the side galleries were unoccupied.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has played in Worcester before, but never under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The orchestra's last concert in Worcester, previous to that at last evening, was given April 5, when Wilhelm Gericke made his final appearance here.

The greatest interest, last night, was manifested in Mr. Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Worcester. It was a little past the hour set for the concert, when Mr. Nikisch made his way through the 'cellos and violins and appeared before the audience. He is short, with a rather pale, sensitive face, very dark and loosely arranged hair, and a quiet demeanor. He made a very low bow to the audience and stepped upon the little stand arranged for him. With no preliminary flourishes, he stood waiting for a moment until the musicians were quite ready. Then his baton gave the signal, and the first strains of Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," came from half a hundred strings,

There is nothing of the steam caliope method about Mr. Nikisch. He is not capricious, nor does his baton do any needless work.

He stood very quietly in his place, scarcely moving his body, save to turn, occasionally, from right to left, and into the movements of his eloquent baton threw a tremendous force and strength of soul that hardly seem to lie beneath the man's calm exterior. An occasional nod of the head and sometimes a motion of the left hand, to accompany the baton, were his gestures, aside from those of the baton.

The program last night was one of bright and happy music, with nothing of gloom by way of interlude. The Mendelssohn overture is brilliant in its coloring, and has at times a strain of joyous song.

Chopin's Allegro de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode, was the second number, and brought forward Miss Marie Geselschap as the pianiste.

There was a tedious wait, which must have been highly delightful for Miss Geselschap, before she could begin. The grand piano was there, but the stool had been forgotten. An ordinary chair wouldn't do. Finally, Mr. Nikisch placed and old green-bottomed chair, with a bass viol cover wrapped up for a cushion. The audience smiled audibly, but it had to do, and Miss Geselschap was ready to play. She rendered the allegro appreciatively and with judicious use of the pedal, but she did not do Chopin full justice. The orchestra performed its part admirably. There was a perfunctory encore.

The long number of the program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F, a work full of spirit and grace. First is an allegro vivace e con brio, which open at once with the full strength of the orchestra, afterwards softening to graceful and even tender little passages, exquisitely rendered. The second movement is an allegretto scherzando, and then comes the third movement in tempo di minuetto, quite unlike the rest of the work and less decisive in its color, but the finale, allegro vivace, brings the whole to a brilliant close. Mr. Nikisch led his orchestra through this beautiful garden of melody with his own poetic appreciation of it visible in every command.

Two soli for the piano, a minuet of Paderewsky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Verdi-Liszt, were rendered by Miss Geselschap. The pretty little minuet was done as well as anything she attempted, and in her last number she was not as satisfactory.

But the orchestra outdid itself in the "Tannhauser." Never did it play the glorious Wagner overture, it would seem, as well as it did last night. But it was not Mr. Gericke's "Tannhauser." Mr. Nikisch has a new interpretation for many passages. He does not despise brass, and the ff passages are brought out with all possible force. The orchestra never played better and the audience realized it, for when the last loud note sounded, there broke forth the only enthusiastic applause of the evening.

The orchestra had a special train of two cars, which took them to Boston immediately after the concert.

As for Mr. Nikisch, whom Worcester has been waiting so anxiously to see, he will please consider that the freedom of the city is presented to him.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 6, 1889.

CRITERION COURSE.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a good audience at Mechanics Hall, last night, on the occasion of the opening entertainment of the Criterion Course, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though not so large as the music deserved. The weather outside was bad, but within there was steady enjoyment, and at the very end, the audience paid the Orchestra the unusual compliment of breaking out into hearty applause before they took their departure. This was at the admirable performance of the Tannhaeuser Overture. The general verdict was at the moment that it had never been played so perfectly before in Worcester, and writing a little later, we are not disposed to dispute the fact.

Herr Nikisch, the new Conductor, who took up in Boston this season the baton laid down by Herr Gericke, is tall and dark, as quiet and free from mannerisms as his predecessor; he guides his musicians with equal precision and a little more vigor. If Herr Gericke had a fault,—and one was not to be found without some searching,—it was a shade of over-refinement. Nothing could be more delightful than the finished grace and beauty of the lighter passages and airs under his interpretation, nor was he lacking in force when the fortisimo passages were reached, yet as according to report there was a little of the martinet in his despotic control of his players, so there was a faint shade of the same quality, when he took in hand the works of the great masters. Nikisch is freer and a little broader. He may not quite reach the delicate refinements of which Gericke was a master, but his music is a little fresher and there are deeper and more meaning contrasts between the varying passages. This is a popular quality and held in check by thorough intelligence and musical taste, it is an artistic gain. The comparison may seem a trifle finical, but allowing that Wagner was better interpreted at this concert than ever before in this city by the same orchestra, we do not know how else to account for it. Gericke was so excellent that it is not easy to imagine anything more to be desired, and both men must be placed in the first rank of their profession.

It is to be noticed that the fashion of playing without notes has reached conductors. Nikisch uses no score, no matter how long the symphony. The exception is when he has to follow the whims of a solo performer.

Other numbers of the Orchestra were the Mendelssohn Overture called "The Hebrides," or "Fingal's Cave;" and the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. The very learned and elaborate discussion of these works on the programme makes comment here unnecessary, after what we have said of the Conductor. Miss Marie Geselschap, a talented and promising young pianist, played the Allegro de Concert of Chopin, (Op. 46) arranged for the piano-forte and the Orchestra, by Nicode, one of the most successful German musicians of the day. She played alone two other selections, a minuet by Paderewsky and the Rigoletto Fantasie, arranged from Verdi by Liszt.

The Worcester public are indebted to the managers of the Criterion Course, Messrs. Burdett & North, for an unusually valuable series of entertainments. There will follow on Tuesday of next week a concert introducing the famous young Otto Hegner. Later will come Stoddard lectures, and three more concerts, including one by Mlle. Clementine de Vere, and one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of tickets will continue at the music warehouse of C. L. Gorham & Co.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist Saturday night, giving a concerto by Brahms which is new to Boston. It was first played by Joachim in Leipsic, for whom it was specially written, and although a work in which the violin is not as prominent as in many works of this kind, it abounds in technical difficulties, requiring a master hand to perform it as it should be. Mr. Kneisel was at his best, and had composed a cadenza, which was not the least interesting part of the performance. It is a satisfaction to listen to the musicianly playing of Mr. Kneisel, apart from the very pleasing and interesting nature of the work itself. He covered himself with glory; was recalled a number of times, and there was no more enthusiastic applause than from the members of the band, in which Mr. Nikisch heartily joined.

The orchestral numbers were Haydn's "Bear" Symphony. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. This latter was magnificently done; and there was nothing to which exception could be taken in the symphonies. The programme was rather longer than Mr. Nikisch has been accustomed to give us, and many did not remain to hear the closing selection. The disadvantage of beginning with a symphony was shown in the tardy entrance of the audience—there being constant interruptions until after the opening of the third movement. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Teisler is to be the piano soloist at the next concert, and the programme is from the works of Goldmark, Wagner and Schumann.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture are as hackneyed and overworn as "Trovatore," "The Bohemian Girl" or the "Wedding March," and it is quite time that they should be dropped from the Symphony programmes until a new generation has grown up in ignorance of them. It required all Mr. Nikisch's energy and enthusiasm to make them acceptable on Saturday evening, and that the audience enjoyed them well enough to applaud them heartily was a proof of his magnetic influence more than of anything else, and criticism may admit that he has given no better proof of his spirit, his control and his ardor. But the same time might have been better occupied by something new or at least less anciently familiar, and Mr. Nikisch would have won more favor from the after-thoughts of cool reflection by giving some evidence of the catholicity which he professed three months ago on taking his place here.

The concert of tonight, which will be a pretty long one, is to begin with that symphony of Haydn (heretofore unplayed in Boston) known as "The Bear," although it would not be easy to guess wherein that animal is signified or suggested, unless it be in the last movement, where there are a good many sharp out-crying chords and some mysterious rumbles and grumbles and growls in the bass. Written for the critical Paris public of 1786, it shows everywhere its author's best care and cleverest handiwork, and while at times more robust than was his wont, it has many characteristically delicious bits of pastoral tone in the phrases for flute or oboe and in the smoothly flowing string harmonies, together with some vivid and sudden contracts. It was well but not enthusiastically received yesterday afternoon, and would doubtless have been more enjoyed if Mr. Nikisch had held a tighter hand over its forte passages and had educed more graciousness and gentle ease from the strings in the second movement. The finale, with its odd humorous passages for the double-basses and bassoons, has a touch of hurly burly in its working out and comes to a vigorous ending. The score is a pretty full one in effect, although there are no trombones and the trumpets seldom speak except for emphasis. The second number is also a new one here—Brahms's violin concerto in D, written about ten years ago for Joachim. It is in strict form throughout, and although in the long introductory exposition of the first themes the soloist has no part, the work is one evidently intended for an artist of high attainment, because it requires a mastery of all technical difficulties, in scales, skips, trills, double-stops and all the rest of them, and also needs sentiment, a long, smooth, sostenuto as well as spirit, vigor and slancio too. After it once passes the introduction the soloist must be busy, and he is generally accorded all the prominence he could desire, although occasionally—but this mainly in the first movement—Brahms's love for polyphony leads him to fill his score with so much accessory matter that a first hearing will not give nearly all the points to any but the best trained ear. There are exquisite melodies, quiet, idyllic and plaintive in the concerto, and the second movement is especially lovely. Mr. Kneisel played the work with the hand and the sentiment of a master; his tone has gained in fulness, dignity, and warmth and his execution now has not only grace and clearness but dash and sparkle. His own cadenza had appropriateness and virtuosity, and fitted perfectly into its place. The rest of the concert will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" symphony, which is after all rather better as a prologue than an epilogue.

The concert of next Saturday will follow this programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala; Litolff, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, op. 45, (first time in Boston); Wagner, prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," soli for pianoforte; Schumann, overture, Scherzo and finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

At the second Kneisel Quartette concert, on Monday evening at Chickering's, the first place was given to a new piano and violin sonata by Mr. Arthur Foote, which he and Mr. Kneisel played. It is probably his best work thus far, and though it sometimes shows too plainly his study of Bach, it does not smell of the lamp; its themes are melodious and decided and the treatment has learning and care. Schubert's D-minor quartette was at the foot of the programme, and between them was a group of German songs which Miss Rose Stewart would undoubtedly have sung with better balance of tone and more effect if she had not handicapped herself by her own accompaniments, beautifully played though they were. Her style is trained and tasteful, but the upper notes of her compass, although she reaches them easily, give less pleasure than the rest of her voice, except in the fioritura wherein she is skilful.

NEW YORK HERALD

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8,

The first concert of the four which the Boston orchestra will give this winter in Steinway Hall, under the direction of Herr Arthur Nikirch, will take place on the 17th of this month.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7,

Second Kneisel Quartet Concert.

PROGRAM.

Arthur Foote. Sonata for Violin and Piano. G minor, op. 20.
Allegro appassionato, G minor.
Alla Siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major.
Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor,
(First time. MS.)
Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.

Songs with Piano.

Brahms. a "An die Tauben."
Moszkowski. b "Schlaf Bubchen schlaf."
Liszt. c "Die Loreley."
Miss Stewart.

Schubert. Quartet in D minor.

Mr. Foote's sonata for piano and violin is more interesting than the orchestral suite which was lately played at a symphony concert. The different movements are not so long drawn out; he has more to say and yet he says it in fewer measures. The second movement alla siciliano is the most melodious and perhaps the most pleasing, though surely not so original as the first and last. The sonata was well played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel.

The singer of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. She has a light and very agreeable voice of pure quality. She has been exceedingly well taught. She sings intelligently, sympathetically and modestly. She made the mistake of playing her own accompaniments upon a grand piano, the cover of which was raised a little. The results of the double performance were these: many in the audience could not see her; no one could hear the song of Brahms as the voice was drowned in the accompaniment; and she could not do herself justice in any of her selections. Now when people go to hear a woman sing, they wish to see and hear her; they do not care whether she play the piano well or badly; in any song which is really a song, the accompaniment is secondary to the song itself, though however simple it apparently be, it must be played with great care and discretion. Not even the great and only Mr. George Henschel can sing at his best when he plays his own accompaniments. Miss Stewart made another mistake in the selection of Liszt's "Loreley," which is a species of declamation and not a song. And it was as though Miss Stewart played a fantastic piece upon the piano and now and then explained with her voice what she was doing. Too many of our singers have bent the knee to Baal; and they vainly try to sing unsingable songs. The voice and the art of Miss Stewart should not so be desecrated. And the persistent practice of such compositions as "The Loreley" will destroy a keen sense of intonation and will induce forcing of the voice and unpleasant mannerisms.

Schubert's quartet in D minor closed the concert. The "Tod und das Mädchen" variations will no doubt make this quartet a favorite for years to come. The pruning knife could be used freely and with advantage upon the first and last movements. The famous theme and variations were played with genuine, artistic sentiment, which never sank to sentimentality. The other movements were played with the care and finish which characterize the performances of this quartet.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1889.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Favorite Soloist.

The programme of last evening's symphony concert was of more than average interest, presenting two novelties and having for soloist Franz Kniesel. Director Nikisch is certainly deserving of gratitude for his efforts to acquaint Bostonians with unfamiliar works of the masters, and if he is not always happy in his selections, an occasional short-coming can readily be forgiven when surrounded by so much that is enjoyable. The symphony was placed first on the programme, and no doubt gave much satisfaction to those who advocate such an arrangement. A very large number of people came in after the symphony had been played. It would not be complimentary to say that the late arrival of so many was from lack of interest in the presentation of a work with which they were unfamiliar, yet such was, in a measure undoubtedly true.

It was Haydn's symphony in C major which Mr. Nikisch selected to begin his concert. There is little in this composition suggestive of its title, "The Bear." In its gentle and merry spirit it is suggestive of the lamb. It is written in Haydn's characteristic style, and while far from being his best work is a composition to demand admiration, and the artistic, spirited and generally expressive interpretation given by Mr. Nikisch met with hearty favor.

It is rather remarkable that Brahm's concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, should not have been heard here before. Though strictly a classic and somewhat heavy at times, it is such a delightful composition, with so many exquisite passages, that an average audience could not find it but entertaining. There are three movements allegro non troppo, adagio and allegro giocoso in rondo form.

The first is the most interesting and introduces delicious themes which are again heard in the other movements. Near the close of the first movement is left a space to be filled in with a cadenza of the performer's own writing. The composition introduced by Mr. Kneisel was the first work of his own that has been heard at these concerts. Because of Mr. Kneisel's exceeding popularity it was natural that much interest should be created, and it can be said with confidence that the expectations of his warmest admirers were realized. The cadenza is an exquisite bit of writing, and is in artistic accord with the composition in which it is introduced. Mr. Kneisel played with rare brilliancy captivating delicacy and admirable expression. The solo violin is not of usual prominence in this concerto, and the demands upon the orchestra were met with excellent effect.

A welcome addition to the programme was that familiar and masterly production—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. A brilliant and satisfactory rendering was given by Mr. Nikisch's band, and the enthusiastic applause won from those who had heard the symphony so many times before was a gratifying compliment to the director's ability. The concluding number was the familiar Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House." The beautiful march was grandly given, but Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the impressive hymn, which forms the principal feature of the overture, was not quite so satisfactory.

The offerings for this will be as follows:

Overture—Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 45 (first time in Boston).....Litolff
Prelude—Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
Solo for pianoforte.
Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

THE TELEGRAM

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1889.

MR. NIKISCH IN WORCESTER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Criterion Course.

"Will the Criterion course be a success?" has been a frequent question in local musical circles for the past few days. The question could not apply, of course, to the character of the entertainments to be given, but rather to the financial outlook of the venture. In the face of past failures of similar enterprises, the managers of the Criterion course exhibited a wonderful temerity in giving to the public the series of entertainments which opened last evening at Mechanics hall. A square block of seats, from the front back for 16 or 17 rows, was occupied. Around it was a wide border of empty chairs. At the rear were several rows well filled. The west gallery was fairly well patronized, but many of the best seats in the side galleries were unoccupied.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has played in Worcester before, but never under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The orchestra's last concert in Worcester, previous to that of last evening, was given April 5, when Wilhelm Gericke made his final appearance here.

The greatest interest, last night, was manifested in Mr. Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Worcester. It was a little past the hour set for the concert, when Mr. Nikisch made his way through the 'cellos and violins and appeared before the audience. He is short, with a rather pale, sensitive face, very dark and loosely arranged hair, and a quiet demeanor. He made a very low bow to the audience and stepped upon the little stand arranged for him. With no preliminary flourishes, he stood waiting for a moment until the musicians were ready. Then his baton gave the signal, and the first strains of Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," came from half a hundred strings.

There is nothing of the steam caliope method about Mr. Nikisch. He is not capricious, nor does his baton do any needless work.

He stood very quietly in his place, scarcely moving his body, save to turn, occasionally, from right to left, and into the movements of his eloquent baton threw a tremendous force and strength of soul that hardly seem to lie beneath the man's calm exterior. An occasional nod of the head and sometimes a motion of the left hand, to accompany the baton, were his gestures, aside from those of the baton.

The program last night was one of bright and happy music, with nothing of gloom by way of interlude. The Mendelssohn overture is brilliant in its coloring, and has at times a strain of joyous song.

Chopin's Allegro de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode, was the second number, and brought forward Miss Marie Geselschap as the pianiste.

There was a tedious wait, which must have been highly delightful for Miss Geselschap, before she could begin. The grand piano was there, but the stool had been forgotten. An ordinary chair wouldn't do. Finally, Mr. Nikisch placed and old green-bottomed chair, with a bass viol cover wrapped up for a cushion. The audience smiled audibly, but it had to do, and Miss Geselschap was ready to play. She rendered the allegro appreciatively and with judicious use of the pedal, but she did not do Chopin full justice. The orchestra performed its part admirably. There was a perfuonctory encore.

The long number of the program was Bethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F, a work full of spirit and grace. First is an allegro vivace e con brio, which open at once with the full strength of the orchestra, afterwards softening to graceful and even tender little passages, exquisitely rendered. The second movement is an allegretto scherzando, and then comes the third movement in tempo di minuetto, quite unlike the rest of the work and less decisive in its color, but the finale, allegro vivace, brings the whole to a brilliant close. Mr. Nikisch led his orchestra through this beautiful garden of melody with his own poetic appreciation of it visible in every command.

Two soli for the piano, a minuet of Paderewsky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Verdi-Liszt, were rendered by Miss Geselschap. The pretty little minuet was done as well as anything she attempted, and in her last number she was not as satisfactory.

But the orchestra outdid itself in the "Tannhauser." Never did it play the glorious Wagner overture, it would seem, as well as it did last night. But it was not Mr. Gericke's "Tannhauser." Mr. Nikisch has a new interpretation for many passages. He does not despise brass, and the ff passages are brought out with all possible force. The orchestra never played better and the audience realized it, for when the last loud note sounded, there broke forth the only enthusiastic applause of the evening.

The orchestra had a special train of two cars, which took them to Boston immediately after the concert.

As for Mr. Nikisch, whom Worcester has been waiting so anxiously to see, he will please consider that the freedom of the city is presented to him.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 6, 1889.

CRITERION COURSE.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a good audience at Mechanics Hall, last night, on the occasion of the opening entertainment of the Criterion Course, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though not so large as the music deserved. The weather outside was bad, but within there was steady enjoyment, and at the very end, the audience paid the Orchestra the unusual compliment of breaking out into hearty applause before they took their departure. This was at the admirable performance of the Tannhaeuser Overture. The general verdict was at the moment that it had never been played so perfectly before in Worcester, and writing a little later, we are not disposed to dispute the fact.

Herr Nikisch, the new Conductor, who took up in Boston this season the baton laid down by Herr Gericke, is tall and dark, as quiet and free from mannerisms as his predecessor; he guides his musicians with equal precision and a little more vigor. If Herr Gericke had a fault,—and one was not to be found without some searching,—it was a shade of over-refinement. Nothing could be more delightful than the finished grace and beauty of the lighter passages and airs under his interpretation, nor was he lacking in force when the fortisimo passages were reached, yet as according to report there was a little of the martinet in his despotic control of his players, so there was a faint shade of the same quality, when he took in hand the works of the great masters. Nikisch is freer and a little broader. He may not quite reach the delicate refinements of which Gericke was a master, but his music is a little fresher and there are deeper and more meaning contrasts between the varying passages. This is a popular quality and held in check by thorough intelligence and musical taste, it is an artistic gain. The comparison may seem a trifle finical, but allowing that Wagner was better interpreted at this concert than ever before in this city by the same orchestra, we do not know how else to account for it. Gericke was so excellent that it is not easy to imagine anything more to be desired, and both men must be placed in the first rank of their profession.

It is to be noticed that the fashion of playing without notes has reached conductors. Nikisch uses no score, no matter how long the symphony. The exception is when he has to follow the whims of a solo performer.

Other numbers of the Orchestra were the Mendelssohn Overture called "The Hebrides," or "Fingal's Cave:" and the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. The very learned and elaborate discussion of these works on the programme makes comment here unnecessary, after what we have said of the Conductor. Miss Marie Geselschap, a talented and promising young pianist, played the Allegro de Concert of Chopin, (Op. 46) arranged for the piano-forte and the Orchestra, by Nicode, one of the most successful German musicians of the day. She played alone two other selections, a minuet by Paderewsky and the Rigoletto Fantasie, arranged from Verdi by Liszt.

The Worcester public are indebted to the managers of the Criterion Course, Messrs. Burdett & North, for an unusually valuable series of entertainments. There will follow on Tuesday of next week a concert introducing the famous young Otto Hegner. Later will come Stoddard lectures, and three more concerts, including one by Mlle. Clementine de Vere, and one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of tickets will continue at the music warehouse of C. L. Gorham & Co.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist Saturday night, giving a concerto by Brahms which is new to Boston. It was first played by Joachim in Leipsic, for whom it was specially written, and although a work in which the violin is not as prominent as in many works of this kind, it abounds in technical difficulties, requiring a master hand to perform it as it should be. Mr. Kneisel was at his best, and had composed a cadenza which was not the least interesting part of the performance. It is a satisfaction to listen to the musicianly playing of Mr. Kneisel, apart from the very pleasing and interesting nature of the work itself. He covered himself with glory; was recalled a number of times, and there was no more enthusiastic applause than from the members of the band, in which Mr. Nikisch heartily joined.

The orchestral numbers were Haydn's "Bear" Symphony. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. This latter was magnificently done; and there was nothing to which exception could be taken in the symphonies. The programme was rather longer than Mr. Nikisch has been accustomed to give us, and many did not remain to hear the closing selection. The disadvantage of beginning with a symphony was shown in the tardy entrance of the audience—there being constant interruptions until after the opening of the third movement. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Teisler is to be the piano soloist at the next concert, and the programme is from the works of Goldmark, Wagner and Schumann.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture are as hackneyed and overworn as "Trovatore," "The Bohemian Girl" or the "Wedding March," and it is quite time that they should be dropped from the Symphony programmes until a new generation has grown up in ignorance of them. It required all Mr. Nikisch's energy and enthusiasm to make them acceptable on Saturday evening, and that the audience enjoyed them well enough to applaud them heartily was a proof of his magnetic influence more than of anything else, and criticism may admit that he has given no better proof of his spirit, his control and his ardor. But the same time might have been better occupied by something new or at least less anciently familiar, and Mr. Nikisch would have won more favor from the after-thoughts of cool reflection by giving some evidence of the catholicity which he professed three months ago on taking his place here.

The concert of tonight, which will be a pretty long one, is to begin with that symphony of Haydn (heretofore unplayed in Boston) known as "The Bear," although it would not be easy to guess wherein that animal is signified or suggested, unless it be in the last movement, where there are a good many sharp out-crying chords and some mysterious rumbles and grumbles and growls in the bass. Written for the critical Paris public of 1786, it shows everywhere its author's best care and cleverest handiwork, and while at times more robust than was his wont, it has many characteristically delicious bits of pastoral tone in the phrases for flute or oboe and in the smoothly flowing string harmonies, together with some vivid and sudden contracts. It was well but not enthusiastically received yesterday afternoon, and would doubtless have been more enjoyed if Mr. Nikisch had held a tighter hand over its forte passages and had educed more graciousness and gentle ease from the strings in the second movement. The finale, with its odd humorous passages for the double-basses and bassoons, has a touch of hurly burly in its working out and comes to a vigorous ending. The score is a pretty full one in effect, although there are no trombones and the trumpets seldom speak except for emphasis. The second number is also a new one here—Brahms's violin concerto in D, written about ten years ago for Joachim. It is in strict form throughout, and although in the long introductory exposition of the first themes the soloist has no part, the work is one evidently intended for an artist of high attainment, because it requires a mastery of all technical difficulties, in scales, skips, trills, double-stops and all the rest of them, and also needs sentiment, a long, smooth, sostenuto as well as spirit, vigor and slancio too. After it once passes the introduction the soloist must be busy, and he is generally accorded all the prominence he could desire, although occasionally—but this mainly in the first movement—Brahms's love for polyphony leads him to fill his score with so much accessory matter that a first hearing will not give nearly all the points to any but the best trained ear. There are exquisite melodies, quiet, idyllic and plaintive in the concerto, and the second movement is especially lovely. Mr. Kneisel played the work with the hand and the sentiment of a master; his tone has gained in fulness, dignity, and warmth and his execution now has not only grace and clearness but dash and sparkle. His own cadenza had appropriateness and virtuosity, and fitted perfectly into its place. The rest of the concert will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" symphony, which is after all rather better as a prologue than an epilogue.

The concert of next Saturday will follow this programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala; Litolff, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, op. 45, (first time in Boston); Wagner, prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," soli for pianoforte; Schumann, overture, Scherzo and finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

At the second Kneisel Quartette concert, on Monday evening at Chickering's, the first place was given to a new piano and violin sonata by Mr. Arthur Foote, which he and Mr. Kneisel played. It is probably his best work thus far, and though it sometimes shows too plainly his study of Bach, it does not smell of the lamp; its themes are melodious and decided and the treatment has learning and care. Schubert's D-minor quartette was at the foot of the programme, and between them was a group of German songs which Miss Rose Stewart would undoubtedly have sung with better balance of tone and more effect if she had not handicapped herself by her own accompaniments, beautifully played though they were. Her style is trained and tasteful, but the upper notes of her compass, although she reaches them easily, give less pleasure than the rest of her voice, except in the fioritura wherein she is skilful.

NEW YORK HERALD

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8,

The first concert of the four which the Boston orchestra will give this winter in Steinway Hall, under the direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch, will take place on the 17th of this month.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7,

Second Kneisel Quartet Concert.

PROGRAM.

Arthur Foote. Sonata for Violin and Piano. G minor, op. 20.
Allegro appassionato, G minor.
Alla Siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major.
Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor,
(First time. MS.)
Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.

Songs with Piano.

Brahms. a "An die Tauben."
Moszkowski. b "Schlaf Bubchen schlaf."
Liszt. c "Die Loreley."
Miss Stewart.
Schubert. Quartet in D minor.

Mr. Foote's sonata for piano and violin is more interesting than the orchestral suite which was lately played at a symphony concert. The different movements are not so long drawn out; he has more to say and yet he says it in fewer measures. The second movement alla siciliano is the most melodious and perhaps the most pleasing, though surely not so original as the first and last. The sonata was well played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel.

The singer of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. She has a light and very agreeable voice of pure quality. She has been exceedingly well taught. She sings intelligently, sympathetically and modestly. She made the mistake of playing her own accompaniments upon a grand piano, the cover of which was raised a little. The results of the double performance were these: many in the audience could not see her; no one could hear the song of Brahms as the voice was drowned in the accompaniment; and she could not do herself justice in any of her selections. Now when people go to hear a woman sing, they wish to see and hear her; they do not care whether she play the piano well or badly; in any song which is really a song, the accompaniment is secondary to the song itself, though however simple it apparently be, it must be played with great care and discretion. Not even the great and only Mr. George Henschel can sing at his best when he plays his own accompaniments. Miss Stewart made another mistake in the selection of Liszt's "Loreley," which is a species of declamation and not a song. And it was as though Miss Stewart played a fantastic piece upon the piano and now and then explained with her voice what she was doing. Too many of our singers have bent the knee to Baal; and they vainly try to sing unsingable songs. The voice and the art of Miss Stewart should not so be desecrated. And the persistent practice of such compositions as "The Loreley" will destroy a keen sense of intonation and will induce forcing of the voice and unpleasant mannerisms.

Schubert's quartet in D minor closed the concert. The "Tod und das Mädchen" variations will no doubt make this quartet a favorite for years to come. The pruning knife could be used freely and with advantage upon the first and last movements. The famous theme and variations were played with genuine, artistic sentiment, which never sank to sentimentality. The other movements were played with the care and finish which characterize the performances of this quartet.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1889.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Favorite Soloist.

The programme of last evening's symphony concert was of more than average interest, presenting two novelties and having for soloist Franz Kniesel. Director Nikisch is certainly deserving of gratitude for his efforts to acquaint Bostonians with unfamiliar works of the masters, and if he is not always happy in his selections, an occasional short-coming can readily be forgiven when surrounded by so much that is enjoyable. The symphony was placed first on the programme, and no doubt gave much satisfaction to those who advocate such an arrangement. A very large number of people came in after the symphony had been played. It would not be complimentary to say that the late arrival of so many was from lack of interest in the presentation of a work with which they were unfamiliar, yet such was, in a measure undoubtedly true.

It was Haydn's symphony in C major which Mr. Nikisch selected to begin his concert. There is little in this composition suggestive of its title, "The Bear." In its gentle and merry spirit it is suggestive of the lamb. It is written in Haydn's characteristic style, and while far from being his best work is a composition to demand admiration, and the artistic, spirited and generally expressive interpretation given by Mr. Nikisch met with hearty favor.

It is rather remarkable that Brahm's concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, should not have been heard here before. Though strictly a classic and somewhat heavy at times, it is such a delightful composition, with so many exquisite passages, that an average audience could not find it but entertaining. There are three movements allegro non troppo, adagio and allegro giocoso in rondo form.

The first is the most interesting and introduces delicious themes which are again heard in the other movements. Near the close of the first movement is left a space to be filled in with a cadenza of the performer's own writing. The composition introduced by Mr. Kneisel was the first work of his own that has been heard at these concerts. Because of Mr. Kneisel's exceeding popularity it was natural that much interest should be created, and it can be said with confidence that the expectations of his warmest admirers were realized. The cadenza is an exquisite bit of writing, and is in artistic accord with the composition in which it is introduced. Mr. Kneisel played with rare brilliancy, captivating delicacy and admirable expression. The solo violin is not of usual prominence in this concerto, and the demands upon the orchestra were met with excellent effect.

A welcome addition to the programme was that familiar and masterly production—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. A brilliant and satisfactory rendering was given by Mr. Nikisch's band, and the enthusiastic applause won from those who had heard the symphony so many times before was a gratifying compliment to the director's ability. The concluding number was the familiar Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House." The beautiful march was grandly given, but Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the impressive hymn, which forms the principal feature of the overture, was not quite so satisfactory.

The offerings for this will be as follows:

Overture—Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 45 (first time in Boston).....Litolff
Prelude—Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
Solo for pianoforte.
Overture, scherzo and finale, Op. 52.....Schumann
Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Weber.....Overture "Der Freischutz."
Brahms.....Symphony No. 3 in F.
Liszt......"Les Preludes."
Wagner.....Overture "Tannhauser."

Mr. Nikisch has an undeniable genius for conducting overtures. This genius sometimes leads him into extravagances,—as, for instance, the grotesque performance at the Popular Concert of the Overture to the "Barber of Seville"; this genius again has given us the fine "readings" of the Weber, Schumann, and Beethoven overtures. He has been severely censured for certain liberties which he has taken in these same compositions, notably in his treatment of second motives. But let us call upon the witness-stand Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, the well-known composer, opera conductor, and critic. Surely no one who has read his attacks upon Wagner and his followers can accuse him of ultra-romanticism. In a review of Wagner's "Ueber das Dirigiren" Dorn speaks as follows: "Musical compositions (marches and dances excepted) should not be played with rigid attention to the metronome, even if the composer has not indicated any changes of tempo; and in one and the same composition, the softer and more song-like of the different motives should, as a rule, be taken at a slower pace; for example, see the airs in the allegros of the "Oberon" and "Dame Blanche" overtures. One would think that this should be taken as a matter of course; but Wagner is right when he complains that this is not universally known, and so he has good occasion to speak at length upon the subject. . . . If this motive is of such a character that it is to be taken slower, the change in tempo must not occur suddenly but almost imperceptibly; and the return to the original tempo must also be imperceptible, in the cases where the composer has not given any indications of change. I have thus treated the second motive in the first allegro of the D major symphony of Beethoven, although, as an exception, the motive is the louder, not the softer one." The opening of the Freischütz overture gained in effect, since Mr. Nikisch regarded it with Weber as an adagio; it is too often played as an andante and made merely a show piece for the horns. The dramatic pizzicato passages for the double basses were given their full meaning, and in the allegro the clarinet solo was intelligently played. But where Weber introduces towards the end the "Agatha Air," in C major, Mr. Nikisch followed Wagner in changing the mark which Weber has placed over the preparatory chord from a sforzando to a diminuendo, and so he attacks the motive itself, mezzo-forte, making a crescendo, although the wood and brass instruments are busily at work, and the kettle-drums are beating quarter notes. Nor do I think this liberty can be excused on account of any effect gained thereby. Though the attacks after the fermate were a little ragged, the overture as a whole was well played.

It was wise to let the Brahms symphony be heard early in the evening. And not because it ends quietly and with dignity, "like a great man dismissing his guests after a feast"; for the desire to have concerts inevitably end with furious blasts of sound is barbarous, not far removed from the unwillingness to applaud a singer unless there be a final screech upon a high note. The work which demands the most attention should be heard among the very first numbers, when the ear is untired and the mind fresh. When after an hour of music, a Brahms symphony is announced, very many would quietly go home were they not afraid of thus publicly showing a lack of "culture"; and so they sit, perhaps thinking over political or social subjects of the day; or stifling their yawns, they remember the words of the poet:

"And the sooner 'tis over, the sooner to sleep."

But this symphony is among the few compositions of Brahms which can be honestly enjoyed by frequenters of concerts; it is clearer, it is full of melody, it appeals more to the senses alone. In the first movement the brass instead of being merely a background to the impetuous strings, here and there was far too prominent; and in the allegretto there was a lack of the delicacy which so characterized a performance of this beautiful movement when Brahms himself directed the symphony (then in manuscript) at Berlin in January '84. As a whole, however, the symphony under Mr. Nikisch's direction was nobly played.

It is an interesting question, whether the symphony of four movements will in the next fifty years give place to what is known as the symphonic poem. There is no doubt but that the oratorio will make way for the cantata, which perhaps will be given with the accessories of scenery and costume. Music is not a fixed art as some would have it; its forms will change; they have in the past, they will in the future. This is an age when some who complain of the length of a Beethoven trio or the great Schubert symphony in C, will cheerfully sit out the four hours of a Wagner opera; and some who cannot endure the wonderful choruses of Haendel will listen without remonstrance to so-called choral works of Liszt. This "Hungarian honorary-monk," as Humboldt called him, was grievously afflicted with the mania of writing orchestral music. He was not content with being the greatest pianist of this century (if we who have never heard him when he was at his zenith, can believe the testimony of countless trustworthy witnesses); he was not content with being known as the composer of many admirable works for the piano; he must needs be a world-famous writer for orchestra and chorus. Now genius, with rare exceptions, is more limited than is talent; many a man who is only talented can do nearly everything in a respectable manner. It is extremely doubtful whether any of the orchestral works of Liszt will live. In the first place he essayed the impossible; in the second place they are not musically beautiful. He endeavored to portray everything in nature and in the human heart by means of music, forgetting that the only ideas which can be treated musically are musical ideas. He could have called "The Preludes," "That which one hears on the mountain," or vice versa. The title suggests the theme to the hearer; the music remains music pure and simple, intrinsically good or bad, call it what you will. "In hearing a musical work, what matters the reality of the object taken for a theme by the composer? What does concern us, is that we are moved, and that we are moved by the most simple means; because simplicity is the only real beauty. Liszt has made immense endeavors to arrive at impossible results, conditioned as he was. Let us not speak of the lack of melody, or melody only indicated by snatches too short to be seized by the most attentive hearer; but where do we find harmony and tonality, the essential elements of all music of sentiment, respected in some of these symphonic poems?" So says in substance Fétis after carefully examining Liszt's claims to greatness. And yet these same poems have had an undeniable influence upon modern music. Of these compositions "The Preludes" is the most endurable; and Mr. Nikisch made as much out of it as is possible; but his most earnest endeavors could not conceal the triviality of the motives, the dreary middle wastes, the circus-pomp of the close.

The closing number was the "Tannhäuser" overture. Parts of it were extremely well played; and it was a pleasure to notice that Mr. Nikisch did not at the close make unreasonable demands upon the brass. There was too little sensuousness in the treatment of the "Venus music," and the song of Tannhäuser to the goddess was as vulgar, ugly and undramatic as ever. But this lies in the music itself, and it was not the fault of either orchestra or director.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night —Mr. Kneisel as Soloist.

Decidedly Mr. Nikisch is giving us novelties in his concerts, although they are not precisely of the nature which might have been anticipated. Instead of the recent works of St. Saens or Massenet, we are treated to a new symphony by Haydn. One feels a little in sympathy with the actress who, on finding a play posted for rehearsal in the green room, exclaimed "Good gracious! has that Shakespeare written another play?" Even in the same unexpected manner are we surprised from time to time by new symphonies by Haydn—not a marvellous thing when we remember that he composed nearly 150, and could not remember all of them himself. It is, however, rather late in the day to pass judgment upon the father of instrumental form, although one may regard with curiosity the dictum of some of his contemporaries, that he is overladen and complex.

Mr. Nikisch gave to the "Rear" symphony a reading that was altogether commendable. He does not treat Haydn as if he were a prattling child, to be listened to with pleasant condescension, but gives to the Wordsworth of music the proper amount of power and earnestness. Truth to tell, however, the earnestness is reduced to a minimum in this particular work. There is no real adagio, but there is sprightliness and fun almost the whole way through. The first movement is the most sturdy and solid; it gives more development than is usual in the early symphonic school and its themes are powerful and well contrasted. Mr. Nikisch read this not only with proper vigor, but with an evident appreciation of the fact that in Haydn's time the tempi were less exaggerated than with us. He also showed better control of the orchestra than at any previous concert, and there was something of the light and shade, and the precision to which we have been accustomed in former times. This was not only evident in the symphony, but throughout the concert with the exception of a few phrases in the first movement of the Schubert allegro, and in the massive phrases of the "Dedication of the House" overture in which, however, the grandeur of the conductor's interpretation made amends for lack of perfect ensemble. Probably it is in the last movement of the Haydn symphony that the bear is concealed (for the work seems to be a sort of "cherchez la femme" puzzle) since here is an almost continuous drone-bass which is emphatically rustic but may also be taken to simulate the growls of a bear, although the passages have more a musette-like, than an ursine flavor.

The great feature of the concert was the performance of Brahms' violin concerto in D, op. 77, with Mr. Kneisel in the solo part. The work, although in the strict form, has all the most modern complexities, and appeals, especially in its first movement, far more by its skill of development than by any charm of melody. The last two movements make some atonement for this abstruse style, by giving some quite characteristic themes of tuneful vein. In the slow movement the theme is first given on oboe, and the way in which this was performed calls for praise. There is a Hungarian flavor to the chief theme of the final rondo, which is attractive, as are almost all of Brahms' contributions to the Maygar repertoire. Mr. Kneisel has abundant cause to be satisfied with his reception in this work. Already at the beginning the applause of the audience assured him that he was among friends, and he at once justified the welcome by playing in a manner that even he has seldom equalled. His tone was clear and pure, his phrasing convinced one that he understood the work thoroughly and there was a breadth to his work that I have only perceived in recent days. The technicalities of the work, as with Brahms' piano concertos, do not lie on the surface, and there is never a display of virtuosity made merely to captivate the public. In this respect Brahms is quite like Beethoven. The cadenza was in this case the composition of Mr. Kneisel himself. It was appropriately founded on the themes of the movement and can be praised from the standpoint of the musician as well as from that of the virtuoso. It presented every technicality, and every difficulty was easily conquered. Trills, double stopped passages, arpeggios, chromatic runs, all alike call for praise. The only question arising in the mind of the critic was whether the cadenza was not too long and by its melodic phrases did not somewhat interrupt the continuity of the work. The high positions which occurred in the second movement call for especial praise because of the pure intonation with which they were played. At the conclusion of the concerto, the soloist was recalled again and again, as if the audience could not weary of showing their appreciation of his excellent work. What a change it was, though, to go from Brahms to Schubert! How glorious the simple construction and the natural melodies seemed, after the developed style of the modern composer. One lost sight of an occasional indecision of attack (and it must be remembered that there were fewer of these faults than ever before) in the poetic and refined way in which the direct themes and contrasts were presented, and in the andante I must recognize some new and effective points of reading; the light syncopations of the accompaniment, for example, were never b ought out so effectively in Boston before. The obligato work of clarinet, oboe and horn must not be passed over in silence either.

Then came the end of the concert strangely enough with an overture, with this self-same overture, in olden days, we used to begin not only a concert, but a season. Mr. Henschel, when symphonic music, heavenly maid, was young, used Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" as a musical means of saying grace before each year's tonal banquet, but it was never rung out with the majesty which was in it at last Saturday's concert. The trumpet fanfare, especially, was far beyond the cornet phrases of the above performances. In spite of the criticisms that have been passed on some of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Beethoven, it is evident that in some of the works of the great master he attains a height which no other conductor has reached in America. The free tempi chosen were not a defect in this case, but an added beauty, and the martial vein adopted was very effective. Here again, however, there were rough attacks and technical irregularities, which, although condonable in this instance, might, if persisted in, destroy that precision for which our orchestra has become famous, but the fact that these faults were so few at this concert may be taken as an auspicious augury for the future. Certainly, if Mr. Nikisch can combine the persistent labor of the drillmaster with the acknowledged inspiration he already possesses, we shall have the ideal conductor of America and possibly of the world.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Music Hall was very crowded, as usual, Saturday night, and the following programme was played:

Symphony in C major ("L'Ours").....Haydn
First time in Boston.
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77.....Brahms
First time in Boston.
Symphony in B minor (unfinished)..Schubert
Overture—"Dedication of the House".....Beethoven
Soloist—Mr. Franz Kneisel.

This programme lasted nearly two hours, which is certainly too long for a symphony concert. At the same time, it was of absorbing interest, and the audience listened with unfailing attention. The chief interest centred, naturally enough, in Mr. Kneisel's interpretation of the Brahms concerto. This composition has provoked considerable difference of opinion wherever it has been played, and it has been the cause of much argument. The first movement has beautiful themes, and its whole working out is of a distinctly symphonic nature, but it does not seem to be very interesting. The other two movements are distinctly dull, and about as bad examples of orchestral scoring as could be imagined from the pen of so great a master. Yet however greatly the musicians may differ as to the worth of the concerto itself, there is no room for argument as to the manner in which it was played by our gifted concert-meister. It was a truly splendid exhibition of both triumphant virtuosity and immense artistic intuition and understanding. Mr. Kneisel has certainly never played better in this city; more than that, such exquisitely beautiful violin playing has seldom been heard here from any one. There was no attempt at display, nor seeking for vulgar effect. Mr. Kneisel, as far as possible, tried to sink his own personality into the individuality of the work, so to speak, and he most faithfully interpreted the intentions of the composer. It is indeed very seldom that a soloist gives such complete satisfaction. Tone, technique and conception were all equally good, and it would be purely captious to try and find fault.

The Haydn symphony is not very interesting. It is one of the set of six written for Paris before the celebrated London symphonies, and it certainly does not reach the standard of the latter. It was beautifully played. It has often been said of orchestral works that abounded in contrapuntal devices that it was always more satisfactory for a musician to read them than to hear them played. And it is, indeed, very exceptional to find a conductor who can make such works as clear in performance as they appear on paper, but just this unusual capacity seems to be one of Mr. Nikisch's greatest gifts. He produces these works in such a manner that even the veriest layman must be able to a certain extent to understand their contrapuntal structure, and he never exhibited his capabilities in this line more thoroughly than in this same symphony. The beautiful Schubert symphony—this glorious musical torso—was also presented in a most artistic light, although the slow movement was taken perhaps a shade too fast. The sturdy overture was grandly played, and it formed an excellent ending to this interesting concert. It would appear, on looking at the programme for the next concert, that this would be likely also to exceed the one hour and a half limit which seems desirable for such concerts. If so, it would be wise for Mr. Nikisch to shorten it in some way. But heaven forbid that he should sacrifice the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," which will be intensely interesting as interpreted by his warm and romantic nature. The soloist will be Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the ninth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall, last evening, the following programme was played under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction:

Symphony in C major, "The Bear".....Haydn
Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D, op. 77, Brahms
Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Overture, "Dedication of the House"....Beethoven

Mr. Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist, was the soloist, and he offered the most interesting novelty of the evening in the Brahms concerto. The work is an excellent test for the most accomplished violinist, and Mr. Kneisel's added cadenza still further increased its difficulties. Mr. Kneisel's work in this performance cannot be too highly praised, and his masterly skill was displayed as never before in these concerts. The technical difficulties of the first movement were played with a faultless accuracy that disarmed criticism, and the enthusiasm of the audience was shared by his fellow-players in the orchestra, who also joined most heartily in the ovation awarded him upon his appearance. The adagio was played with fine sentiment, and the brilliant final movement, in which are found the most enjoyable portions of the concerto, was given a delightful interpretation. The concerto, as a whole, does not add to the reputation of its composer, save in the intricacies it affords the solo instrument, but it gained a hearty commendation from the audience, mainly by reason of Mr. Kneisel's performance. The day's programme gave further evidence of the fact that Mr. Nikisch is bound in the belief that nothing classical can be found outside the German school, and his action in thus confining himself to such narrow limits appears to be at variance with his announced intentions when he assumed his present duties. Much as there may be of interest in the Haydn symphony, put forward as a novelty, it must be admitted by any unprejudiced person that the French and English schools would afford many more attractive works, and works that would give the desired contrast with the balance of the programme. The playing of the two symphonic compositions was more in the line of conservatism than many of the readings in this line by Mr. Nikisch, and the unfinished symphony had more of Schubert than was expected from former experiences at these concerts during the present season. Next Saturday Mr. Nikisch offers the following programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, op. 45; Wagner, prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," solo for pianoforte, and Schumann, overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52. The soloist will be Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

[36]

THE COMING OF NIKISCH.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS CONDUCTOR TO BE HEARD AT STEINWAY HALL.

The Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Stand the Ordeal of New York Criticism on Thursday Evening—Details of the New Conductor's Career—European Reputation.

On Thursday evening Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the successor of Herr Gericke, will make his bow to the New York musical public at Steinway Hall. There is great desire in the musical world to hear Mr. Higginson's new conductor, and it is probable that the evening will be a memorable one. So much has been heard from Boston of the improvement of the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Nikisch took hold of it, and as it was one of the very best trained orchestras in the country when it was commanded by W. Gericke, there is a natural curiosity to know what wonders the new leader has been able to accomplish.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Bostonians have been charged by New Yorkers with Nikisch worship, with putting the new conductor on too high a pedestal. He has in fact been placed by the Bostonians in a very high niche in the Walhalla of living musical leaders—with Hans Richter, Ferdinand Levy, Felix Mottl. Comparisons with these men, however, are scarcely to be entertained in judging Mr. Nikisch's work, since they are really operatic, orchestral and Wagner conductors. Here, of course, the comparisons made will have to be with the work done by such acknowledged leaders as Theodore Thomas, Anton Seidl and Walter Damrosch. And the New York standard is a very high one.

A few words about Mr. Nikisch's career will be of interest now that he is coming here. He was born in the principality of Lichtenstein Oct. 12, 1855, his father being the head steward and auditor to the Prince of that little land. He showed musical taste when very young, and as a youthful prodigy had great success as a violinist. After studying harmony and organ-playing under Prochazka he entered the Vienna Conservatory at the unusually early age of eleven. Here he studied so well that after two years he sent a string sextet to an open competition and received for it the first prize.

He remained at the Conservatory for eight years, during which time he won the first prize and silver medal for violin playing, and as a special honor and a tribute to his abilities as a conductor composer, he publicly conducted a symphony. His class, at parting, presented him with a magnificent and costly baton.

He then began practical work, first taking a position among the first violinists at the Imperial Opera, which he held for four years. In 1878 he went with Angelo Neumann to Leipsic, and with him held the post of assistant conductor, Anton Seidl being his chief at the time. At the end of a year he received the appointment of chief conductor at the New Opera at Leipsic, where he remained until cabled to by William Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under Mr. Nikisch the opera orchestra became famous and was even considered to be superior to that of the Gewandhaus. His programmes are said to be models of good selection. His Beethoven readings have been immensely praised. His conducting of the concerts of the "Tonkünstler Versammlung" in 1883 brought him orders and decorations from all parts of Germany. He has also conducted the Gewandhaus concerts in place of Reinecke. In fact, he came across the Atlantic with the reputation of being one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors. Boston has placed its seal upon his fame, and now comes the turn of New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give four concerts at Steinway Hall during the season, on the evenings of Tuesday, Dec. 17; Tuesday, Jan. 14; Tuesday, Feb. 11, and Tuesday, March 18. The Symphony Orchestra, it may be remarked, is the only orchestra in the United States organized and maintained all the year round for the daily performance of symphonic and high-class music. Its concerts, furthermore, are, so far as known, the only orchestral concerts that will be given in New York outside of those arranged by the Philharmonic and Symphony societies. They will enlist the efforts of thirty-two performers. The concerts that have been given by the orchestra thus far have been unprecedentedly successful. For the Boston series as much as $96 premium was paid upon a $12 seat for the afternoon performances. The subscription sale for the New York concerts opens on Monday.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Weber.....Overture "Der Freischutz."
Brahms.....Symphony No. 3 in F.
Liest......"Les Preludes."
Wagner.....Overture "Tannhauser."

Mr. Nikisch has an undeniable genius for conducting overtures. This genius sometimes leads him into extravagances,—as, for instance, the grotesque performance at the Popular Concert of the Overture to the "Barber of Seville"; this genius again has given us the fine "readings" of the Weber, Schumann, and Beethoven overtures. He has been severely censured for certain liberties which he has taken in these same compositions, notably in his treatment of second motives. But let us call upon the witness-stand Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, the well-known composer, opera conductor, and critic. Surely no one who has read his attacks upon Wagner and his followers can accuse him of ultra-romanticism. In a review of Wagner's "Ueber das Dirigiren" Dorn speaks as follows: "Musical compositions (marches and dances excepted) should not be played with rigid attention to the metronome, even if the composer has not indicated any changes of tempo; and in one and the same composition, the softer and more song-like of the different motives should, as a rule, be taken at a slower pace; for example, see the airs in the allegros of the "Oberon" and "Dame Blanche" overtures. One would think that this should be taken as a matter of course; but Wagner is right when he complains that this is not universally known, and so he has good occasion to speak at length upon the subject. . . . If this motive is of such a character that it is to be taken slower, the change in tempo must not occur suddenly but almost imperceptibly; and the return to the original tempo must also be imperceptible, in the cases where the composer has not given any indications of change. I have thus treated the second motive in the first allegro of the D major symphony of Beethoven, although, as an exception, the motive is the louder, not the softer one." The opening of the Freischütz overture gained in effect, since Mr. Nikisch regarded it with Weber as an adagio; it is too often played as an andante and made merely a show piece for the horns. The dramatic pizzicato passages for the double basses were given their full meaning, and in the allegro the clarinet solo was intelligently played. But where Weber introduces towards the end the "Agatha Air," in C major, Mr. Nikisch followed Wagner in changing the mark which Weber has placed over the preparatory chord from a sforzando to a diminuendo, and so he attacks the motive itself, mezzo-forte, making a crescendo, although the wood and brass instruments are busily at work, and the kettle-drums are beating quarter notes. Nor do I think this liberty can be excused on account of any effect gained thereby. Though the attacks after the fermate were a little ragged, the overture as a whole was well played.

It was wise to let the Brahms symphony be heard early in the evening. And not because it ends quietly and with dignity, "like a great man dismissing his guests after a feast"; for the desire to have concerts inevitably end with furious blasts of sound is barbarous, not far removed from the unwillingness to applaud a singer unless there be a final screech upon a high note. The work which demands the most attention should be heard among the very first numbers, when the ear is untired and the mind fresh. When a... an hour of music, a Brahms symphony is announced, very many would quietly go home were they not afraid of thus publicly showing a lack of "culture"; and so they sit, perhaps thinking over political or social subjects of the day; or stifling their yawns, they remember the words of the poet:

"And the sooner 'tis over, the sooner to sleep."

But this symphony is among the few compositions of Brahms which can be honestly enjoyed by frequenters of concerts; it is clearer, it is full of melody, it appeals more to the senses alone. In the first movement the brass instead of being merely a background to the impetuous strings, here and there was far too prominent; and in the allegretto there was a lack of the delicacy which so characterized a performance of this beautiful movement when Brahms himself directed the symphony (then in manuscript) at Berlin in January '84. As a whole, however, the symphony under Mr. Nikisch's direction was nobly played.

It is an interesting question, whether the symphony of four movements will in the next fifty years give place to what is known as the symphonic poem. There is no doubt but that the oratorio will make way for the cantata, which perhaps will be given with the accessories of scenery and costume. Music is not a fixed art as some would have it; its forms will change; they have in the past, they will in the future. This is an age when some who complain of the length of a Beethoven trio or the great Schubert symphony in C, will cheerfully sit out the four hours of a Wagner opera; and some who cannot endure the wonderful choruses of Haendel will listen without remonstrance to so-called choral works of Liszt. This "Hungarian honorary-monk," as Humboldt called him, was grievously afflicted with the mania of writing orchestral music. He was not content with being the greatest pianist of this century (if we who have never heard him when he was at his zenith, can believe the testimony of countless trustworthy witnesses); he was not content with being known as the composer of many admirable works for the piano; he must needs be a world-famous writer for orchestra and chorus. Now genius, with rare exceptions, is more limited than is talent; many a man who is only talented can do nearly everything in a respectable manner. It is extremely doubtful whether any of the orchestral works of Liszt will live. In the first place he essayed the impossible; in the second place they are not musically beautiful. He endeavored to portray everything in nature and in the human heart by means of music, forgetting that the only ideas which can be treated musically are musical ideas. He could have called "The Preludes," "That which one hears on the mountain," or vice versa. The title suggests the theme to the hearer; the music remains music pure and simple, intrinsically good or bad, call it what you will. "In hearing a musical work, what matters the reality of the object taken for a theme by the composer? What does concern us, is that we are moved, and that we are moved by the most simple means; because simplicity is the only real beauty. Liszt has made immense endeavors to arrive at impossible results, conditioned as he was. Let us not speak of the lack of melody, or melody only indicated by snatches too short to be seized by the most attentive hearer; but where do we find harmony and tonality, the essential elements of all music of sentiment, respected in some of these symphonic poems?" So says in substance Fétis after carefully examining Liszt's claims to greatness. And yet these same poems have had an undeniable influence upon modern music. Of these compositions "The Preludes" is the most endurable; and Mr. Nikisch made as much out of it as is possible; but his most earnest endeavors could not conceal the triviality of the motives, the dreary middle wastes, the circus-pomp of the close.

The closing number was the "Tannhäuser" overture. Parts of it were extremely well played; and it was a pleasure to notice that Mr. Nikisch did not at the close make unreasonable demands upon the brass. There was too little sensuousness in the treatment of the "Venus music," and the song of Tannhäuser to the goddess was as vulgar, ugly and undramatic as ever. But this lies in the music itself, and it was not the fault of either orchestra or director.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night —Mr. Kneisel as Soloist.

Decidedly Mr. Nikisch is giving us novelties in his concerts, although they are not precisely of the nature which might have been anticipated. Instead of the recent works of St. Saens or Massenet, we are treated to a new symphony by Haydn. One feels a little in sympathy with the actress who, on finding a play posted for rehearsal in the green room, exclaimed "Good gracious! has that Shakespeare written another play?" Even in the same unexpected manner are we surprised from time to time by new symphonies by Haydn—not a marvellous thing when we remember that he composed nearly 150, and could not remember all of them himself. It is, however, rather late in the day to pass judgment upon the father of instrumental form, although one may regard with curiosity the dictum of some of his contemporaries, that he is overladen and complex.

Mr. Nikisch gave to the "Rear" symphony a reading that was altogether commendable. He does not treat Haydn as if he were a prattling child, to be listened to with pleasant condescension, but gives to the Wordsworth of music the proper amount of power and earnestness. Truth to tell, however, the earnestness is reduced to a minimum in this particular work. There is no real adagio, but there is sprightliness and fun almost the whole way through. The first movement is the most sturdy and solid; it gives more development than is usual in the early symphonic school and its themes are powerful and well contrasted. Mr. Nikisch read this not only with proper vigor, but with an evident appreciation of the fact that in Haydn's time the tempi were less exaggerated than with us. He also showed better control of the orchestra than at any previous concert, and there was something of the light and shade, and the precision to which we have been accustomed in former times. This was not only evident in the symphony, but throughout the concert with the exception of a few phrases in the first movement of the Schubert allegro, and in the massive phrases of the "Dedication of the House" overture in which, however, the grandeur of the conductor's interpretation made amends for lack of perfect ensemble. Probably it is in the last movement of the Haydn symphony that the bear is concealed (or the work seems to be a sort of "cherchez la femme" puzzle) since here is an almost continuous drone-bass which is emphatically rustic but may also be taken to simulate the growls of a bear, although the passages have more a musette-like, than an ursine flavor.

The great feature of the concert was the performance of Brahms' violin concerto in D, op. 77, with Mr. Kneisel in the solo part. The work, although in the strict form, has all the most modern complexities, and appeals, especially in its first movement, far more by its skill of development than by any charm of melody. The last two movements make some atonement for this abstruse style, by giving some quite characteristic themes of tuneful vein. In the slow movement the theme is first given on oboe, and the way in which this was performed calls for praise. There is a Hungarian flavor to the chief theme of the final rondo, which is attractive, as are almost all of Brahms' contributions to the Maygar repertoire. Mr. Kneisel has abundant cause to be satisfied with his reception in this work. Already at the beginning the applause of the audience assured him that he was among friends, and he at once justified the welcome by playing in a manner that even he has seldom equalled. His tone was clear and pure, his phrasing convinced one that he understood the work thoroughly and there was a breadth to his work that I have only perceived in recent days. The technicalities of the work, as with Brahms' piano concertos, do not lie on the surface, and there is never a display of virtuosity made merely to captivate the public. In this respect Brahms is quite like Beethoven. The cadenza was in this case the composition of Mr. Kneisel himself. It was appropriately founded on the themes of the movement and can be praised from the standpoint of the musician as well as from that of the virtuoso. It presented every technicality, and every difficulty was easily conquered. Trills, double stopped passages, arpeggios, chromatic runs, all alike call for praise. The only question arising in the mind of the critic was whether the cadenza was not too long and by its melodic phrases did not somewhat interruot the continuity of the work. The high positions which occurred in the second movement call for especial praise because of the pure intonation with which they were played. At the conclusion of the concerto, the soloist was recalled again and again, as if the audience could not weary of showing their appreciation of his excellent work. What a change it was, though, to go from Brahms to Schubert! How glorious the simple construction and the natural melodies seemed, after the developed style of the modern composer. One lost sight of an occasional indecision of attack (and it must be remembered that there were fewer of these faults than ever before) in the poetic and refined way in which the direct themes and contrasts were presented, and in the andante I must recognize some new and effective points of reading; the light syncopations of the accompaniment, for example, were never brought out so effectively in Boston before. The obligato work of clarinet, oboe and horn must not be passed over in silence either.

Then came the end of the concert strangely enough with an overture, with this self-same overture, in olden days, we used to begin not only a concert, but a season. Mr. Henschel, when symphonic music, heavenly maid, was young, used Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" as a musical means of saying grace before each year's tonal banquet, but it was never rung out with the majesty which was in it at last Saturday's concert. The trumpet fanfare, especially, was far beyond the cornet phrases of the above performances. In spite of the criticisms that have been passed on some of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Beethoven, it is evident that in some of the works of the great master he attains a height which no other conductor has reached in America. The free tempi chosen were not a defect in this case, but an added beauty, and the martial vein adopted was very effective. Here again, however, there were rough attacks and technical irregularities, which, although condonable in this instance, might, if persisted in, destroy that precision for which our orchestra has become famous, but the fact that these faults were so few at this concert may be taken as an auspicious augury for the future. Certainly, if Mr. Nikisch can combine the persistent labor of the drillmaster with the acknowledged inspiration he already possesses, we shall have the ideal conductor of America and possibly of the world.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1889.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Music Hall was very crowded, as usual, Saturday night, and the following programme was played:

Symphony in C major ("L'Ours").....Haydn
First time in Boston.
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77.....Brahms
First time in Boston.
Symphony in B minor (unfinished)..Schubert
Overture—"Dedication of the House"...
.....Beethoven
Soloist—Mr. Franz Kneisel.

This programme lasted nearly two hours, which is certainly too long for a symphony concert. At the same time, it was of absorbing interest, and the audience listened with unfailing attention. The chief interest centred, naturally enough, in Mr. Kneisel's interpretation of the Brahms concerto. This composition has provoked considerable difference of opinion wherever it has been played, and it has been the cause of much argument. The first movement has beautiful themes, and its whole working out is of a distinctly symphonic nature, but it does not seem to be very interesting. The other two movements are distinctly dull, and about as bad examples of orchestral scoring as could be imagined from the pen of so great a master. Yet however greatly the musicians may differ as to the worth of the concerto itself, there is no room for argument as to the manner in which it was played by our gifted concert-meister. It was a truly splendid exhibition of both triumphant virtuosity and immense artistic intuition and understanding. Mr. Kneisel has certainly never played better in this city; more than that, such exquisitely beautiful violin playing has seldom been heard here from any one. There was no attempt at display, nor seeking for vulgar effect. Mr. Kneisel, as far as possible, tried to sink his own personality into the individuality of the work, so to speak, and he most faithfully interpreted the intentions of the composer. It is indeed very seldom that a soloist gives such complete satisfaction. Tone, technique and conception were all equally good, and it would be purely captious to try and find fault.

The Haydn symphony is not very interesting. It is one of the set of six written for Paris before the celebrated London symphonies, and it certainly does not reach the standard of the latter. It was beautifully played. It has often been said of orchestral works that abounded in contrapuntal devices that it was always more satisfactory for a musician to read them than to hear them played. And it is, indeed, very exceptional to find a conductor who can make such works as clear in performance as they appear on paper, but just this unusual capacity seems to be one of Mr. Nikisch's greatest gifts. He produces these works in such a manner that even the veriest layman must be able to a certain extent to understand their contrapuntal structure, and he never exhibited his capabilities in this line more thoroughly than in this same symphony. The beautiful Schubert symphony—this glorious musical torso—was also presented in a most artistic light, although the slow movement was taken perhaps a shade too fast. The sturdy overture was grandly played, and it formed an excellent ending to this interesting concert. It would appear, on looking at the programme for the next concert, that this would be likely also to exceed the one hour and a half limit which seems desirable for such concerts. If so, it would be wise for Mr. Nikisch to shorten it in some way. But heaven forbid that he should sacrifice the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," which will be intensely interesting as interpreted by his warm and romantic nature. The soloist will be Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the ninth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall, last evening, the following programme was played under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction:

Symphony in C major, "The Bear".....Haydn
Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D, op. 77, Brahms
Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Overture, "Dedication of the House"....Beethoven

Mr. Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist, was the soloist, and he offered the most interesting novelty of the evening in the Brahms concerto. The work is an excellent test for the most accomplished violinist, and Mr. Kneisel's added cadenza still further increased its difficulties. Mr. Kneisel's work in this performance cannot be too highly praised, and his masterly skill was displayed as never before in these concerts. The technical difficulties of the first movement were played with a faultless accuracy that disarmed criticism, and the enthusiasm of the audience was shared by his fellow-players in the orchestra, who also joined most heartily in the ovation awarded him upon his appearance. The adagio was played with fine sentiment, and the brilliant final movement, in which are found the most enjoyable portions of the concerto, was given a delightful interpretation. The concerto, as a whole, does not add to the reputation of its composer, save in the intricacies it affords the solo instrument, but it gained a hearty commendation from the audience, mainly by reason of Mr. Kneisel's performance. The day's programme gave further evidence of the fact that Mr. Nikisch is bound in the belief that nothing classical can be found outside the German school, and his action in thus confining himself to such narrow limits appears to be at variance with his announced intentions when he assumed his present duties. Much as there may be of interest in the Haydn symphony, put forward as a novelty, it must be admitted by any unprejudiced person that the French and English schools would afford many more attractive works, and works that would give the desired contrast with the balance of the programme. The playing of the two symphonic compositions was more in the line of conservatism than many of the readings in this line by Mr. Nikisch, and the unfinished symphony had more of Schubert than was expected from former experiences at these concerts during the present season. Next Saturday Mr. Nikisch offers the following programme: Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, op. 45; Wagner, prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," solo for pianoforte, and Schumann, overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52. The soloist will be Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1889.

[36]

THE COMING OF NIKISCH.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS CONDUCTOR TO BE HEARD AT STEINWAY HALL.

The Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Stand the Ordeal of New York Criticism on Thursday Evening—Details of the New Conductor's Career—European Reputation.

On Thursday evening Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the successor of Herr Gericke, will make his bow to the New York musical public at Steinway Hall. There is great desire in the musical world to hear Mr. Higginson's new conductor, and it is probable that the evening will be a memorable one. So much has been heard from Boston of the improvement of the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Nikisch took hold of it, and as it was one of the very best trained orchestras in the country when it was commanded by W. Gericke, there is a natural curiosity to know what wonders the new leader has been able to accomplish.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Bostonians have been charged by New Yorkers with Nikisch worship, with putting the new conductor on too high a pedestal. He has in fact been placed by the Bostonians in a very high niche in the Walhalla of living musical leaders—with Hans Richter, Ferdinand Levy, Felix Mottl. Comparisons with these men, however, are scarcely to be entertained in judging Mr. Nikisch's work, since they are really operatic, orchestral and Wagner conductors. Here, of course, the comparisons made will have to be with the work done by such acknowledged leaders as Theodore Thomas, Anton Seidl and Walter Damrosch. And the New York standard is a very high one.

A few words about Mr. Nikisch's career will be of interest now that he is coming here. He was born in the principality of Lichtenstein Oct. 12, 1855, his father being the head steward and auditor to the Prince of that little land. He showed musical taste when very young, and as a youthful prodigy had great success as a violinist. After studying harmony and organ-playing under Prochazka he entered the Vienna Conservatory at the unusually early age of eleven. Here he studied so well that after two years he sent a string sextet to an open competition and received for it the first prize.

He remained at the Conservatory for eight years, during which time he won the first prize and silver medal for violin playing, and as a special honor and a tribute to his abilities as a conductor composer, he publicly conducted a symphony. His class, at parting, presented him with a magnificent and costly baton.

He then began practical work, first taking a position among the first violinists at the Imperial Opera, which he held for four years. In 1878 he went with Angelo Neumann to Leipsic, and with him held the post of assistant conductor, Anton Seidl being his chief at the time. At the end of a year he received the appointment of chief conductor at the New Opera at Leipsic, where he remained until cabled to by William Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under Mr. Nikisch the opera orchestra became famous and was even considered to be superior to that of the Gewandhaus. His programmes are said to be models of good selection. His Beethoven readings have been immensely praised. His conducting of the concerts of the "Tonkünstler Versammlung" in 1883 brought him orders and decorations from all parts of Germany. He has also conducted the Gewandhaus concerts in place of Reinecke. In fact, he came across the Atlantic with the reputation of being one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors. Boston has placed its seal upon his fame, and now comes the turn of New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give four concerts at Steinway Hall during the season, on the evenings of Tuesday, Dec. 17; Tuesday, Jan. 14; Tuesday, Feb. 11, and Tuesday, March 18. The Symphony Orchestra, it may be remarked, is the only orchestra in the United States organized and maintained all the year round for the daily performance of symphonic and high-class music. Its concerts, furthermore, are, so far as known, the only orchestral concerts that will be given in New York outside of those arranged by the Philharmonic and Symphony societies. They will enlist the efforts of thirty-two performers. The concerts that have been given by the orchestra thus far have been unprecedentedly successful. For the Boston series as much as $96 premium was paid upon a $12 seat for the afternoon performances. The subscription sale for the New York concerts opens on Monday.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS,

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL,

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889.

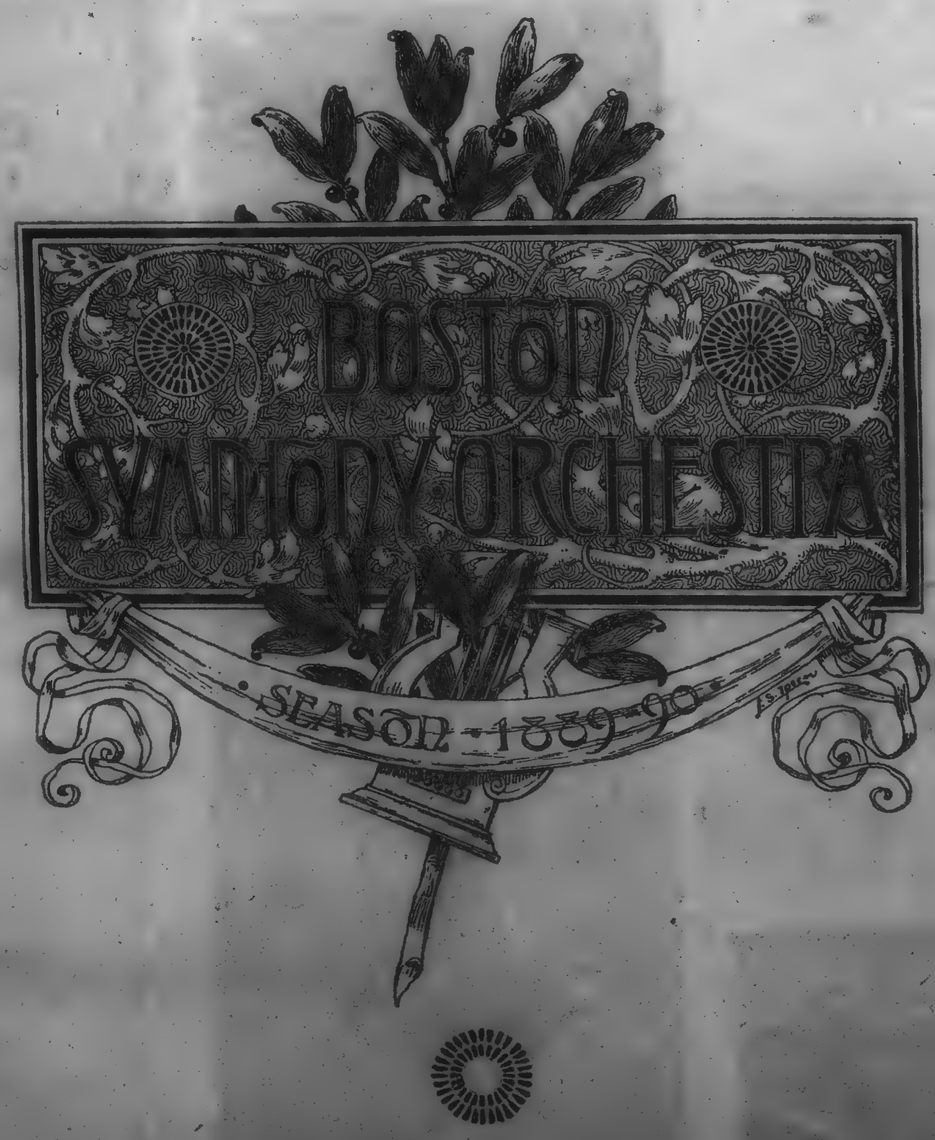
THE THIRD CONCERT AND LAST OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

TUESDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT.

December 17th, January 14th, February 11th, March 18th.



Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts, $5.00, now on sale at the Box Office, Steinway Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its New Conductor, Herr Nikisch, and How He Has Won His Laurels.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the ninth year of its existence, will give its customary four concerts at Steinway Hall on the evenings of Dec. 17, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18. This season's performances of the orchestra are awaited with unusual interest by music lovers, as they are to make known to New York audiences Herr Arthur Nikisch, who has succeeded Herr Wilhelm Gericke as conductor.

HERR NIKISCH.

Herr Nikisch enjoys much renown in Germany, and the impression of his work in Boston has been vivid and lasting. He was born in 1855, in a small town called Azent-Miklos, situated in the principality of Lichtenstein, and at an early age disclosed extraordinary musical talent. In his eighth year he played the violin in public, and he was but 11 when he entered the Royal Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Here he worked harder than ever, and devoted himself especially to composition, with so much success that, two years afterward, he sent a string sextet to an open competition, and received the first prize. He remained at the conservatory for eight years, during which time he won other prizes for composition and the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions—a cantata for solo, chorus, and orchestra—was constantly repeated, and, as a tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory, he was permitted to conduct a symphony in public. He was immensely popular with all his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, and, as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a costly baton.

Herr Nikisch applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and, obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it four years, thus receiving the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous répertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. At the end of his experiences as a member of the orchestra (1878), he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, to Leipsic and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience convinced him that he had found in Nikisch a real musical wonder, and at the end of the year he transferred him to the New Opera House as chief conductor. Herr Nikisch discharged his important functions for close upon ten years, until enaged to succeed Herr Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra over which Herr Nikisch is to wield the baton is made up as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, twelve violas, nine 'cellos, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, one tympani, one harp—eighty-two performers in all. Some of the musicians are widely known as orchestral players and soloists. The concertmeister is Franz Kneisel. Among the first violins are C. M. Loeffler and T. Adamowski; the first 'cellist is Anton Hekking; the first flutist, Charles Molé of the Paris Opéra Comique, and the first oboeist, A. Sautet, from the same establishment; the first clarinetist is L. Goldschmidt from St. Petersburg; the first horn, Xavier Reiter; the first trumpet, Pierre Müller, from Lamoureux's Paris Orchestra. It is doubtful if a more efficient body of performers has ever been brought together, and when it is borne in mind that most of the musicians have been in practice and have played together for years under the same chief, pleasant anticipation of the excellence of their work—even if this were not founded upon memories of past concerts—would be amply justified.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Steinert Hall Crowded with Lovers of Good Music.

The second subscription concert of Adamowski quartet was given to a large audience in Steinert Hall last evening. The quartet had the assistance of Clayton Johns, pianist. The opening number, quartet in D major (K. 575), Mozart, which was composed for Frederick William II. in 1789, received an artistic rendering. The minuet, the gem of the four movements, was given with exquisite grace and delicacy. T. Adamowski fully sustained his reputation as an artist of rare merit. He gave the Benedictus, op. 37, by Mackenzie, with pianoforte accompaniment, in a manner to win the sympathy of his audience. His tone was remarkably pure and his technique and phrasing almost perfect, and he was given hearty recall.

The trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in G minor, by Rubinstein, was beautifully rendered by Mr. Clayton Johns, and the Messrs. Adamowski. The moderato and adagio were given with admirable breadth of tone and phrasing. The most interesting movement in this number, the allegro assai, showed Mr. Johns to be a pianist of high rank. His execution is brilliant and style is refreshing.

[37]

Ninth Symphony Concert, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" (The Bear)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms....Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Rondo—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The programme was so long that the overture served as postlude for many. If Mr. Nikisch continues to explore in the field of Haydn literature, he will doubtless come upon other symphonies of his which have not been played here, but we cannot think the search would be the best thing for us all; Haydn is in no danger of being forgotten, while there are many composers we ought to hear of whom Mr. Nikisch has not vouchsafed us a glance. Haydn's "Bear" walks rhymically, and evidently enjoys life. He is fond of counterpoint (allegretto) and is not too circumspect to share a brusque country dance in bucolic company (rondo); perhaps the "Bear" himself held down the "pedal." The symphony was written for Paris in 1786, and in point of value is surpassed by those composed a few years later for London. It was played admirably. The rondo especially being spirited. Schubert's beautiful unfinished symphony has had smoother performances here, but none where the music meant more. Mr. Nikisch made clear the composer's meaning of that passage in the development of the second movement where the strings march in unison while the "wind" play the melody of the first subject, and elsewhere, by a subtle gesture did the color so appear upon the surface of the orchestra as to reveal the lovely sentiment of what was underneath. The contrasts of spirit which mark the allegro were decided, but not exaggerated. In the performance of the symphony there were one or two little slips on the part of individual players which were due to nervousness. The exquisite quality of the wood-wind of the orchestra was a marked characteristic of the performance of the "Unfinished," the first clarionet and first oboe players earning warm praise for finished phrasing. Beethoven's "Dedication" overture was played impressively. The maestoso introduction had great dignity.

Mr. Kneisel has shown us another and a beautiful work of Brahms. The violin concerto is a noble composition, we are almost tempted to say the noblest for that instrument. Apart from the wonderful constructive skill shown at every bar it is throughout a work of great musical beauty. Thematically it is rich, and the subjects are enlarged, not with the hand of dry science but with the sympathetic touch of the artist caressing his love. The melodial charm of the slow movement, which begins with a long oboe solo, exquisitely played by Mr. Sautet, is something one cannot soon forget, nor the sensuous beauty of the accompaniment. The finale is exhilarating in spirit and brilliantly instrumentated. The solo part of the work traverses the whole field of violin technique and asks of the player those gifts of feeling and expression which come not with books. Mr. Kneisel played as he never has played here before, with a more mature and finished style, fuller tone, sure command of all difficulties, and with artistic feeling. Brahms wrote no cadenza for the first movement, but asks the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel wrote and played a very difficult cadenza, which evinced the complete mastery of his instrument. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel was several times recalled. He received an ovation which he fairly earned. The next programme is: Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, in E flat, op. 45; Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"—soli for pianoforte; Schumann — Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

The Adamowski string quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, pianist, entertained a fine audience at Steinert Hall last evening with a chamber concert programme, including quartet in D, No. 21, Mozart; solo for violin, "Benedictus," Mackenzie, and the trio in G minor, Rubinstein. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the very enjoyable Mackenzie "Benedictus" was one of his happiest efforts and the assistance given by Mr. Johns was admirable in every way.

SUN, SUNDAY,

DECEMBER 8, 1889.—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its New Conductor, Herr Nikisch, and How He Has Won His Laurels.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the ninth year of its existence, will give its customary four concerts at Steinway Hall on the evenings of Dec. 17, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18. This season's performances of the orchestra are awaited with unusual interest by music lovers, as they are to make known to New York audiences Herr Arthur Nikisch, who has succeeded Herr Wilhelm Gericke as conductor.

HERR NIKISCH.

Herr Nikisch enjoys much renown in Germany, and the impression of his work in Boston has been vivid and lasting. He was born in 1855, in a small town called Azent-Miklos, situated in the principality of Lichtenstein, and at an early age disclosed extraordinary musical talent. In his eighth year he played the violin in public, and he was but 11 when he entered the Royal Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Here he worked harder than ever, and devoted himself especially to composition, with so much success that, two years afterward, he sent a string sextet to an open competition, and received the first prize. He remained at the conservatory for eight years, during which time he won other prizes for composition and the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions—a cantata for solo, chorus, and orchestra—was constantly repeated, and, as a tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory, he was permitted to conduct a symphony in public. He was immensely popular with all his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, and, as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a costly baton.

Herr Nikisch applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and, obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it four years, thus receiving the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous répertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. At the end of his experiences as a member of the orchestra (1878), he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, to Leipsic and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience convinced him that he had found in Nikisch a real musical wonder, and at the end of the year he transferred him to the New Opera House as chief conductor. Herr Nikisch discharged his important functions for close upon ten years, until enaged to succeed Herr Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra over which Herr Nikisch is to wield the baton is made up as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, twelve violos, nine 'cellos, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, one tympani, one harp—eighty-two performers in all. Some of the musicians are widely known as orchestral players and soloists. The concertmeister is Franz Kneisel. Among the first violins are C. M. Loeffler and T. Adamowski; the first 'cellist is Anton Hekking; the first flutist, Charles Molé of the Paris Opéra Comique, and the first oboeist, A. Sautet, from the same establishment; the first clarinetist is L. Goldschmidt from St. Petersburg; the first horn, Xavier Reiter; the first trumpet, Pierre Müller, from Lamoureux's Paris Orchestra. It is doubtful if a more efficient body of performers has ever been brought together, and when it is borne in mind that most of the musicians have been in practice and have played together for years under the same chief, pleasant anticipation of the excellence of their work—even if this were not founded upon memories of past concerts—would be amply justified.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Steinert Hall Crowded with Lovers of Good Music.

The second subscription concert of Adamowski quartet was given to a large audience in Steinert Hall last evening. The quartet had the assistance of Clayton Johns, pianist. The opening number, quartet in D major (K. 575), Mozart, which was composed for Frederick William II. in 1789, received an artistic rendering. The minuet, the gem of the four movements, was given with exquisite grace and delicacy. T. Adamowski fully sustained his reputation as an artist of rare merit. He gave the Benedictus, op. 37, by Mackenzie, with pianoforte accompaniment, in a manner to win the sympathy of his audience. His tone was remarkably pure and his technique and phrasing almost perfect, and he was given a hearty recall.

The trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in G minor, by Rubinstein, was beautifully rendered by Mr. Clayton Johns, and the Messrs. Adamowski. The moderato and adagio were given with admirable breadth of tone and phrasing. The most interesting movement in this number, the allegro assai, showed Mr. Johns to be a pianist of high rank. His execution is brilliant and style is refreshing.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS,

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL,

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889.

THE THIRD CONCERT AND LAST OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

TUESDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT.

December 17th, January 14th, February 11th, March 18th.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts, $5.00, now on sale at the Box Office, Steinway Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1889.

Ninth Symphony Concert, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Soloist.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" (The Bear)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms....Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Rondo—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The programme was so long that the overture served as postlude for many. If Mr. Nikisch continues to explore in the field of Haydn literature, he will doubtless come upon other symphonies of his which have not been played here, but we cannot think the search would be the best thing for us all; Haydn is in no danger of being forgotten, while there are many composers we ought to hear of whom Mr. Nikisch has not vouchsafed us a glance. Haydn's "Bear" walks rhymically, and evidently enjoys life. He is fond of counterpoint (allegretto) and is not too circumspect to share a brusque country dance in bucolic company (rondo); perhaps the "Bear" himself held down the "pedal." The symphony was written for Paris in 1786, and in point of value is surpassed by those composed a few years later for London. It was played admirably. The rondo especially being spirited. Schubert's beautiful unfinished symphony has had smoother performances here, but none where the music meant more. Mr. Nikisch made clear the composer's meaning of that passage in the development of the second movement where the strings march in unison while the "wind" play the melody of the first subject, and elsewhere, by a subtle gesture did the color so appear upon the surface of the orchestra as to reveal the lovely sentiment of what was underneath. The contrasts of spirit which mark the allegro were decided, but not exaggerated. In the performance of the symphony there were one or two little slips on the part of individual players which were due to nervousness. The exquisite quality of the wood-wind of the orchestra was a marked characteristic of the performance of the "Unfinished," the first clarionet and first oboe players earning warm praise for finished phrasing. Beethoven's "Dedication" overture was played impressively. The maestoso introduction had great dignity.

Mr. Kneisel has shown us another and a beautiful work of Brahms. The violin concerto is a noble composition, we are almost tempted to say the noblest for that instrument. Apart from the wonderful constructive skill shown at every bar it is throughout a work of great musical beauty. Thematically it is rich, and the subjects are enlarged, not with the hand of dry science but with the sympathetic touch of the artist caressing his love. The melodial charm of the slow movement, which begins with a long oboe solo, exquisitely played by Mr. Sautet, is something one cannot soon forget, nor the sensuous beauty of the accompaniment. The finale is exhilarating in spirit and brilliantly instrumentated. The solo part of the work traverses the whole field of violin technique and asks of the player those gifts of feeling and expression which come not with books. Mr. Kneisel played as he never has played here before, with a more mature and finished style, fuller tone, sure command of all difficulties, and with artistic feeling. Brahms wrote no cadenza for the first movement, but asks the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel wrote and played a very difficult cadenza, which evinced the complete mastery of his instrument. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel was several times recalled. He received an ovation which he fairly earned. The next programme is: Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, in E flat, op. 45; Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"—soli for pianoforte; Schumann — Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

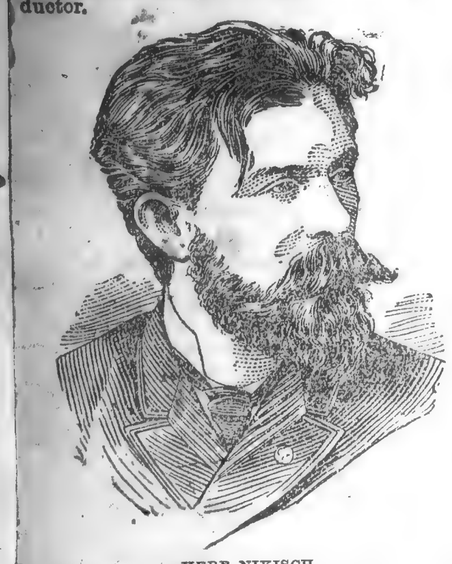
The Adamowski string quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, pianist, entertained a fine audience at Steinert Hall last evening with a chamber concert programme, including quartet in D, No. 21, Mozart; solo for violin, "Benedictus," Mackenzie, and the trio in G minor, Rubinstein. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the very enjoyable Mackenzie "Benedictus" was one of his happiest efforts and the assistance given by Mr. Johns was admirable in every way.

THE SUN, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1889.—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its New Conductor, Herr Nikisch, and How He Has Won His Laurels.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the ninth year of its existence, will give its customary four concerts at Steinway Hall on the evenings of Dec. 17, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18. This season's performances of the orchestra are awaited with unusual interest by music lovers, as they are to make known to New York audiences Herr Arthur Nikisch, who has succeeded Herr Wilhelm Gericke as conductor.



HERR NIKISCH.

Herr Nikisch enjoys much renown in Germany, and the impression of his work in Boston has been vivid and lasting. He was born in 1855, in a small town called Azent-Miklos, situated in the principality of Lichtenstein, and at an early age disclosed extraordinary musical talent. In his eighth year he played the violin in public, and he was but 11 when he entered the Royal Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Here he worked harder than ever, and devoted himself especially to composition, with so much success that, two years afterward, he sent a string sextet to an open competition, and received the first prize. He remained at the conservatory for eight years, during which time he won other prizes for composition and the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions—a cantata for solo, chorus, and orchestra—was constantly repeated, and, as a tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory, he was permitted to conduct a symphony in public. He was immensely popular with all his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, and, as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a costly baton.

Herr Nikisch applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and, obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it four years, thus receiving the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous répertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. At the end of his experiences as a member of the orchestra (1878), he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, to Leipsic and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience convinced him that he had found in Nikisch a real musical wonder, and at the end of the year he transferred him to the New Opera House as chief conductor. Herr Nikisch discharged his important functions for close upon ten years, until enaged to succeed Herr Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra over which Herr Nikisch is to wield the baton is made up as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, twelve violas, nine 'cellos, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, one tympani, one harp—eighty-two performers in all. Some of the musicians are widely known as orchestral players and soloists. The concertmeister is Franz Kneisel. Among the first violins are C. M. Loeffler and T. Adamowski; the first 'cellist is Anton Hekking; the first flutist, Charles Molé of the Paris Opéra Comique, and the first oboeist, A. Sautet, from the same establishment; the first clarinetist is L. Goldschmidt from St. Petersburg; the first horn, Xavier Reiter; the first trumpet, Pierre Müller, from Lamoureux's Paris Orchestra. It is doubtful if a more efficient body of performers has ever been brought together, and when it is borne in mind that most of the musicians have been in practice and have played together for years under the same chief, pleasant anticipation of the excellence of their work—even if this were not founded upon memories of past concerts—would be amply justified.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Steinert Hall Crowded with Lovers of Good Music.

The second subscription concert of Adamowski quartet was given to a large audience in Steinert Hall last evening. The quartet had the assistance of Clayton Johns, pianist. The opening number, quartet in D major (K. 575), Mozart, which was composed for Frederick William II. in 1789, received an artistic rendering. The minuet, the gem of the four movements, was given with exquisite grace and delicacy. T. Adamowski fully sustained his reputation as an artist of rare merit. He gave the Benedictus, op. 37, by Mackenzie, with pianoforte accompaniment, in a manner to win the sympathy of his audience. His tone was remarkably pure and his technique and phrasing almost perfect, and he was given a hearty recall.

The trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in G minor, by Rubinstein, was beautifully rendered by Mr. Clayton Johns, and the Messrs. Adamowski. The moderato and adagio were given with admirable breadth of tone and phrasing. The most interesting movement in this number, the allegro assai, showed Mr. Johns to be a pianist of high rank. His execution is brilliant and style is refreshing.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1ST VIOLIN. D. KUNTZ, VIOLA.

A. MOLDAUER, 2D VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS,

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL,

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889.

THE THIRD CONCERT AND LAST OF THE SERIES WILL BE GIVEN ON MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

TUESDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT.

December 17th, January 14th, February 11th, March 18th.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts, $5.00, now on sale at the Box Office, Steinway Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1889.

[37

Ninth Symphony Concert, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Soloist.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" (The Bear)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms....Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Rondo—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The programme was so long that the overture served as postlude for many. If Mr. Nikisch continues to explore in the field of Haydn literature, he will doubtless come upon other symphonies of his which have not been played here, but we cannot think the search would be the best thing for us all; Haydn is in no danger of being forgotten, while there are many composers we ought to hear of whom Mr. Nikisch has not vouchsafed us a glance. Haydn's "Bear" walks rhymically, and evidently enjoys life. He is fond of counterpoint (allegretto) and is not too circumspect to share a brusque country dance in bucolic company (rondo); perhaps the "Bear" himself held down the "pedal." The symphony was written for Paris in 1786, and in point of value is surpassed by those composed a few years later for London. It was played admirably. The rondo especially being spirited. Schubert's beautiful unfinished symphony has had smoother performances here, but none where the music meant more. Mr. Nikisch made clear the composer's meaning of that passage in the development of the second movement where the strings march in unison while the "wind" play the melody of the first subject, and elsewhere, by a subtle gesture did the color so appear upon the surface of the orchestra as to reveal the lovely sentiment of what was underneath. The contrasts of spirit which mark the allegro were decided, but not exaggerated. In the performance of the symphony there were one or two little slips on the part of individual players which were due to nervousness. The exquisite quality of the wood-wind of the orchestra was a marked characteristic of the performance of the "Unfinished," the first clarionet and first oboe players earning warm praise for finished phrasing. Beethoven's "Dedication" overture was played impressively. The maestoso introduction had great dignity.

Mr. Kneisel has shown us another and a beautiful work of Brahms. The violin concerto is a noble composition, we are almost tempted to say the noblest for that instrument. Apart from the wonderful constructive skill shown at every bar it is throughout a work of great musical beauty. Thematically it is rich, and the subjects are enlarged, not with the hand of dry science but with the sympathetic touch of the artist caressing his love. The melodial charm of the slow movement, which begins with a long oboe solo, exquisitely played by Mr. Sautet, is something one cannot soon forget, nor the sensuous beauty of the accompaniment. The finale is exhilarating in spirit and brilliantly instrumentated. The solo part of the work traverses the whole field of violin technique and asks of the player those gifts of feeling and expression which come not with books. Mr. Kneisel played as he never has played here before, with a more mature and finished style, fuller tone, sure command of all difficulties, and with artistic feeling. Brahms wrote no cadenza for the first movement, but asks the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel wrote and played a very difficult cadenza, which evinced the complete mastery of his instrument. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel was several times recalled. He received an ovation which he fairly earned. The next programme is: Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, in E flat, op. 45; Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"—soli for pianoforte; Schumann — Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

The Adamowski string quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, pianist, entertained a fine audience at Steinert Hall last evening with a chamber concert programme, including quartet in D, No. 21, Mozart; solo for violin, "Benedictus," Mackenzie, and the trio in G minor, Rubinstein. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the very enjoyable Mackenzie "Benedictus" was one of his happiest efforts, and the assistance given by Mr. Johns was admirable in every way.

STEINERT HALL.

SECOND CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN D MAJOR. (K 575) — MOZART

ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE.—MINUETTO.—ALLEGRETTO.

SOLO FOR VIOLIN. "BENEDICTUS." OP. 37. — MACKENZIE

WITH PIANOFORTE ACCOMPANIMENT.

(FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.)

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

TRIO FOR PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN AND VIOLONCELLO, IN G MINOR. — RUBINSTEIN
OP. 15.

MODERATO.—ADAGIO.—ALLEGRO ASSAI —MODERATO.

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS AND MESSRS. ADAMOWSKI.

Mozart wrote many compositions for pupils, friends and others, and not a few to order. Among the latter class are three quartets written for Frederick William II in 1789, for which he was doubtless well paid. It was said that he received for one of them a gold snuff-box and a sum of money. It is not probable, however, that for the most part this class of compositions yielded him much return. A characteristic anecdote is related by his widow, which bears out this opinion: "At one of Mozart's Sunday Matinées there was present a Polish Count, who was very much delighted with the new (composed March 30, 1784) pianoforte quintet with wind instruments. He commissioned Mozart to write a trio with obligato flute which the latter promised to do. As soon as he arrived at home the Count sent Mozart a hundred half-louis with a very polite note repeating his thanks for the pleasure the music had given him. The terms of the note left Mozart no doubt that the money was a generous gift, and he returned the politest acknowledgement, at the same time sending the Count, contrary to his custom, the original score of the quintet he had so much admired. A year after the Count came again to Mozart and inquired after the trio. Mozart excused himself by saying he had not yet found himself in the humor to write any thing worthy, the Count's acceptance. "Then no doubt," answered the Count, "you will find yourself still less in the humor to return me the hundred half-louis which I paid you for it." Mozart returned the money, but the Count kept the score of the quintet, which was soon after printed at Vienna without Mozart's permission. Against such persons and such behavior Mozart had no weapons but a shrug of the shoulders and—"the rascal!"

The quartet played to-day is one of the three written for Frederick William, and as his majesty himself was a violoncellist the violoncello is brought to the front and made into a solo instrument giving out the melodies in its highest notes. "This," as Otto Jahn remarks, "obliges the viola frequently to take the bass part, altering the whole tone-coloring of the piece, and the instruments are altogether set higher than usual, the more so as the first violin constantly alternates with the violoncello. By this means the tone becomes brighter, but atones for this by an occasional loss of vigor and force. In other respects also, out of deference, no doubt, to the King's taste, there is more stress laid upon elegance and clearness than upon depth or warmth of tone. Mozart was too much of an artist to allow any solo part in a quartet to predominate unduly over the others. The first violin and violoncello leave the other two instruments their independent power of expression, but the motifs and working-out portions are less important, and here and there they run into a fanciful play of passages. It is singular that in the quartets in D and F (K. 590) the last movements are the most important. When once the composer has thrown himself into the elaboration of his trifling motifs he grows warm, and setting to work in good earnest, the solo instrument is made to fall into rank and file; the artist appears and has no more thought of his presentation at court." (First performance by Adamowski Quartet.)

Ninth Symphony Concert.

Franz Kneisel, Soloist.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" (The Bear)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms....Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Rondo—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The programme was so long that the overture served as postlude for many. If Mr. Nikisch continues to explore in the field of Haydn literature, he will doubtless come upon other symphonies of his which have not been played here, but we cannot think the search would be the best thing for us all; Haydn is in no danger of being forgotten, while there are many composers we ought to hear of whom Mr. Nikisch has not vouchsafed us a glance. Haydn's "Bear" walks rhythmically, and evidently enjoys life. He is fond of counterpoint (allegretto) and is not too circumspect to share a brusque country dance in bucolic company (rondo); perhaps the "Bear" himself held down the "pedal." The symphony was written for Paris in 1786, and in point of value is surpassed by those composed a few years later for London. It was played admirably. The rondo especially being spirited. Schubert's beautiful unfinished symphony has had smoother performances here, but none where the music meant more. Mr. Nikisch made clear the composer's meaning of that passage in the development of the second movement where the strings march in unison while the "wind" play the melody of the first subject, and elsewhere, by a subtle gesture did the color so appear upon the surface of the orchestra as to reveal the lovely sentiment of what was underneath. The contrasts of spirit which mark the allegro were decided, but not exaggerated. In the performance of the symphony there were one or two little slips on the part of individual players which were due to nervousness. The exquisite quality of the wood-wind of the orchestra was a marked characteristic of the performance of the "Unfinished," the first clarionet and first oboe players earning warm praise for finished phrasing. Beethoven's "Dedication" overture was played impressively. The maestoso introduction had great dignity.

Mr. Kneisel has shown us another and a beautiful work of Brahms. The violin concerto is a noble composition, we are almost tempted to say the noblest for that instrument. Apart from the wonderful constructive skill shown at every bar it is throughout a work of great musical beauty. Thematically it is rich, and the subjects are enlarged, not with the hand of dry science but with the sympathetic touch of the artist caressing his love. The melodial charm of the slow movement, which begins with a long oboe solo, exquisitely played by Mr. Sautet, is something one cannot soon forget, nor the sensuous beauty of the accompaniment. The finale is exhilarating in spirit and brilliantly instrumentated. The solo part of the work traverses the whole field of violin technique and asks of the player those gifts of feeling and expression which come not with books. Mr. Kneisel played as he never has played here before, with a more mature and finished style, fuller tone, sure command of all difficulties, and with artistic feeling. Brahms wrote no cadenza for the first movement, but asks the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel wrote and played a very difficult cadenza, which evinced the complete mastery of his instrument. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel was several times recalled. He received an ovation which he fairly earned. The next programme is: Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, in E flat, op. 45; Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"—soli for pianoforte; Schumann — Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

House. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience convinced him that he had found in Nikisch a real musical wonder, and at the end of the year he transferred him to the New Opera House as chief conductor. Herr Nikisch discharged his important functions for close upon ten years, until enaged to succeed Herr Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra over which Herr Nikisch is to wield the baton is made up as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, twelve violos, nine 'cellos, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, one tympani, one harp—eighty-two performers in all. Some of the musicians are widely known as orchestral players and soloists. The concertmeister is Franz Kneisel. Among the first violins are C. M. Loeffler and T. Adamowski; the first 'cellist is Anton Hekking; the first flutist, Charles Molé of the Paris Opéra Comique, and the first oboeist, A. Sautet, from the same establishment; the first clarinetist is L. Goldschmidt from St. Petersburg; the first horn, Xavier Reiter; the first trumpet, Pierre Müller, from Lamoureux's Paris Orchestra. It is doubtful if a more efficient body of performers has ever been brought together, and when it is borne in mind that most of the musicians have been in practice and have played together for years under the same chief, pleasant anticipation of the excellence of their work—even if this were not founded upon memories of past concerts—would be amply justified.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Steinert Hall Crowded with Lovers of Good Music.

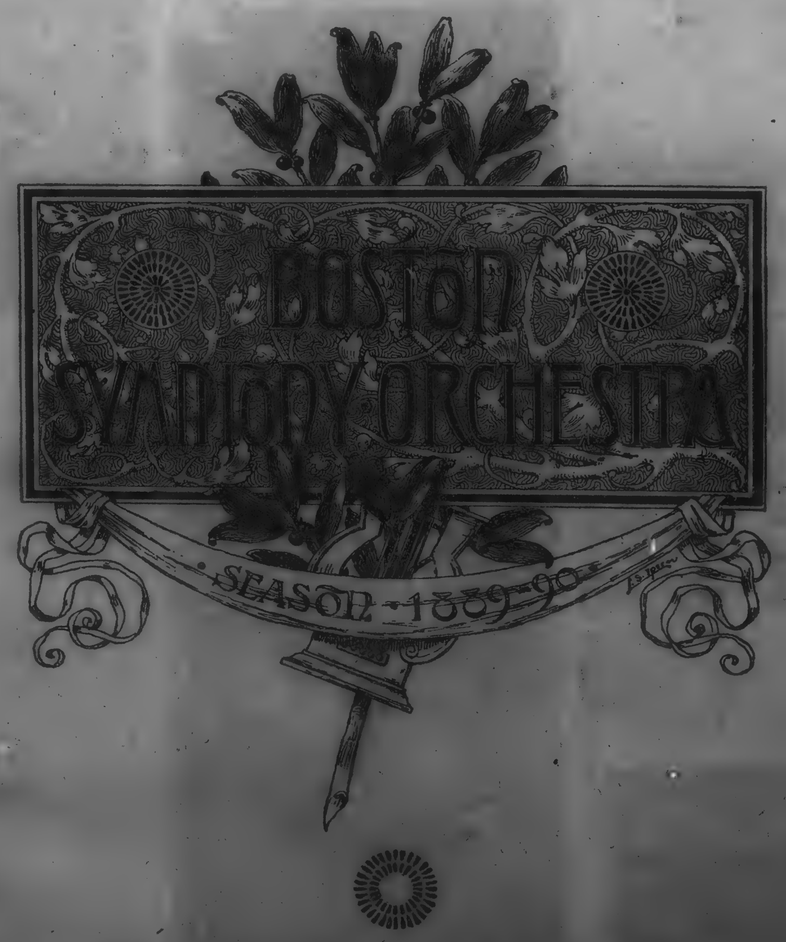
The second subscription concert of Adamowski quartet was given to a large audience in Steinert Hall last evening. The quartet had the assistance of Clayton Johns, pianist. The opening number, quartet in D major (K. 575), Mozart, which was composed for Frederick William II. in 1789, received an artistic rendering. The minuet, the gem of the four movements, was given with exquisite grace and delicacy. T. Adamowski fully sustained his reputation as an artist of rare merit. He gave the [illegible], by Mackenzie, with pianoforte accompaniment, in a manner to please the audience. His [illegible] is remarkably pure and his technique [illegible] almost perfect, and he was [illegible] recall.

[illegible] for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in G minor, by Rubinstein, was beautifully rendered by Mr. Clayton Johns, and Messrs. Adamowski. The moderato and adagio were given with admirable depth of tone and phrasing. The most exacting movement in this number, the allegro assai, showed Mr. Johns to be a pianist of high rank. His execution is brilliant and style is refreshing.

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

TUESDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT.

December 17th, January 14th, February 11th, March 18th.



Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts, $5.00, now on sale at the Box Office, Steinway Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

The Adamowski string quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, pianist, entertained a fine audience at Steinert Hall last evening with a chamber concert programme, including quartet in D, No. 21, Mozart; solo for violin, "Benedictus," Mackenzie, and the trio in G minor, Rubinstein. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the very enjoyable Mackenzie "Benedictus" was one of his happiest efforts and the assistance given by Mr. Johns was admirable in every way.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, London, is foremost of the younger school of English composers, his contemporaries being Stanford, Cowen and Parry. Dr. Mackenzie (the degree is from the University of St. Andrews) is known chiefly through his choral works in the larger forms; namely, oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon;" cantata, "The Story of Sayid," and two operas, "Colomba" and "The Troubadour." He has written no symphonies, but numerous pieces for orchestra—overtures, rhapsodies, etc. Dr. Mackenzie has composed considerable violin music, and when a youth was a capital violin player. His violin concerto, written for the Birmingham Festival of 1885, and the suite "Pibroch," are dedicated to Mr. Sarasate.

The Benedictus, largo maestoso. is one of six pieces for violin with accompaniment of pianoforte, composed two winters ago in Florence, and published as op. 37. The pieces are not related to each other save through a sequence of keys. "The term "Benedictus" is, no doubt, here employed in order to define the spirit and character of the movement as one animated by feeling appropriate to the most impressive part of the Catholic ritual. After two introductory bars for the pianoforte, the piece begins in a quiet and solemn way; the violinist using the fourth string only. The first section, in this manner, and with only a slight access of stronger feeling, continues to a full close in the original key. Then occurs an episode quite different as to structure and character, leading to a second subject, in the dominant key. The feeling of the music at this point begins to grow more intense, and its expression more animated. Compared with the leading theme, it is as though rapture succeeded to awe. In this more impassioned style the movement proceeds to another full close, in the dominant key. Preparation is now made for the usual return of the leading subject which the pianoforte suggests several bars before the violin consents to abandon its subordinate. The theme is here played an octave higher than before, and the accompaniment made more mobile by means of a counterpoint of quavers. A reference to the second subject serves as a coda," Dr. Mackenzie has prepared an orchestral arrangement of the Benedictus.

QUAR

SOLO

The fiftieth anniversary of Rubinstein's appearance in public was commemorated last week in St. Petersburg by a festival of music. The intended programme included a new opera, "Goriouska," and a new concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in A flat. The G minor trio played to-day is the second of the Russian composer's trios, and like most of his early works, is more comprehensible than some of his later ones. There is little continuity, however, between the movements. The first and fourth are thematically vigorous, the slow movement melodially interesting, while the the third has been aptly styled the "gem" of the work.

TRIO

House. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience convinced him that he had found in Nikisch a real musical wonder, and at the end of the year he transferred him to the New Opera House as chief conductor. Herr Nikisch discharged his important functions for close upon ten years, until enaged to succeed Herr Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra over which Herr Nikisch is to wield the baton is made up as follows: Sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, twelve violos, nine 'cellos, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, one tympani, one harp—eighty-two performers in all. Some of the musicians are widely known as orchestral players and soloists. The concertmeister is Franz Kneisel. Among the first violins are C. M. Loeffler and T. Adamowski; the first 'cellist is Anton Hekking; the first flutist, Charles Molé of the Paris Opéra Comique, and the first oboeist, A. Sautet, from the same establishment; the first clarinetist is L. Goldschmidt from St. Petersburg; the first horn, Xavier Reiter; the first trumpet, Pierre Muller, from Lamoureux's Paris Orchestra. It is doubtful if a more efficient body of performers has ever been brought together, and when it is borne in mind that most of the musicians have been in practice and have played together for years under the same chief, pleasant anticipation of the excellence of their work—even if this were not founded upon memories of past concerts—would be amply justified.

...ston Daily Globe.

...DAY, DECEMBER 10.

ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

...ert Hall Crowded with Lovers of Good Music.

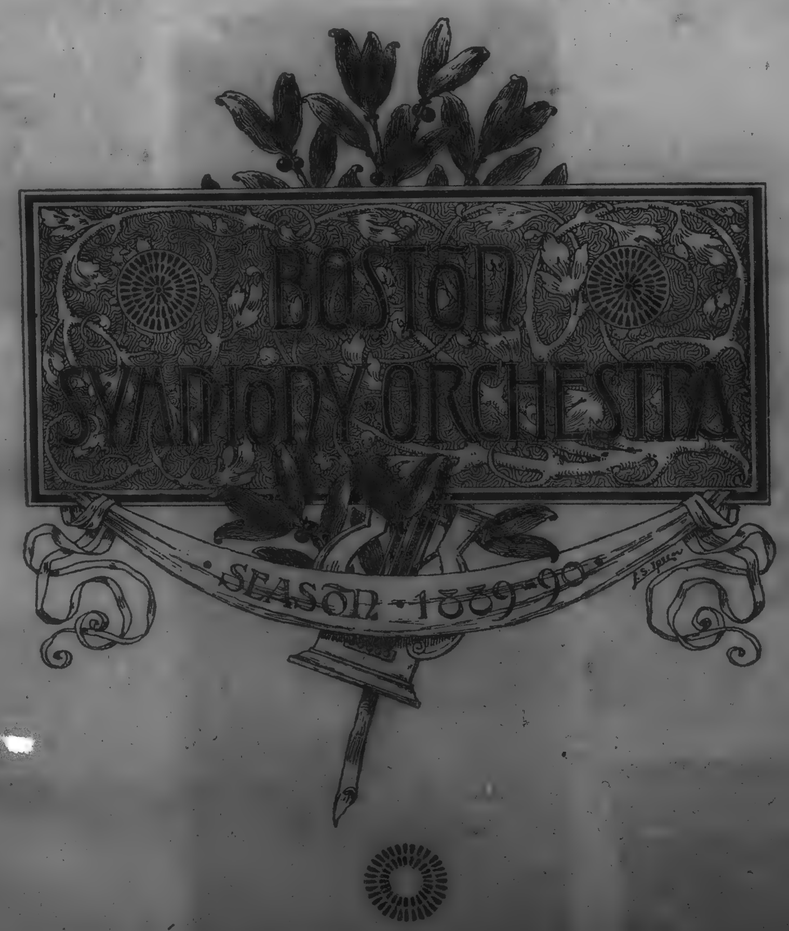
The second subscription concert of ...mowski quartet was given to a large ...dience in Steinert Hall last evening. The ...tet had the assistance of Clayton Johns, ...ist. The opening number, quartet in ...r (K. 575), Mozart, which was com... for Frederick William II. in 1789, re... an artistic rendering. The minuet, ... gem of the four movements, was given ... exquisite grace and delicacy. T. ...mowski fully sustained his reputation ... artist of rare merit. He gave the ...ctus, op. 37, by Mackenzie, with ... accompaniment, in a manner to ... the sympathies of his audience. His ... was remarkably pure and his technique ... almost perfect, and he was ... recall.

... pianoforte, violin and violon... in G minor, by Rubinstein, was beau... rendered by Mr. Clayton Johns and ... Adamowski. The moderato ... adagio were given with admirable ... of tone and phrasing. The most ... movement in this number, the ... passages showed Mr. Johns to be a ... of high rank. His execution is bril... and style is refreshing.

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

TUESDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT.

December 17th, January 14th, February 11th, March 18th.



Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the four concerts, $5.00, now on sale at the Box Office, Steinway Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" (The Bear)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms....Concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Rondo—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The programme was so long that the overture served as postlude for many. If Mr. Nikisch continues to explore in the field of Haydn literature, he will doubtless come upon other symphonies of his which have not been played here, but we cannot think the search would be the best thing for us all; Haydn is in no danger of being forgotten, while there are many composers we ought to hear of whom Mr. Nikisch has not vouchsafed us a glance. Haydn's "Bear" walks rhymically, and evidently enjoys life. He is fond of counterpoint (allegretto) and is not too circumspect to share a brusque country dance in bucolic company (rondo); perhaps the "Bear" himself held down the "pedal." The symphony was written for Paris in 1786, and in point of value is surpassed by those composed a few years later for London. It was played admirably. The rondo especially being spirited. Schubert's beautiful unfinished symphony has had smoother performances here, but none where the music meant more. Mr. Nikisch made clear the composer's meaning of that passage in the development of the second movement where the strings march in unison while the "wind" play the melody of the first subject, and elsewhere, by a subtle gesture did the color so appear upon the surface of the orchestra as to reveal the lovely sentiment of what was underneath. The contrasts of spirit which mark the allegro were decided, but not exaggerated. In the performance of the symphony there were one or two little slips on the part of individual players which were due to nervousness. The exquisite quality of the wood-wind of the orchestra was a marked characteristic of the performance of the "Unfinished," the first clarionet and first oboe players earning warm praise for finished phrasing. Beethoven's "Dedication" overture was played impressively. The maestoso introduction had great dignity.

Mr. Kneisel has shown us another and a beautiful work of Brahms. The violin concerto is a noble composition, we are almost tempted to say the noblest for that instrument. Apart from the wonderful constructive skill shown at every bar it is throughout a work of great musical beauty. Thematically it is rich, and the subjects are enlarged, not with the hand of dry science but with the sympathetic touch of the artist caressing his love. The melodial charm of the slow movement, which begins with a long oboe solo, exquisitely played by Mr. Sautet, is something one cannot soon forget, nor the sensuous beauty of the accompaniment. The finale is exhilarating in spirit and brilliantly instrumentated. The solo part of the work traverses the whole field of violin technique and asks of the player those gifts of feeling and expression which come not with books. Mr. Kneisel played as he never has played here before, with a more mature and finished style, fuller tone, sure command of all difficulties, and with artistic feeling. Brahms wrote no cadenza for the first movement, but asks the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel wrote and played a very difficult cadenza, which evinced the complete mastery of his instrument. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel was several times recalled. He received an ovation which he fairly earned. The next programme is: Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 3, in E flat, op. 45; Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"—soli for pianoforte; Schumann — Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52. Soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

The Adamowski string quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, pianist, entertained a fine audience at Steinert Hall last evening with a chamber concert programme, including quartet in D, No. 21, Mozart; solo for violin, "Benedictus," Mackenzie, and the trio in G minor, Rubinstein. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the very enjoyable Mackenzie "Benedictus" was one of his happiest efforts, and the assistance given by Mr. Johns was admirable in every way.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889.

The Adamowski Concert.

The time is not so far back when chamber music languished so sadly in Boston that a society needed to be formed for its protection and cultivation; now we are so embarras de richesses in this direction that scarcely a week passes but there are two or three chamber concerts of high rank given in the city. Within a very few days we have heard the Kneisel Quartette, the Listemann Quartette and the Baermann chamber concert, all of which were of the first rank, and the concert of last night was not on a lower level.

Mr. Timothée Adamowski has been a favorite with Boston concert goers ever since he settled in the city, and his style of work scarcely needs description. He is a refined, rather than a massive or broad performer, and his expressive tone and delicacy of shading have always a peculiar charm. While he fills the leading part in the quartette, his brother, who has but this season arrived from Poland, is the bass of the organization, and the interior parts are also well filled. Competition is said to be the life of trade; it may also be said to be a potent factor in the advancement of art, for since the various concerts spoken of above began their succession, the rehearsing of the clubs and organizations has been more incessant than ever before, and the result is evident in better performances than last season. This fact was distinctly noticeable in the ensemble of the quartette last night. There is a marked improvement in the ensemble and in the elasticity of playing. The Mozart quartette in D major, which began the programme, was excellently played, as a whole, spite of a few faults in the trio of the minuet. The tone was never overforced, yet never thin; and the balance was commendable.

In the andante the first violin has most prominent work to do, in a sort of dialogue with cello, and subsequently with viola, and here Mr. Adamowski played with a daintiness and grace that left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Kuntz and Mr. J. Adamowski must also be commended for the manner in which the responsive phrases were given. But in the trio of the next movement, the two last named made many slips of intonation. The finale was given with much spirit, the cello doing some good work, especially in the rising sequences. Mackenzies "Benedictus" is an emotional, semi-sacred violin solo, and has so much of direct and beautiful melody that it is as sure to win the suffrages of an audience as Raffs' "Cavatina" itself, although it has not quite so well worked up a climax as the latter. Mr. Adamowski played it with heart and soul, and aroused the audience gathered in Steinert Hall to real enthusiasm. I have never heard him do anything so lofty and solid before, and although perhaps the vibrato was too constantly employed, the excellent tone he evoked from the G string was something that Sarasate himself might copy.

It is a delight to watch, from concert to concert, the development of some conscientious, resident player, and the advance which I have noticed in Mr. Adamowski's work was yet more perceptible in the piano playing of Mr. Clayton Johns. Never before has he played with as much abandon, yet with such surety, as he did in the trio (Rubinstein's G minor) last night; the third movement of this gave much prominence to the piano from beginning to end, and he caught up the dashing passages in wrist action with masterly effect. This same third movement is the most original of the work, of which the first movement seemed artificial, and the last rather bombastic. In the last movement the pianist made a few unimportant slips and blurs, possibly from fatigue, but his work on the whole was most praiseworthy. The adagio suited Mr. Adamowski's mood best, and the first violin part here was entirely admirable. The codas of the movements all have a family resemblance to each other in their fortissimo effects, and the composition, as almost all of Rubinstein's, is unequal. The great advance made by the Adamowski quartette over their work of last season is again to be complimented, and there is no fear of chamber music ever giving out in Boston with such excellent organizations to sustain it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.
FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 13, 1889

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CAMBRIDGE.

The second concert of the series was given in Sanders Theatre last night to as large an audience as at the first, with perhaps more of a contingent from Boston than before. The programme was:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and he played the Lalo symphony better than two years ago; the charming last movement was even more fascinating, and the artist was properly rewarded with four recalls. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was the chief novelty under Mr. Nikisch, although it is in the programme this week, also, in Boston. It was done in a way that proved a performance and not a rehearsal. The Beethoven symphony is still in the minds of the Boston auditors, and the doing was fully as admirable as before. The advantage of the smaller hall is marked in a degree, and it will be a surprise if Mr. Nikisch does not make use of the pianoforte for the solo work in one of this series of concerts, as it is much surer of fine effect than in the larger Boston Music Hall, where the best instrument, aside from the performers, even, loses much that is desirable. To the true lover of music, the very short pilgrimage to Sanders Theatre will always be more than amply repaid, and unless the house is far more crowded than last night he will find it well worth his while.

Boston Post.
TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S SECOND CONCERT.

In spite of the many opposing attractions of a Monday night, there was a very representative audience in Steinert Hall for the second concert of the Adamowski Quartet series, and the following interesting programme was performed:

Quartet in D major. (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for violin, "Benedictus," op. 37. with pianoforte accompaniment. Mackenzie (First time in Boston.) Mr. T. Adamowski.
Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, in G minor, op. 15.....Rubinstein
Mr. Clayton Johns and Messrs. Adamowski.

The quartet have made a very marked improvement since their first concert, and their work last night bears the mark of careful rehearsal. They have gained in delicacy of tone, and the phrasing was exceedingly artistic. The plan of placing the 'cello in front, opposite the first violin, is not entirely successful, as it gives too much prominence to the bass part. This might be easily remedied. The quartet was indeed beautifully played, and Mr. Adamowski deserves the highest praise for the admirable work of his quartet. The "Benedictus" by Mackenzie is a very eclectic work, as so many of the modern English compositions are apt to be. It recalls a dozen different composers, but it is effective and melodious, if not original. It was most beautifully played by Mr. Adamowski, and most artistically accompanied by Mr. Johns. The whole of the first part is on the G string, and Mr. Adamowski played this with a splendidly rich and warm tone. The whole rendering was admirable. The trio is one of the most genial of all Rubinstein's compositions; there is no sense of labored thought in its flowing phrases, and it is singularly sympathetic. Its performance by Mr. Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski was more than satisfactory; and all three artists richly deserved the warm applause which marked the end of the concert. It is very gratifying to have so much admirable chamber music—and, more than that, to have it so thoroughly appreciated.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., DEC. 7, 1889.

The programme of the last symphony concert was exceedingly interesting in many ways. In the first place, it was the modern counterpart of the recent programme which consisted of three classical symphonies. The composers represented on the present occasion were Weber, the pioneer of the romantic school, Brahms, the greatest of living musicians, Liszt and Wagner, the chief exponents of the "music of the future." And the works chosen were thoroughly representative of their respective authors, the overture to "Der Freischütz," the symphony in F, No. 3, the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Brahms' symphony in F is particularly interesting from the fact that it brings out in an unusually strong light qualities which many critics are accustomed to deny to this composer, geniality, grace and tenderness. The change from the usual order of the programme, the symphony being the second number instead of the last, was very gratifying. The symphony, being the most important work, should be given early in the evening, before the listener's power of attention has been seriously taxed, and should be followed by numbers which are not so severe in their demands upon the auditor. The playing of the orchestra was very spirited throughout, the first movement of the Brahms symphony being given with especially fine effect.

B. C. H.

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES

Monday Evening, Dec. 9, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Another superb attraction has been secured to appear at the Auditorium. Managers Quilp and Camp have made arrangements with the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of eighty eminent artists, Mr. Nikisch, who is at the head, as conductor. He was, until secured by Mr. Henry Higginson, a millionaire of Boston, Mass., one of Europe's greatest leaders. He has created much enthusiasm among the Eastern cities. His ideas are all new to the American people. When this same organization appeared here some time ago under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, everyone who heard it went into raptures over it. Even Damrosch and Thomas suffered to no little degree. One principal feature of the organization is that the same artists have been retained together for nine years. It is, without doubt, the most expensive orchestra in this country. The daily expense when traveling amounts to over one thousand dollars. Mr. Higginson, who is the founder, has placed $100,000 to their credit, so as to meet any loss that may occur. Being worth nearly $15,000,000, it is his hobby that Boston should have the greatest permanent orchestra in this country.

The Louisville Post.

MONDAY, - - - DEC. 9, 1889

The papers yesterday had a good deal to say about the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a way that showed that they had that organization mixed up with the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. The latter consists of a half dozen admirable artists, who appear at Masonic Temple in a few weeks. The Symphony Orchestra is the large organization which is well-known here. It does not come till spring, and then will appear at the Norton Auditorium, under the direction of Herr Nikisch.

Boston Evening Transcript.
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the second in a series of three subscription concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall, Monday night, following this programme:

Quartet in D major. (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for Violin. "Benedictus." Op. 37. (Pianoforte accompaniment.) Mr. T. Adamowski.....Mackenzie
Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, in G Minor. Op. 15.....Rubinstein
Quartet—T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; D. Kuntz, viola; J. Adamowski, violoncello. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist.

What a unique charm there is in a concert of chamber music! It is not too long, nor too profound, not too grave, nor too gay to finish off any day or begin any evening with fine grace, to put one, in short in a capital frame of mind, whether he has come from facing the tiger or is going to face the lady. May it live long in the land and prosper!

Is there a composition of Mozart's that does not bear out Haydn's generalization—"The deep musical intelligence that emotion of the soul with which they affect me, and in which I both comprehend and feel them"? * * * Of the quartet in D major, one of the three written for Emperor Frederick William II., Otto John, who, by the way, was quoted upon the programme, says, "There is more stress laid upon elegance and clearness than upon depth or warmth of tone." The minuet is clear to the point of preciseness, and is wanting in that grace of dignity that would prevent many passages from being the pretty uninteresting writing that they are as they stand, but not so the of her movements. What could be more exquisitely beautiful in tone than the andante? The splendid allegretto, too, surely it lacks nothing of force and vigor or warmth of color. Out of compliment to the emperor, who was something of a 'cellist, this and the other quartets written in the same year for Frederick William all make much of the 'cello, but not unduly. Mozart would not have been the artist that the world knows him if he had sacrificed the violins and viola at the shrine of the 'cello. He never forgets that he is writing a quartet, and not a solo instrument tune with an accompaniment.

Dr. Mackenzie's "Benedictus" is devotional in feeling, as its name implies; a melodious composition expressive of the sanctity of the inner peace of a religious soul and the elation of spirit that succeeds it. Mr. Adamowski's playing is so well and favorably known, there is little need be said here about it. Save for a slip in intonation once or twice, something most unusual, he played as he always does, charmingly. The composer has prepared an orchestral arrangement of the "Benedictus" that is announced for performance by the Orchestral Club at its first concert of the season.

The brilliant Rubinstein trio had a most enthusiastic reception at the hands of the audience. It was splendidly played throughout. Mr. J. Adamowski's 'cello work was especially fine. His tone is rich and pure, of the quality that inspires belief in the reserve power that lies behind it. He never once gives one the impression of playing all that is in him to say or in his instrument to translate. In the trio as well as in his solo, Mr. Adamowski's violin appeared a shade less tractable than ordinarily, but only less so. Mr. Johns's playing was full of fire and spirit, strong and sensitive withal He was a bit nervous at the end; but never mind—it was an altogether artistic conception, and extremely well executed.

Clipping from Times
Worcester Mass
Date 12/

CRITERION COURSE.

First Appearance of Mr. Nikisch in Worcester.

The Boston symphony orchestra opened the Criterion course last night. Although every seat in the hall was not filled, the attendance was large. The last time this famous orchestra appeared in Worcester it was under the direction of Welhelm Gericke, and the concert was given April 5, when Mr. Gericke made his last appearance here.

Mr. Nikisch was the centre of attraction last evening as it was his first appearance the opening piece was Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave." Mr. Nikisch assumed his place quietly, and without any preliminary gestures gave the signal for the grand overture. The music of last evening was all of a happy joyous strain.

The second number on the program was Chopin's Allegro de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode. Miss Marie Gesselchap was the pianist. When she appeared, it was found that the piano stool had been forgotten, and the delay that followed was tedious. Finally a chair was substituted with a bass viol cover for a cushion. Her rendering of the difficult number was good but she did not do full justice to Chopin by any means. The orchestra gave admirable support.

Beekhoven's symphony, No, 8, in F. followed, being the largest number in the program. The opening was grand, the orchestra showing its full strength. Gradually they softened down to the most tender and beautiful tones, showing what a powerful test the conductor put them to. The first movement was an allegio vivace e con bird, the second an allegretto scherjando, and the third movement in tempodi minuetto, but the finale allegro vivace made a grand close The number was well received by the audience, and shows the grand poetic thoughts that diffuse the whole of Mr. Nikisch's work.

Miss Gesselchap followed with two solos for the piano, which were favourably received, a minuet of Padererosky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Liszt.

The last number on the program was "Taunhause." The orchestra played the best it ever did in the rendering of this number, and showed the work of Mr. Nikisch. It was given a hearty encore by the audience.

Clipping from Star
Washington D.C.
Date 12/5

[38]

THE LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

The Opening of the New Resort to be Signalized by a Great Musical Event.

MRS. THURBER TAKES A HAND IN IT—THE PROCEEDS TO GO TO THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL—SOME FAMOUS ARTISTS WHO WILL APPEAR—MRS. THURBER'S VIEWS OF MISS DECCA.

The new Lincoln music hall will be opened on December 20 with a concert, which is designed to be a great musical and social event. Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, whose connection with musical interests during the last eighteen years has made her name familiar everywhere, will have charge of the concert. She was the founder of the National conservatory of music, which has done such splendid work in New York, and also organized the American opera company, which was run under her direction for several years. Her time is devoted almost entirely to music, and the amount of work she accomplishes to this end is really astonishing. Her secretary comes over from New York every morning to receive her instructions about the conservatory and her other New York interests, and she is in constant telegraphic communication with her agents and managers in different parts of the country. Mrs. Thurbur is a charming woman personally, and seems very young to have occupied the position she has for so long. Her hair, which she wears brushed back from her forehead, is but slightly tinged with gray.

MRS. THURBER'S ACCEPTANCE.

When the directors of the new music hall learned that Mrs. Thurber was here for a short visit they wisely decided that if they could interest her in the proposed opening it would surely be a great musical success. Accordingly they wrote to her and asked her if she would take charge of the matter and aid them in choosing the best talent obtainable. In answer to this Mrs. Thurber wrote: "I accept your request and ask in return that you will co-operate with me in making the financial result of the inaugural entertainment a substantial Christmas gift to the children's hospital."

At the last meeting of the board of managers of the children's hospital the offer was made that the performance should be given for the benefit of the hospital. This was immediately accepted and a resolution of thanks to Mrs. Thurber for her kindness in the matter was passed. Accordingly the entertainment will be given under the auspices of the board of lady visitors of the hospital and of a list of patrons and patronesses made up of prominent society people of the city.

PLANS FOR THE CONCERT.

This morning a STAR reporter called on Mrs. Thurber at the Shoreham to ascertain what furthur plans had been made for the concert. In answer to his questions Mrs. Thurber said: "A number of leading artists have promised to lend their assistance for the 20th of this month. As they are all busy people the concert will have to take place on that date, and so I hope the directors of the hall will hasten the completion of the building as rapidly as possible. The list of artists for the concert is, I think, a really remarkable one. First there is the Boston symphony orchestra, whose famous leader, Herr Nikisch, will make his Washington debut; M. Theophile Manoury, who will make his first American appearance; Rafael Joseffy, Mlle. Margulies, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, the great violinist, and Mr. Victor Herbert, the leading 'cello virtuoso in this country." Mrs. Thurber said that Joseffy was the only one on the list who had not been heard from accepting the invitation to take part in the performance, but that she felt sure his answer would be favorable. Miss Marie Decca has also been asked to take part and will in all probability do so. Mrs. Thurber said: "I have met Miss Decca and suggested to her that she should sing the duet from "Hamlet" with M. Manoury. She seemed very much pleased and accepted at once. M. Manoury is the most famous Hamlet in the world and the Washington Ophelia will be well supported. She will also sing a solo. I am sure that with a favorable opportunity Miss Decca will make a great success in the musical profession. Mlle. Alice Margulies, who is a professor in the national conservatory and a distinguished pianist, will make her Washington debut, probably in a duo with Joseffy. I have suggested to Herr Nikisch that the symphony orchestra should open the program with the overture of 'Egmont' from Bethoven, and this they will probably do."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889.

The Adamowski Concert.

The time is not so far back when chamber music languished so sadly in Boston that a society needed to be formed for its protection and cultivation; now we are so embarras de richesses in this direction that scarcely a week passes but there are two or three chamber concerts of high rank given in the city. Within a very few days we have heard the Kneisel Quartette, the Listemann Quartette and the Baermann chamber concert, all of which were of the first rank, and the concert of last night was not on a lower level.

Mr. Timothée Adamowski has been a favorite with Boston concert goers ever since he settled in the city, and his style of work scarcely needs description. He is a refined, rather than a massive or broad performer, and his expressive tone and delicacy of shading have always a peculiar charm. While he fills the leading part in the quartette, his brother, who has but this season arrived from Poland, is the bass of the organization, and the interior parts are also well filled. Competition is said to be the life of trade; it may also be said to be a potent factor in the advancement of art, for since the various concerts spoken of above began their succession, the rehearsing of the clubs and organizations has been more incessant than ever before, and the result is evident in better performances than last season. This fact was distinctly noticeable in the ensemble of the quartette last night. There is a marked improvement in the ensemble and in the elasticity of playing. The Mozart quartette in D major, which began the programme, was excellently played, as a whole, spite of a few faults in the trio of the minuet. The tone was never overforced, yet never thin; and the balance was commendable.

In the andante the first violin has most prominent work to do, in a sort of dialogue with cello, and subsequently with viola, and here Mr. Adamowski played with a daintiness and grace that left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Kuntz and Mr. J. Adamowski must also he commended for the manner in which the responsive phrases were given. But in the trio of the next movement, the two last named made many slips of intonation. The finale was given with much spirit, the cello doing some good work, especially in the rising sequences. Mackenzies "Benedictus" is an emotional, semi-sacred violin solo, and has so much of direct and beautiful melody that it is as sure to win the suffrages of an audience as Raffs' "Cavatina" itself, although it has not quite so well worked up a climax as the latter. Mr. Adamowski played it with heart and soul, and aroused the audience gathered in Steinert Hall to real enthusiasm. I have never heard him do anything so lofty and solid before, and although perhaps the vibrato was too constantly employed, the excellent tone he evoked from the G string was something that Sarasate himself might copy.

It is a delight to watch, from concert to concert, the development of some conscientious, resident player, and the advance which I have noticed in Mr. Adamowski's work was yet more perceptible in the piano playing of Mr. Clayton Johns. Never before has he played with as much abandon, yet with such surety, as he did in the trio (Rubinstein's G minor) last night; the third movement of this gave much prominence to the piano from beginning to end, and he caught up the dashing passages in wrist action with masterly effect. This same third movement is the most original of the work, of which the first movement seemed artificial, and the last rather bombastic. In the last movement the pianist made a few unimportant slips and blurs, possibly from fatigue, but his work on the whole was most praiseworthy. The adagio suited Mr. Adamowski's mood best, and the first violin part here was entirely admirable. The codas of the movements all have a family resemblance to each other in their fortissimo effects, and the composition, as almost all of Rubinstein's, is unequal. The great advance made by the Adamowski quartette over their work of last season is again to be complimented, and there is no fear of chamber music ever giving out in Boston with such excellent organizations to sustain it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.
FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 13, 1889

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CAMBRIDGE.

The second concert of the series was given in Sanders Theatre last night to as large an audience as at the first, with perhaps more of a contingent from Boston than before. The programme was:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and he played the Lalo symphony better than two years ago; the charming last movement was even more fascinating, and the artist was properly rewarded with four recalls. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was the chief novelty under Mr. Nikisch, although it is in the programme this week, also, in Boston. It was done in a way that proved a performance and not a rehearsal. The Beethoven symphony is still in the minds of the Boston auditors, and the doing was fully as admirable as before. The advantage of the smaller hall is marked in a degree, and it will be a surprise if Mr. Nikisch does not make use of the pianoforte for the solo work in one of this series of concerts, as it is much surer of fine effect than in the larger Boston Music Hall, where the best instrument, aside from the performers, even, loses much that is desirable. To the true lover of music, the very short pilgrimage to Sanders Theatre will always be more than amply repaid, and unless the house is far more crowded than last night he will find it well worth his while.

Boston Post.
TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S SECOND CONCERT.

In spite of the many opposing attractions of a Monday night, there was a very representative audience in Steinert Hall for the second concert of the Adamowski Quartet series, and the following interesting programme was performed:

Quartet in D major (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for violin, "Benedictus," op. 37, with pianoforte accompaniment.....Mackenzie (First time in Boston.) Mr. T. Adamowski.
Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, in G minor, op. 15.....Rubinstein
Mr. Clayton Johns and Messrs. Adamowski.

The quartet have made a very marked improvement since their first concert, and their work last night bears the mark of careful rehearsal. They have gained in delicacy of tone, and the phrasing was exceedingly artistic. The plan of placing the 'cello in front, opposite the first violin, is not entirely successful, as it gives too much prominence to the bass part. This might be easily remedied. The quartet was indeed beautifully played, and Mr. Adamowski deserves the highest praise for the admirable work of his quartet. The "Benedictus" by Mackenzie is a very eclectic work, as so many of the modern English compositions are apt to be. It recalls a dozen different composers, but it is effective and melodious, if not original. It was most beautifully played by Mr. Adamowski, and most artistically accompanied by Mr. Johns. The whole of the first part is on the G string, and Mr. Adamowski played this with a splendidly rich and warm tone. The whole rendering was admirable. The trio is one of the most genial of all Rubinstein's compositions; there is no sense of labored thought in its flowing phrases, and it is singularly sympathetic. Its performance by Mr. Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski was more than satisfactory; and all three artists richly deserved the warm applause which marked the end of the concert. It is very gratifying to have so much admirable chamber music—and, more than that, to have it so thoroughly appreciated.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., DEC. 7, 1889.

The programme of the last symphony concert was exceedingly interesting in many ways. In the first place, it was the modern counterpart of the recent programme which consisted of three classical symphonies. The composers represented on the present occasion were Weber, the pioneer of the romantic school, Brahms, the greatest of living musicians, Liszt and Wagner, the chief exponents of the "music of the future." And the works chosen were thoroughly representative of their respective authors, the overture to "Der Freischütz," the symphony in F, No. 3, the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to "Tannhaüser." Brahms' symphony in F is particularly interesting from the fact that it brings out in an unusually strong light qualities which many critics are accustomed to deny to this composer, geniality, grace and tenderness. The change from the usual order of the programme, the symphony being the second number instead of the last, was very gratifying. The symphony, being the most important work, should be given early in the evening, before the listener's power of attention has been seriously taxed, and should be followed by numbers which are not so severe in their demands upon the auditor. The playing of the orchestra was very spirited throughout, the first movement of the Brahms symphony being given with especially fine effect.

B. C. H.

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES

Monday Evening, Dec. 9, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Another superb attraction has been secured to appear at the Auditorium. Managers Quilp and Camp have made arrangements with the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of eighty eminent artists, Mr. Nikisch, who is at the head, as conductor. He was, until secured by Mr. Henry Higginson, a millionaire of Boston, Mass., one of Europe's greatest leaders. He has created much enthusiasm among the Eastern cities. His ideas are all new to the American people. When this same organization appeared here some time ago under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, everyone who heard it went into raptures over it. Even Damrosch and Thomas suffered to no little degree. One principal feature of the organization is that the same artists have been retained together for nine years. It is, without doubt, the most expensive orchestra in this country. The daily expense when traveling amounts to over one thousand dollars. Mr. Higginson, who is the founder, has placed $100,000 to their credit, so as to meet any loss that may occur. Being worth nearly $15,000,000, it is his hobby that Boston should have the greatest permanent orchestra in this country.

The Louisville Post.

MONDAY, - - - DEC. 9, 1889

THE papers yesterday had a good deal to say about the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a way that showed that they had that organization mixed up with the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. The latter consists of a half dozen admirable artists, who appear at Masonic Temple in a few weeks. The Symphony Orchestra is the large organization which is well-known here. It does not come till spring, and then will appear at the Norton Auditorium, under the direction of Herr Nikisch.

Boston Evening Transcript.
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the second in a series of three subscription concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall, Monday night, following this programme:

Quartet in D major, (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for Violin, "Benedictus," Op. 37, (Pianoforte accompaniment.) Mr. T. Adamowski.....Mackenzie
Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, in G Minor, Op. 15.....Rubinstein
Quartet—T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; D. Kuntz, viola; J. Adamowski, violoncello. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist.

What a unique charm there is in a concert of chamber music! It is not too long, nor too profound, not too grave, nor too gay to finish off any day or begin any evening with fine grace, to put one, in short in a capital frame of mind, whether he has come from facing the tiger or is going to face the lady. May it live long in the land and prosper!

Is there a composition of Mozart's that does not bear out Haydn's generalization—"The deep musical intelligence that emotion of the soul with which they affect me, and in which I both comprehend and feel them"? * * * Of the quartet in D major, one of the three written for Emperor Frederick William II., Otto John, who, by the way, was quoted upon the programme, says, "There is more stress laid upon elegance and clearness than upon depth or warmth of tone." The minuet is clear to the point of preciseness, and is wanting in that grace of dignity that would prevent many passages from being the pretty uninteresting writing that they are as they stand, but not so the dancers movements. What could be more exquisitely beautiful in tone than the andante? The splendid allegretto, too, surely it lacks nothing of force and vigor or warmth of color. Out of compliment to the emperor, who was something of a 'cellist, this and the other quartets written in the same year for Frederick William all make much of the 'cello, but not unduly. Mozart would not have been the artist that the world knows him if he had sacrificed the violins and viola at the shrine of the 'cello. He never forgets that he is writing a quartet, and not a solo instrument tune with an accompaniment.

Dr. Mackenzie's "Benedictus" is devotional in feeling, as its name implies; a melodious composition expressive of the sanctity of the inner peace of a religious soul and the elation of spirit that succeeds it. Mr. Adamowski's playing is so well and favorably known, there is little need be said here about it. Save for a slip in intonation once or twice, something most unusual, he played as he always does, charmingly. The composer has prepared an orchestral arrangement of the "Benedictus" that is announced for performance by the Orchestral Club at its first concert of the season.

The brilliant Rubinstein trio had a most enthusiastic reception at the hands of the audience. It was splendidly played throughout. Mr. J. Adamowski's 'cello work was especially fine. His tone is rich and pure, of the quality that inspires belief in the reserve power that lies behind it. He never once gives one the impression of playing all that is in him to say or in his instrument to translate. In the trio as well as in his solo, Mr. Adamowski's violin appeared a shade less tractable than ordinarily, but only less so. Mr. Johns's playing was full of fire and spirit, strong and sensitive withal He was a bit nervous at the end; but never mind—it was an altogether artistic conception, and extremely well executed.

Clipping from Times
Worcester Mass
Date 12/

CRITERION COURSE.

First Appearance of Mr. Nikisch in Worcester.

The Boston symphony orchestra opened the Criterion course last night. Although every seat in the hall was not filled, the attendance was large. The last time this famous orchestra appeared in Worcester it was under the direction of Welhelm Gericke, and the concert was given April 5, when Mr. Gericke made his last appearance here.

Mr. Nikisch was the centre of attraction last evening as it was his first appearance the opening piece was Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave." Mr. Nikisch assumed his place quietly, and without any preliminary gestures gave the signal for the grand overture. The music of last evening was all of a happy joyous strain.

The second number on the program was Chopin's Allego de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode. Miss Marie Gesselchap was the pianist. When she appeared, it was found that the piano stool had been forgotten, and the delay that followed was tedious. Finally a chair was substituted with a bass viol cover for a cushion. Her rendering of the difficult number was good but she did not do full justice to Chopin by any means. The orchestra gave admirable support.

Beekhoven's symphony, No, 8, in F. followed, being the largest number in the program. The opening was grand, the orchestra showing its full strength. Gradually they softened down to the most tender and beautiful tones, showing what a powerful test the conductor put them to. The first movement was an allegio vivace e con bird, the second an allegretto scherjando, and the third movement in tempodi minuetto, but the finale allegro vivace made a grand close The number was well received by the audience, and shows the grand poetic thoughts that diffuse the whole of Mr. Nikisch's work.

Miss Gesselchap followed with two solos for the piano, which were favourably received, a minuet of Paderereoky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Liszt.

The last number on the program was "Taunhause." The orchestra played the best it ever did in the rendering of this number, and showed the work of Mr. Nikisch. It was given a hearty encore by the audience.

Clipping from Star
Washington D.C.
Date 12/5

[38]

THE LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

The Opening of the New Resort to be Signalized by a Great Musical Event.

MRS. THURBER TAKES A HAND IN IT—THE PROCEEDS TO GO TO THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL—SOME FAMOUS ARTISTS WHO WILL APPEAR—MRS. THURBER'S VIEWS OF MISS DECCA.

The new Lincoln music hall will be opened on December 20 with a concert, which is designed to be a great musical and social event. Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, whose connection with musical interests during the last eighteen years has made her name familiar everywhere, will have charge of the concert. She was the founder of the National conservatory of music, which has done such splendid work in New York, and also organized the American opera company, which was run under her direction for several years. Her time is devoted almost entirely to music, and the amount of work she accomplishes to this end is really astonishing. Her secretary comes over from New York every morning to receive her instructions about the conservatory and her other New York interests, and she is in constant telegraphic communication with her agents and managers in different parts of the country. Mrs. Thurbur is a charming woman personally, and seems very young to have occupied the position she has for so long. Her hair, which she wears brushed back from her forehead, is but slightly tinged with gray.

MRS. THURBER'S ACCEPTANCE.

When the directors of the new music hall learned that Mrs. Thurber was here for a short visit they wisely decided that if they could interest her in the proposed opening it would surely be a great musical success. Accordingly they wrote to her and asked her if she would take charge of the matter and aid them in choosing the best talent obtainable. In answer to this Mrs. Thurber wrote: "I accept your request and ask in return that you will co-operate with me in making the financial result of the inaugural entertainment a substantial Christmas gift to the children's hospital."

At the last meeting of the board of managers of the children's hospital the offer was made that the performance should be given for the benefit of the hospital. This was immediately accepted and a resolution of thanks to Mrs. Thurber for her kindness in the matter was passed. Accordingly the entertainment will be given under the auspices of the board of lady visitors of the hospital and of a list of patrons and patronesses made up of prominent society people of the city.

PLANS FOR THE CONCERT.

This morning a STAR reporter called on Mrs. Thurber at the Shoreham to ascertain what furthur plans had been made for the concert. In answer to his questions Mrs. Thurber said: "A number of leading artists have promised to lend their assistance for the 20th of this month. As they are all busy people the concert will have to take place on that date, and so I hope the directors of the hall will hasten the completion of the building as rapidly as possible. The list of artists for the concert is, I think, a really remarkable one. First there is the Boston symphony orchestra, whose famous leader, Herr Nikisch, will make his Washington debut; M. Theophile Manoury, who will make his first American appearance; Rafael Joseffy, Mlle. Margulies, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, the great violinist, and Mr. Victor Herbert, the leading 'cello virtuoso in this country." Mrs. Thurber said that Joseffy was the only one on the list who had not been heard from accepting the invitation to take part in the performance, but that she felt sure his answer would be favorable. Miss Marie Decca has also been asked to take part and will in all probability do so. Mrs. Thurber said: "I have met Miss Decca and suggested to her that she should sing the duet from "Hamlet" with M. Manoury. She seemed very much pleased and accepted at once. M. Manoury is the most famous Hamlet in the world and the Washington Ophelia will be well supported. She will also sing a solo. I am sure that with a favorable opportunity Miss Decca will make a great success in the musical profession. Mlle. Alice Margulies, who is a professor in the national conservatory and a distinguished pianist, will make her Washington debut, probably in a duo with Joseffy. I have suggested to Herr Nikisch that the symphony orchestra should open the program with the overture of 'Egmont' from Bethoven, and this they will probably do."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889.

The Adamowski Concert.

The time is not so far back when chamber music languished so sadly in Boston that a society needed to be formed for its protection and cultivation; now we are so embarras de richesses in this direction that scarcely a week passes but there are two or three chamber concerts of high rank given in the city. Within a very few days we have heard the Kneisel Quartette, the Listemann Quartette and the Baermann chamber concert, all of which were of the first rank, and the concert of last night was not on a lower level.

Mr. Timothée Adamowski has been a favorite with Boston concert goers ever since he settled in the city, and his style of work scarcely needs description. He is a refined, rather than a massive or broad performer, and his expressive tone and delicacy of shading have always a peculiar charm. While he fills the leading part in the quartette, his brother, who has but this season arrived from Poland, is the bass of the organization, and the interior parts are also well filled. Competition is said to be the life of trade; it may also be said to be a potent factor in the advancement of art, for since the various concerts spoken of above began their succession, the rehearsing of the clubs and organizations has been more incessant than ever before, and the result is evident in better performances than last season. This fact was distinctly noticeable in the ensemble of the quartette last night. There is a marked improvement in the ensemble and in the elasticity of playing. The Mozart quartette in D major, which began the programme, was excellently played, as a whole, spite of a few faults in the trio of the minuet. The tone was never overforced, yet never thin; and the balance was commendable.

In the andante the first violin has most prominent work to do, in a sort of dialogue with cello, and subsequently with viola, and here Mr. Adamowski played with a daintiness and grace that left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Kuntz and Mr. J. Adamowski must also be commended for the manner in which the responsive phrases were given. But in the trio of the next movement, the two last named made many slips of intonation. The finale was given with much spirit, the cello doing some good work, especially in the rising sequences. Mackenzies "Benedictus" is an emotional, semi-sacred violin solo, and has so much of direct and beautiful melody that it is as sure to win the suffrages of an audience as Raffs' "Cavatina" itself, although it has not quite so well worked up a climax as the latter. Mr. Adamowski played it with heart and soul, and aroused the audience gathered in Steinert Hall to real enthusiasm. I have never heard him do anything so lofty and solid before, and although perhaps the vibrato was too constantly employed, the excellent tone he evoked from the G string was something that Sarasate himself might copy.

It is a delight to watch, from concert to concert, the development of some conscientious, resident player, and the advance which I have noticed in Mr. Adamowski's work was yet more perceptible in the piano playing of Mr. Clayton Johns. Never before has he played with as much abandon, yet with such surety, as he did in the trio (Rubinstein's G minor) last night; the third movement of this gave much prominence to the piano from beginning to end, and he caught up the dashing passages in wrist action with masterly effect. This same third movement is the most original of the work, of which the first movement seemed artificial, and the last rather bombastic. In the last movement the pianist made a few unimportant slips and blurs, possibly from fatigue, but his work on the whole was most praiseworthy. The adagio suited Mr. Adamowski's mood best, and the first violin part here was entirely admirable. The codas of the movements all have a family resemblance to each other in their fortissimo effects, and the composition, as almost all of Rubinstein's, is unequal. The great advance made by the Adamowski quartette over their work of last season is again to be complimented, and there is no fear of chamber music ever giving out in Boston with such excellent organizations to sustain it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 13, 1889

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CAMBRIDGE.

The second concert of the series was given in Sanders Theatre last night to as large an audience as at the first, with perhaps more of a contingent from Boston than before. The programme was:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and he played the Lalo symphony better than two years ago; the charming last movement was even more fascinating, and the artist was properly rewarded with four recalls. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was the chief novelty under Mr. Nikisch, although it is in the programme this week, also, in Boston. It was done in a way that proved a performance and not a rehearsal. The Beethoven symphony is still in the minds of the Boston auditors, and the doing was fully as admirable as before. The advantage of the smaller hall is marked in a degree, and it will be a surprise if Mr. Nikisch does not make use of the pianoforte for the solo work in one of this series of concerts, as it is much surer of fine effect than in the larger Boston Music Hall, where the best instrument, aside from the performers, even, loses much that is desirable. To the true lover of music, the very short pilgrimage to Sanders Theatre will always be more than amply repaid, and unless the house is far more crowded than last night he will find it well worth his while.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S SECOND CONCERT.

In spite of the many opposing attractions of a Monday night, there was a very representative audience in Steinert Hall for the second concert of the Adamowski Quartet series, and the following interesting programme was performed:

Quartet in D major (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for violin, "Benedictus," op. 37, with pianoforte accompaniment. Mackenzie (First time in Boston.) Mr. T. Adamowski.
Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, in G minor, op. 15.....Rubinstein
Mr. Clayton Johns and Messrs. Adamowski.

The quartet have made a very marked improvement since their first concert, and their work last night bears the mark of careful rehearsal. They have gained in delicacy of tone, and the phrasing was exceedingly artistic. The plan of placing the 'cello in front, opposite the first violin, is not entirely successful, as it gives too much prominence to the b ass part. This might be easily remedied. The quartet was indeed beautifully played, and Mr. Adamowski deserves the highest praise for the admirable work of his quartet. The "Benedictus" by Mackenzie is a very eclectic work, as so many of the modern English compositions are apt to be. It recalls a dozen different composers, but it is effective and melodious, if not original. It was most beautifully played by Mr. Adamowski, and most artistically accompanied by Mr. Johns. The whole of the first part is on the G string, and Mr. Adamowski played this with a splendidly rich and warm tone. The whole rendering was admirable. The trio is one of the most genial of all Rubinstein's compositions; there is no sense of labored thought in its flowing phrases, and it is singularly sympathetic. Its performance by Mr. Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski was more than satisfactory; and all three artists richly deserved the warm applause which marked the end of the concert. It is very gratifying to have so much admirable chamber music--and, more than that, to have it so thoroughly appreciated.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., DEC. 7, 1889.

The programme of the last symphony concert was exceedingly interesting in many ways. In the first place, it was the modern counterpart of the recent programme which consisted of three classical symphonies. The composers represented on the present occasion were Weber, the pioneer of the romantic school, Brahms, the greatest of living musicians, Liszt and Wagner, the chief exponents of the "music of the future." And the works chosen were thoroughly representative of their respective authors, the overture to "Der Freischütz," the symphony in F, No. 3, the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Brahms' symphony in F is particularly interesting from the fact that it brings out in an unusually strong light qualities which many critics are accustomed to deny to this composer, geniality, grace and tenderness. The change from the usual order of the programme, the symphony being the second number instead of the last, was very gratifying. The symphony, being the most important work, should be given early in the evening, before the listener's power of attention has been seriously taxed, and should be followed by numbers which are not so severe in their demands upon the auditor. The playing of the orchestra was very spirited throughout, the first movement of the Brahms symphony being given with especially fine effect. B. C. H.

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES

Monday Evening, Dec. 9, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Another superb attraction has been secured to appear at the Auditorium. Managers Quilp and Camp have made arrangements with the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of eighty eminent artists, Mr. Nikisch, who is at the head, as conductor. He was, until secured by Mr. Henry Higginson, a millionaire of Boston, Mass., one of Europe's greatest leaders. He has created much enthusiasm among the Eastern cities. His ideas are all new to the American people. When this same organization appeared here some time ago under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, everyone who heard it went into raptures over it. Even Damrosch and Thomas suffered to no little degree. One principal feature of the organization is that the same artists have been retained together for nine years. It is, without doubt, the most expensive orchestra in this country. The daily expense when traveling amounts to over one thousand dollars. Mr. Higginson, who is the founder, has placed $100,000 to their credit, so as to meet any loss that may occur. Being worth nearly $15,000,000, it is his hobby that Boston should have the greatest permanent orchestra in this country.

The Louisville Post.

MONDAY, - - - DEC. 9, 1889

THE papers yesterday had a good deal to say about the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a way that showed that they had that organization mixed up with the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. The latter consists of a half dozen admirable artists, who appear at Masonic Temple in a few weeks. The Symphony Orchestra is the large organization which is well-known here. It does not come till spring, and then will appear at the Norton Auditorium, under the direction of Herr Nikisch.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

The Adamowski Quartet gave the second in a series of three subscription concerts of chamber music in Steinert Hall, Monday night, following this programme:

Quartet in D major. (K 575).....Mozart
Solo for Violin. "Benedictus." Op. 37. (Pianoforte accompaniment.) Mr. T. Adamowski.....Mackenzie
Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, in G Minor. Op. 15.....Rubinstein

Quartet—T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; D. Kuntz, viola; J. Adamowski, violoncello. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist.

What a unique charm there is in a concert of chamber music! It is not too long, nor too profound, not too grave, nor too gay to finish off any day or begin any evening with fine grace, to put one, in short in a capital frame of mind, whether he has come from facing the tiger or is going to face the lady. May it live long in the land and prosper!

Is there a composition of Mozart's that does not bear out Haydn's generalization—"The deep musical intelligence that emotion of the soul with which they affect me, and in which I both comprehend and feel them"? * * * Of the quartet in D major, one of the three written for Emperor Frederick William II., Otto John, who, by the way, was quoted upon the programme, says, "There is more stress laid upon elegance and clearness than upon depth or warmth of tone." The minuet is clear to the point of preciseness, and is wanting in that grace of dignity that would prevent many passages from being the pretty uninteresting writing that they are as they stand, but not so the ot her movements. What could be more exquisitely beautiful in tone than the andante? The splendid allegretto, too, surely it lacks nothing of force and vigor or warmth of color. Out of compliment to the emperor, who was something of a 'cellist, this and the other quartets written in the same year for Frederick William all make much of the 'cello, but not unduly. Mozart would not have been the artist that the world knows him if he had sacrificed the violins and viola at the shrine of the 'cello. He never forgets that he is writing a quartet, and not a solo instrument tune with an accompaniment.

Dr. Mackenzie's "Benedictus" is devotional in feeling, as its name implies; a melodious composition expressive of the sanctity of the inner peace of a religious soul and the elation of spirit that succeeds it. Mr. Adamowski's playing is so well and favorably known, there is little need be said here about it. Save for a slip in intonation once or twice, something most unusual, he played as he always does, charmingly. The composer has prepared an orchestral arrangement of the "Benedictus" that is announced for performance by the Orchestral Club at its first concert of the season.

The brilliant Rubinstein trio had a most enthusiastic reception at the hands of the audience. It was splendidly played throughout. Mr. J. Adamowski's 'cello work was especially fine. His tone is rich and pure, of the quality that inspires belief in the reserve power that lies behind it. He never once gives one the impression of playing all that is in him to say or in his instrument to translate. In the trio as well as in his solo, Mr. Adamowski's violin appeared a shade less tractable than ordinarily, but only less so. Mr. Johns's playing was full of fire and spirit, strong and sensitive withal He was a bit nervous at the end; but never mind—it was an altogether artistic conception, and extremely well executed.

Clipping from Times
Worcester Mass
Date 12/1

CRITERION COURSE.

First Appearance of Mr. Nikisch in Worcester.

The Boston symphony orchestra opened the Criterion course last night. Although every seat in the hall was not filled, the attendance was large. The last time this famous orchestra appeared in Worcester it was under the direction of Welhelm Gericke, and the concert was given April 5, when Mr. Gericke made his last appearance here.

Mr. Nikisch was the centre of attraction last evening as it was his first appearance the opening piece was Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave." Mr. Nikisch assumed his place quietly, and without any preliminary gestures gave the signal for the grand overture. The music of last evening was all of a happy joyous strain.

The second number on the program was Chopin's Allego de Concert, op. 46, with the orchestration of Nicode. Miss Marie Gesselchap was the pianist. When she appeared, it was found that the piano stool had been forgotten, and the delay that followed was tedious. Finally a chair was substituted with a bass viol cover for a cushion. Her rendering of the difficult number was good but she did not do full justice to Chopin by any means. The orchestra gave admirable support.

Beelthoven's symphony, No, 8, in F. followed, being the largest number in the program. The opening was grand, the orchestra showing its full strength. Gradually they softened down to the most tender and beautiful tones, showing what a powerful test the conductor put them to. The first movement was an allegio vivace e con bird, the second an allegretto scherjando, and the third movement in tempodi minuetto, but the finale allegro vivace made a grand close The number was well received by the audience, and shows the grand poetic thoughts that diffuse the whole of Mr. Nikisch's work.

Miss Gesselchap followed with two solos for the piano, which were favourably received, a minuet of Padererosky and a "Rigoletto" fantasie of Liszt.

The last number on the program was "Taunhause." The orchestra played the best it ever did in the rendering of this number, and showed the work of Mr. Nikisch. It was given a hearty encore by the audience.

Clipping from Star
Washington D.C.
Date 12/5

[38]

THE LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

The Opening of the New Resort to be Signalized by a Great Musical Event.

MRS. THURBER TAKES A HAND IN IT—THE PROCEEDS TO GO TO THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL—SOME FAMOUS ARTISTS WHO WILL APPEAR—MRS. THURBER'S VIEWS OF MISS DECCA.

The new Lincoln music hall will be opened on December 20 with a concert, which is designed to be a great musical and social event. Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, whose connection with musical interests during the last eighteen years has made her name familiar everywhere, will have charge of the concert. She was the founder of the National conservatory of music, which has done such splendid work in New York, and also organized the American opera company, which was run under her direction for several years. Her time is devoted almost entirely to music, and the amount of work she accomplishes to this end is really astonishing. Her secretary comes over from New York every morning to receive her instructions about the conservatory and her other New York interests, and she is in constant telegraphic communication with her agents and managers in different parts of the country. Mrs. Thurbur is a charming woman personally, and seems very young to have occupied the position she has for so long. Her hair, which she wears brushed back from her forehead, is but slightly tinged with gray.

MRS. THURBER'S ACCEPTANCE.

When the directors of the new music hall learned that Mrs. Thurber was here for a short visit they wisely decided that if they could interest her in the proposed opening it would surely be a great musical success. Accordingly they wrote to her and asked her if she would take charge of the matter and aid them in choosing the best talent obtainable. In answer to this Mrs. Thurber wrote: "I accept your request and ask in return that you will co-operate with me in making the financial result of the inaugural entertainment a substantial Christmas gift to the children's hospital."

At the last meeting of the board of managers of the children's hospital the offer was made that the performance should be given for the benefit of the hospital. This was immediately accepted and a resolution of thanks to Mrs. Thurber for her kindness in the matter was passed. Accordingly the entertainment will be given under the auspices of the board of lady visitors of the hospital and of a list of patrons and patronesses made up of prominent society people of the city.

PLANS FOR THE CONCERT.

This morning a STAR reporter called on Mrs. Thurber at the Shoreham to ascertain what furthur plans had been made for the concert. In answer to his questions Mrs. Thurber said: "A number of leading artists have promised to lend their assistance for the 20th of this month. As they are all busy people the concert will have to take place on that date, and so I hope the directors of the hall will hasten the completion of the building as rapidly as possible. The list of artists for the concert is, I think, a really remarkable one. First there is the Boston symphony orchestra, whose famous leader, Herr Nikisch, will make his Washington debut; M. Theophile Manoury, who will make his first American appearance; Rafael Joseffy, Mlle. Margulies, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, the great violinist, and Mr. Victor Herbert, the leading 'cello virtuoso in this country." Mrs. Thurber said that Joseffy was the only one on the list who had not been heard from accepting the invitation to take part in the performance, but that she felt sure his answer would be favorable. Miss Marie Decca has also been asked to take part and will in all probability do so. Mrs. Thurber said: "I have met Miss Decca and suggested to her that she should sing the duet from "Hamlet" with M. Manoury. She seemed very much pleased and accepted at once. M. Manoury is the most famous Hamlet in the world and the Washington Ophelia will be well supported. She will also sing a solo. I am sure that with a favorable opportunity Miss Decca will make a great success in the musical profession. Mlle. Alice Margulies, who is a professor in the national conservatory and a distingushed pianist, will make her Washington debut, probably in a duo with Joseffy. I have suggested to Herr Nikisch that the symphony orchestra should open the program with the overture of 'Egmont' from Bethoven, and this they will probably do."

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Genoveva."
LALO.	SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
WAGNER	PRELUDE. "Tristan and Isolde."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7 Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

SOLOIST:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 17th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

L[illegible]VILLE,
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1[illegible]

A UNIQUE ORGANIZATION.

The proposed visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is a matter of interest to lovers of good music who know what that organization is. A previous visit has paved the way for a warm reception on the part of all who attended that concert, and the orchestra is at present in a better condition than it has ever been before. Hitherto the fame and the work of this body have been confined to Boston and the East, but, while less widely known throughout the South and West than other organizations of the same character, it is generally conceded that in the class of compositions presented, as well as in the musicianly interpretation of the works, it stands at the head of orchestral organizations in this country. The orchestra was formed in 1881, through the personal influence and financial support of Mr. Henry Higginson, of Boston, who from that time has been a liberal patron and a faithful guardian of its interests from a purely artistic point of view. Constructed at first from such available material as could be found in Boston and New York, the orchestra has, in the eight years of its existence, accumulated the best players to be obtained, and these have had the advantage of continuous training by some of the ablest conductors who have ever been in this country. The first conductor was Mr. George Henschel, who was succeeded, in 1884, by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, of Vienna, an earnest and scholarly musician, who held the position for five years, and who will be pleasantly remembered as the director of the concert given in this city by the Boston Orchestra. When Mr. Gericke retired he left a body of eighty picked and thoroughly trained musicians who, under the leadership of the new director, present a splendid medium for the interpretation of the best music, both of the old and new composers.

The programmes of the concerts given in Boston show that a catholic spirit has been manifested in bringing before the public such works as were of interest, regardless of school or period, and the fact that the orchestra has in eight years become both an institution and a vogue in that city is ample proof of the admirable manner in which the works have been rendered. The new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, brings to his work youth, enthusiasm and originality—with a superb training and thorough knowledge of his art.

The repertoire of the orchestra includes all the best and most characteristic works of the later composers, and the opportunity to hear these compositions will be appreciated in Louisville, where conductors have generally shown a tendency to stick to the established classics that might be considered absolutely safe. We all know that Shakespeare's dramas are incomparable, but we do not care to see Hamlet every night in the week; and when a body of musicians capable of interpreting the best music comes to us, there is a very natural desire on the part of the public to know what the world of music has been doing since Beethoven wrote his Fifth Symphony, and Weber his "Invitation to the Dance."

There ought to be more than one concert. The opportunities to hear good music are not so frequent that the town can be surfeited by a single programme.

Clipping from Post
Washington D.C.
Date 12/5

39

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

Its Opening Will Be a Great Social and Artistic Event.

DECEMBER THE 20TH SELECTED

The Programme Will Be Participated In by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Theophile Manoury, Rafael Joseffy, Herbert Lichtenberg and Mlle. Margulies.

Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, the founder and president of the National Conservatory of Music, and whose name has been identified with other important musical movements, is in Washington, and is stopping at the Shoreham. Although here on a private visit, Mrs. Thurber spends a great deal of time in the management of the conservatory, and it would take several secretaries to answer letters that have already followed her here from persons desiring to enter the institution, and others who want advice on musical matters. Among the communications she has had from the Capital is the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 30, 1889.

MRS. JEANNETTE M. THURBER:

DEAR MADAM: We desire that Washington's new music hall shall be opened under the best auspices, and I therefore respectfully request, in behalf of the directors of the Lincoln Hall Association, that you will kindly take charge of the matter and aid us in choosing the best talent for the opening night.

Very respectfully,
FRED. W. PRATT,
Treas. of the Asso'n.

Mrs. Thurber has decided to undertake the management of the inaugural concert, as will be seen by the following reply which she had just written yesterday afternoon when a POST reporter called upon her:

To Mr. FRED. W. PRATT, treasurer, and the directors of the Lincoln Hall Association:

GENTLEMEN: I take great pleasure in answering your very courteous communication.

Washington's new Music Hall should never lack for an intelligent and appreciative audience.

I accept your request and ask in return that you will co-operate with me in making the financial result of the inaugural entertainment a substantial Christmas gift to the Children's Hospital.

It has been suggested that some of the members of the faculty of the National Conservatory should be the soloists in this progressive musical movement, and I would like to add a prominent local lady singer with the co-operation of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which would be a great feature of the programme.

Again thanking you for your courtesy,

Faithfully yours, JEANNETTE M. THURBER.

Mrs. Thurber said that she would open the hall on December 20, and added wisely that if the directors will push the work, so that it can be opened on that date, it will be a great benefit to them, as some of the best concert dates can then be filled.

"Have you visited the hall, Mrs. Thurber?" asked the reporter.

"No," she replied, "not as yet, but I understand that everything about the building will be in very good taste, and I know something of Mr. Franklin Langstaff, who has charge of the frescoing, and I am glad the directors have chosen him, not only because he is very capable, but also because he is a resident artist."

"What plans have you made for the inaugural programme?"

"Excepting the inaugural address, the programme will be entirely composed of vocal and instrumental music and will be the best that can be procured. The orchestra will be the best in the United States, the Boston Symphony, and the new and famous conductor, Herr Nikisch, who has earned a place in the great quartette of conductors—Richter, Levy, Motte, and Nikisch—will make his Washington debut. The soloists, my friends here have suggested to me, should be chosen from the faculty of the National Conservatory of Music."

"Whom will you choose?"

"First of all I have written to the new director of the singing classes. Monsiuer Theophile Manoury, for I should like him to make his first appearance in the United States on this occasion. The following letter from the great Composer Massenet will tell you all about him:

PARIS, September 15, 1889.

DEAR MADAM: I wish to tell you again how much I appreciate the choice which you have made in securing Monsieur Manoury as professor of singing in the National Conservatory of Music of America. M. Manoury was one of the most brilliant pupils of the Conservatory of Paris, where he took the first prize in singing in opera, in Opera Comique, and also first prize in Solfege. He is an excellent musician, and as a singer absolutely remarkable. I believe in his success as professor, and recall with pleasure his great success in opera in the principal opera houses of Europe. He is a man of perfect education, and I do not know how to congratulate you sufficiently upon his appointment.

Be pleased, dear madam, to receive the respectful and devoted homage of J. MASSENET.

To MRS. JEANNETTE M. THURBER, president of the National Conservatory of America.

"I have also communicated with the greatest of pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who is one of the hardest workers in the National Conservatory, and am now waiting his reply. Miss Adele Margulies, also a splendid professor and distinguished pianist, (and professor of Miss Mamie Morrice, Washington's representative pupil in the conservatory) will be heard for the first time here in a duo with Mr. Joseffy. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who to my mind is without an equal as violin professor and virtuoso in the country. Mr. Victor Herbert, whom the New York Evening Post speaks of as undoubtedly the best cello virtuoso in the country, will also be on the programme, and I hope with the aid of my friends in Washington to secure a local singer. I would suggest Miss Marie Decca."

"What will be the prices for this feast of music?"

"All arrangements will be announced in a few days, and as the programme will be an expensive one, and the financial outcome is to help a happy Christmas for the suffering children, I think the seats ought to be not less than $5 apiece on the floor, and I have already been asked to reserve several at that price, for my friends in Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, all lovers of music and children."

Mrs. Thurber's suggestion regarding Miss Decca, whom she has not heard either in opera or concert, and whom, indeed, she has never met, is the result of a desire to have this city represented on the programme. She is aware that Miss Decca was not altogether fortunate in her operatic experience in this country, but believes that if given an opportunity in concert she will be more successful.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Genoveva."
LALO.	SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
WAGNER	PRELUDE. "Tristan and Isolde."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7 Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

SOLOIST:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 17th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Courier-Journal.

LOUISVILLE,

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1889.

A UNIQUE ORGANIZATION.

The proposed visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is a matter of interest to lovers of good music who know what that organization is. A previous visit has paved the way for a warm reception on the part of all who attended that concert, and the orchestra is at present in a better condition than it has ever been before. Hitherto the fame and the work of this body have been confined to Boston and the East, but, while less widely known throughout the South and West than other organizations of the same character, it is generally conceded that in the class of compositions presented, as well as in the musicianly interpretation of the works, it stands at the head of orchestral organizations in this country. The orchestra was formed in 1881, through the personal influence and financial support of Mr. Henry Higginson, of Boston, who from that time has been a liberal patron and a faithful guardian of its interests from a purely artistic point of view. Constructed at first from such available material as could be found in Boston and New York, the orchestra has, in the eight years of its existence, accumulated the best players to be obtained, and these have had the advantage of continuous training by some of the ablest conductors who have ever been in this country. The first conductor was Mr. George Henschel, who was succeeded, in 1884, by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, of Vienna, an earnest and scholarly musician, who held the position for five years, and who will be pleasantly remembered as the director of the concert given in this city by the Boston Orchestra. When Mr. Gericke retired he left a body of eighty picked and thoroughly trained musicians who, under the leadership of the new director, present a splendid medium for the interpretation of the best music, both of the old and new composers.

The programmes of the concerts given in Boston show that a catholic spirit has been manifested in bringing before the public such works as were of interest, regardless of school or period, and the fact that the orchestra has in eight years become both an institution and a vogue in that city is ample proof of the admirable manner in which the works have been rendered. The new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, brings to his work youth, enthusiasm and originality—with a superb training and thorough knowledge of his art.

The repertoire of the orchestra includes all the best and most characteristic works of the later composers, and the opportunity to hear these compositions will be appreciated in Louisville, where conductors have generally shown a tendency to stick to the established classics that might be considered absolutely safe. We all know that Shakespeare's dramas are incomparable, but we do not care to see Hamlet every night in the week; and when a body of musicians capable of interpreting the best music comes to us, there is a very natural desire on the part of the public to know what the world of music has been doing since Beethoven wrote his Fifth Symphony, and Weber his "Invitation to the Dance."

There ought to be more than one concert. The opportunities to hear good music are not so frequent that the town can be surfeited by a single programme.

Clipping from Post Washington D.C.

Date 12/5

[39]

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

Its Opening Will Be a Great Social and Artistic Event.

DECEMBER THE 20TH SELECTED

The Programme Will Be Participated In by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Theophile Manoury, Rafael Joseffy, Herbert Lichtenberg and Mlle. Margulies.

Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, the founder and president of the National Conservatory of Music, and whose name has been identified with other important musical movements, is in Washington, and is stopping at the Shoreham. Although here on a private visit, Mrs. Thurber spends a great deal of time in the management of the conservatory, and it would take several secretaries to answer letters that have already followed her here from persons desiring to enter the institution, and others who want advice on musical matters. Among the communications she has had from the Capital is the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 30, 1889.

MRS. JEANNETTE M. THURBER:

DEAR MADAM: We desire that Washington's new music hall shall be opened under the best auspices, and I therefore respectfully request, in behalf of the directors of the Lincoln Hall Association, that you will kindly take charge of the matter and aid us in choosing the best talent for the opening night.

Very respectfully, FRED. W. PRATT,
Treas. of the Asso'n.

Mrs. Thurber has decided to undertake the management of the inaugural concert, as will be seen by the following reply which she had just written yesterday afternoon when a POST reporter called upon her:

To Mr. FRED. W. PRATT, treasurer, and the directors of the Lincoln Hall Association:

GENTLEMEN: I take great pleasure in answering your very courteous communication.

Washington's new Music Hall should never lack for an intelligent and appreciative audience.

I accept your request and ask in return that you will co-operate with me in making the financial result of the inaugural entertainment a substantial Christmas gift to the Children's Hospital.

It has been suggested that some of the members of the faculty of the National Conservatory should be the soloists in this progressive musical movement, and I would like to add a prominent local lady singer with the co-operation of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which would be a great feature of the programme.

Again thanking you for your courtesy,

Faithfully yours. JEANNETTE M. THURBER.

Mrs. Thurber said that she would open the hall on December 20, and added wisely that if the directors will push the work, so that it can be opened on that date, it will be a great benefit to them, as some of the best concert dates can then be filled.

"Have you visited the hall, Mrs. Thurber?" asked the reporter.

"No," she replied, "not as yet, but I understand that everything about the building will be in very good taste, and I know something of Mr. Franklin Langstaff, who has charge of the frescoing, and I am glad the directors have chosen him, not only because he is very capable, but also because he is a resident artist."

"What plans have you made for the inaugural programme?"

"Excepting the inaugural address, the programme will be entirely composed of vocal and instrumental music and will be the best that can be procured. The orchestra will be the best in the United States, the Boston Symphony, and the new and famous conductor, Herr Nikisch, who has earned a place in the great quartette of conductors—Richter, Levy, Motte, and Nikisch—will make his Washington debut. The soloists my friends here have suggested to me, should be chosen from the faculty of the National Conservatory of Music."

"Whom will you choose?"

"First of all I have written to the new director of the singing classes, Monsieur Theophile Manoury, for I should like him to make his first appearance in the United States on this occasion. The following letter from the great Composer Massenet will tell you all about him:

PARIS, September 15, 1889.

DEAR MADAM: I wish to tell you again how much I appreciate the choice which you have made in securing Monsieur Manoury as professor of singing in the National Conservatory of Music of America. M. Manoury was one of the most brilliant pupils of the Conservatory of Paris, where he took the first prize in singing in opera, in Opera Comique, and also first prize in Solfege. He is an excellent musician, and as a singer absolutely remarkable. I believe in his success as professor, and recall with pleasure his great success in opera in the principal opera houses of Europe. He is a man of perfect education, and I do not know how to congratulate you sufficiently upon his appointment.

Be pleased, dear madam, to receive the respectful and devoted homage of J. MASSENET.

To Mrs. JEANNETTE M. THURBER, president of the National Conservatory of America.

"I have also communicated with the greatest of pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who is one of the hardest workers in the National Conservatory, and am now waiting his reply. Miss Adele Margulies, also a splendid professor and distinguished pianist, (and professor of Miss Mamie Morrice, Washington's representative pupil in the conservatory) will be heard for the first time here in a duo with Mr. Joseffy. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who to my mind is without an equal as violin professor and virtuoso in the country. Mr. Victor Herbert, whom the New York Evening Post speaks of as undoubtedly the best cello virtuoso in the country, will also be on the programme, and I hope with the aid of my friends in Washington to secure a local singer. I would suggest Miss Marie Decca."

"What will be the prices for this feast of music?"

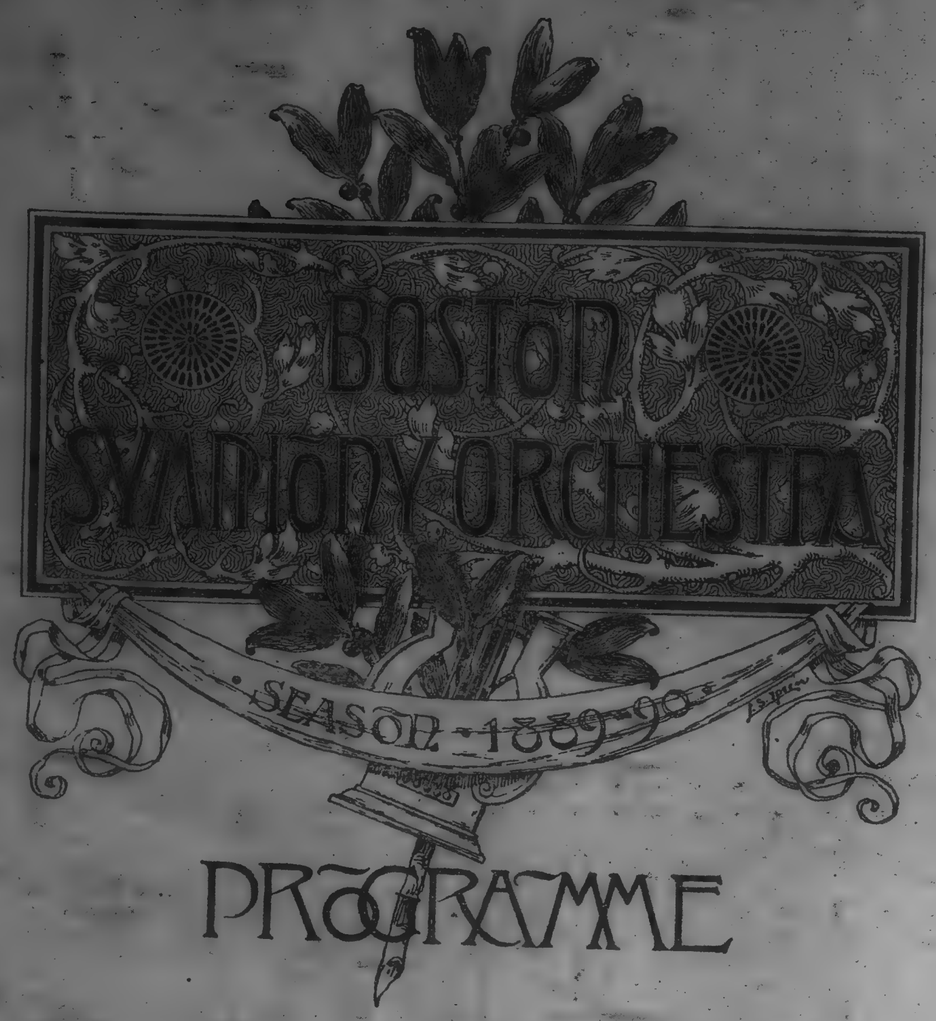
"All arrangements will be announced in a few days, and as the programme will be an expensive one, and the financial outcome is to help a happy Christmas for the suffering children, I think the seats ought to be not less than $5 apiece on the floor, and I have already been asked to reserve several at that price, for my friends in Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, all lovers of music and children."

Mrs. Thurber's suggestion regarding Miss Decca, whom she has not heard either in opera or concert, and whom, indeed, she has never met, is the result of a desire to have this city represented on the programme. She is aware that Miss Decca was not altogether fortunate in her operatic experience in this country, but believes that if given an opportunity in concert she will be more successful.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HYPERION THEATRE, NEW HAVEN.

Monday Evening, Dec. 16th, at 8.



PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1888-89.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 31, at 7 P.M. Old Colony Depot.
Arrive in Brooklyn, Monday, April 1, at 8 A.M.
HOTELS Mansion, St. George and Pierrepont.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Brooklyn Tuesday, April 2 at 8.30 A.M., via Annex Boat.
Arrive in Philadelphia at 11.40 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Wednesday, April 3, at 9.40 A M
Arrive New York at 11.50 A.M.
Leave New York at 3 P.M. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive in Hartford at 6 P.M.
SUPPER, UNITED STATES HOTEL.
Sleeping Cars will be ready directly after Concert.
Arrive in Boston, Thursday, April 4, at 8 A.M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Leave Boston for Fitchburg, Thursday, April 4, at 3 P.M. Fitchburg R. R. Depot.
SUPPER, FITCHBURG HOTEL.
Special Train leaves directly after Concert.

Leave Boston for Worcester, Friday, April 5, at 4.30, P.M. Boston and Albany Depot.
Special Train leaves directly after Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[40]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SPRING TOUR, 1889.

HOTEL LIST.

W. Gericke.	Fiumara.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel.	Simpson.
C. A. Ellis. / F. R. Comee.	Sautet. / Lafricain.	E. M. Heindl. / Goldstein.
F. Kneisel.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Schormann. / Schumann.
Adamowski. / Loeffler.	Nichols. / Greene.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Giese.	Goldie. / Schuecker.	Gerhardt. / Hampe.
Mole.	Kneer. / Knecht.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Muller, P.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Roth. / Behr.	Metzger. / Gunzel.	Nightingale. / Field.
Svecenski. / Zach.	J. E. Eichler. / Tischer-Zeitz.	Sailer. / F. Muller.
Kuntz. / Marquardt.	Mingels. / E. Loeffler.	Post. / Taubert.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Kluge. / Michael.	McKenzie. / Johnson.
J. Akeroyd. / E. Akeroyd.
Stewart. / Marble.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1888-89.

Leave Boston Monday, March 11, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Sleeping cars ready directly after Concert.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Mar. 12.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Steinway Hall, 11 A. M.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, March 13, at 9 A. M., via Pennsylvania Railroad.
Arrive Philadelphia 11.40 A. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
2d Concert at Academy of Music Thursday, March 14, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Friday, March 15, 8.20 A. M.
Arrive New York 10.20 A. M.
Leave New York 1 P. M. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive New London 4.20 P. M.
Leave New London 5.30 P. M.
Arrive Norwich 6.00 P. M.
SUPPER WAUREGAN HOTEL.
Special Train directly after Concert to New London, where sleeping cars will be ready.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, March 11, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HYPERION THEATRE, NEW HAVEN.

Monday Evening, Dec. 16th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1888-89.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 31, at 7 P.M. Old Colony Depot.
Arrive in Brooklyn, Monday, April 1, at 8 A.M.
HOTELS Mansion, St. George and Pierrepont.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Brooklyn Tuesday, April 2 at 8.30 A.M., via Annex Boat.
Arrive in Philadelphia at 11.40 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Wednesday, April 3, at 9.40 A.M.
Arrive New York at 11.50 A.M.
Leave New York at 3 P.M. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive in Hartford at 6 P.M.
SUPPER, UNITED STATES HOTEL.
Sleeping Cars will be ready directly after Concert.
Arrive in Boston, Thursday, April 4, at 8 A.M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Leave Boston for Fitchburg, Thursday, April 4, at 3 P.M. Fitchburg R. R. Depot.
SUPPER, FITCHBURG HOTEL.
Special Train leaves directly after Concert.

Leave Boston for Worcester, Friday, April 5, at 4.30, P.M. Boston and Albany Depot.
Special Train leaves directly after Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SPRING TOUR, 1889.

HOTEL LIST.

W. Gericke.	Fiumara.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel.	Simpson.
C. A. Ellis. / F. R. Comee.	Sautet. / Lafricain.	E. M. Heindl. / Goldstein.
F. Kneisel.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Schormann. / Schumann.
Adamowski. / Loeffler.	Nichols. / Greene.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Giese.	Goldie. / Schuecker.	Gerhardt. / Hampe.
Mole.	Kneer. / Knecht.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Muller, P.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Roth. / Behr.	Metzger. / Gunzel.	Nightingale. / Field.
Svecenski. / Zach.	J. E. Eichler. / Tischer-Zeitz.	Sailer. / F. Muller.
Kuntz. / Marquardt.	Mingels. / E. Loeffler.	Post. / Taubert.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Kluge. / Michael.	McKenzie. / Johnson.
J. Akeroyd. / E. Akeroyd.
Stewart. / Marble.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1888-89.

Leave Boston Monday, March 11, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Sleeping cars ready directly after Concert.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Mar. 12.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Steinway Hall, 11 A. M.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, March 13, at 9 A. M., via Pennsylvania Railroad.
Arrive Philadelphia 11.40 A. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
2d Concert at Academy of Music Thursday, March 14, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Friday, March 15, 8.20 A. M.
Arrive New York 10.20 A. M.
Leave New York 1 P. M. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive New London 4.20 P. M.
Leave New London 5.30 P. M.
Arrive Norwich 6.00 P. M.
SUPPER WAUREGAN HOTEL.
Special Train directly after Concert to New London, where sleeping cars will be ready.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, March 11, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1889

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours"
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D, op. 77
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (Unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

It would have been well if the Beethoven overture had been omitted; as it was the concert was too long.

Two of the numbers were heard here for the first time. The "Bear" symphony, so-called according to Pohl on account of the "Bear-bass" with which the final movement opens, was written for a society at Paris; with the exception of the last movement, it was not interesting. It was played with much clearness; it is a question, however, whether the pains taken were worth the trouble, for the themes themselves are commonplace, nor is the contrapuntal treatment unusual. Mr. Kneisel did all that is in the power of man to make the Brahms concerto an attractive number. Never did he play better both as a virtuoso and a musician. Yet the richness of his tone, the ease and sureness of his execution, the musical intelligence and the modest and necessary subordination of self,—all these qualities so marked in his playing could not save the concerto from the verdict, that it is upon the whole a long and dull composition. It is true that, particularly in the first movement, there are beautiful moments, but as Rossini said of the music of Wagner, "What dreadful half-hours!" If this be "subjective" music, let us have something "objective," even though it approach triviality. The oboe solo with which the adagio opens has been called "delicious"; it was certainly beautifully played by Mr. Sautet, and it would be a delight to hear that gentleman practise the scales; for whatever he does is beautiful both in idea and the carrying of it out; but as for the air itself,—well, there are very worthy people who say they enjoy every line of "Sordello." The hearty and spontaneous applause which was given to Mr. Kneisel was surely more for him as a man and as a musician than for the work itself; though there are possibly among us people who think they show both quality and breeding by loudly praising what they neither enjoy nor understand.

The "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, which was put upon a program early in the season and was removed for a singular reason, has at last been played. It would seem as though the postponement and long delay had fretted the nerves of the members of the orchestra; for there were several inexcusable blunders in the performance. Such slips could be excused in an amateur orchestra; they were certainly unworthy of the orchestra which Mr. Nikisch in October pronounced the third best in the world, only surpassed by the orchestras in two towns of Saxony. Yet even these blunders could not destroy the unearthly beauty of the symphony. How wonderful is the coloring of the instrumentation. "With a few "horn-progressions," with here and there a short clarinet or oboe solo supported by the simplest and most natural accompaniment, Schubert produces orchestral effects which no raffinement of Wagner-like instrumentation approaches." Perhaps it is well that Schubert never finished it. There is a pleasure in imagining what Schubert might have written. It is a fragment, as Keat's "Hyperion"; as "Dennis Duval"; as the romance of Hawthorne, "the unfinished window in Aladdin's palace."

Clipping from Register
New Haven Conn
Date 12/7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is definitely engaged for Friday, May 16, '90. This orchestra is one of the most brilliant concert orchestras in the world, and under the lead of their new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nickesch, the musicians seem to have gained an enthusiam which makes their playing a revelation. The members play con amore, and the spectacle of a conductor directing everything from memory is an inspiration in itself. The enterprise of the University Musical Society in securing so great an attraction should be recognized and supported by our citizens for several reasons. It is in the first place a distinct advantage to both the city and University, for the class of citizens and students who look at the possibilities of the artistic culture afforded by a city or institution before making a decision regarding residence, contributes an element of strength rather than weakness. Moreover, it is a great privilege to hear such a concert as is possible only in the larger cities. Again if the series is a success it will be perpetuated in coming years and will most assuredly make an impression for good. The society is anxious that the citizens and students should have the best talent that can be secured and consequently we insist that those who have not taken associate membership tickets should do so at once. It will require the sale of 100 tickets to make the society secure financially. Another sale of more than this number will make possible still another concert of the highest grade. Send in your name and membership fees of $2.00 to Prof. Stanley who will see that a ticket is mailed immediately.

Clipping from Advertiser
New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch has arranged to give four concerts at Steinway hall, on the following Tuesday evenings: December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18. This orchestra is the only one in the United States organized and maintained all the year round, and has, on the occasions of its former visits to this city under Mr. Gericke, proved itself to be one of the finest bands in the country, exciting widespread and lively interest among all New York music lovers by reason of its finished and meritorious performances. Mr. Nikisch, who will make his first appearance here on these occasions, enjoys not only a great European reputation, but also one already acquired in Boston. Undoubtedly these four concerts will be a feature of our musical season, and if only half of the encomiums that have found their way from Boston to New York be true, much enjoyment may be expected from the series now arranged. The subscription sale opened this morning.

Times
Phil. Pa.
12/7

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the opening of the series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday, December 18. On this occasion Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia.

Clipping from Journal
New York N. Y.
Date 12/11

The Quartet Concerts at the Institute will be the same as before.

Boston Symphony Concerts.—The next event of musical interest after the Sarasaté-d'Albert concerts will be these four concerts—Tuesday evenings, December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18—at Steinway Hall. Arthur Nikisch has already been placed by the Bostonians upon the same pedestal with Levy, Mottl and Richter. Whether in the estimation of New Yorkers he will equal Thomas and Seidl remains to be seen. So much has been said of him that little of interest remains to be told. His chief fame as conductor was gained at the New Opera at Leipsic, where his orchestra soon equalled the Gewandhaus orchestra. He has received orders and decorations from all parts of Germany. The very high standard maintained by the Boston orchestra under Gericke, and at present under Nikisch, will doubtless ensure a full attendance at the coming concerts.

The concert in aid of the Beethoven bi[illegible]

Clipping from Express
New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The many delighted attendants at the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in previous years will welcome with pleasure the announcement of four concerts to be given at Steinway Hall during the present season by the same organization. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will be remembered, is the only orchestra in the United States organized and maintained during the entire year for the daily performance of symphonic and high-class music; and, furthermore, its concerts are the only orchestral concerts that will be given in New York this season outside of those arranged by the Philharmonic and Symphonic societies. They will enlist the services of eighty-two performers under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The concerts given by the orchestra in Boston have been unprecedentedly successful. The subscription sale for the New York concert begins at Steinway Hall to-day, and the dates fixed are December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18.

NEW HAVEN EVE
THE REGISTER.
DECEMBER 12, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

HYPERION THEATER.

MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 16.

First Appearance of the Celebrated Conductor,
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

SOLOIST:
Mr. ANTON HEKKING.

PROGRAMME—Overture, "Euryanthi," Weber. Fantasie for 'Cello, "O, Cara Memoria," Servais. Symphony No. 3, Beethoven. Soli for 'Cello (a) Traumerei, Schumann (b) Papillon, Popper. Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, Liszt.

Season Tickets for the series of four Concerts $5. The sale of single tickets opens Thursday, Dec. 12, at Steinerts' Music Store.

dll 5dlSu C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and will prove a treat to all lovers of music. The concert will be given under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, a instructor of acknowledged ability, and the artists who are to take part have been long known to the musical world as among the best in their line.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1889.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last evening's symphony concert, the soloist in which was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, was of too important a feature for such brief notice as the pressure of advertising today would render necessary. It will be criticised at length in the next issue of THE TIMES.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Mozart, Mackenzie and Rubinstein were the composers for the second concert of the season by the Adamowski quartette in Steinert hall Monday evening. The Mozart quartette in D major is one of a collection of three written for Frederic William in 1789. It was earnestly played, yet, until the last movement, much of the expression was too impassioned and withal too fiery to be in any way true to the Mozartean simplicity of the music. The performance of the final allegro was just what it should have been, and its thematic details were set forth with admirable clearness and fidelity.

Mr. Adamowski played the "Benedictus" by Mackenzie with a warmth of tone and poetic feeling that were highly effective in their justice to an unpretentiously well-made and artistic composition. With the Rubinstein trio in G minor Mr. Clayton Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski were all praiseworthy, Mr. Johns doing much excellent work and in a very sincere, discriminating and able manner.

Clipping from Times
New Haven Conn
Date 12/10

[illegible]emory.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The lists for the Boston Symphony concerts at Steinert's are already very large, and the first concert on Monday night, December 16, will undoubtedly be attended by a big audience. The reputation of this company renders praise unnecessary, and the fact that nearly all of the tickets have been subscribed for will not cause surprise. A few subscriptions may be placed at Steinert's, and the sale of the remaining single seats will open on Thursday.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER.
DECEMBER 14, 1889.

The sale of seats for the Boston symphony concert, at the Hyperion, next Monday evening, has been very large, and the orchestra will be greeted by an audience it deesrves. This will be the first opportunity granted to New Haven people to see the brilliant young conductor, Mr. Nikisch. The concert will be an event to be enjoyed by all lovers of music who attend.

The engagement of "One of the Finest" closes at the Grand to-night. The

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1889.

[41]

Second Kneisel Concert.

NOT so well filled was Chickering Hall as for other concerts of this series, but nevertheless well occupied. From the quartet, Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Hehking, we had only one number, Schubert's beautiful D minor Quartet, composed when he was only twenty-nine, and using with such effect his Death-song.

Rose Stewart sang, in a sweet, unconstrained way, three songs: Au die Tauben, by Brahms; Liszt's Loreley; and a charming cradle song by Liszt. It did not enhance the beauty of her singing that she played her own accompaniments, though she did so very cleverly; and it was annoying to have a long wait while one piano was removed, by the sliding door and the elevator, and another brought up.

The larger had been played by Mr. Foote in his new Sonata for Violin and Piano, op. 20, written last summer, and now given for the first time in public. The whole work is interesting, but the second movement is a gem, the Siciliano. The programme sketch is as follows:

The first movement, in G minor, 9-8 time, opens immediately with the principal theme, given out by the violin ff. After a complete statement of it thus, and a little episodical matter, it comes once again briefly, this time by the pianoforte. A few more bars, and the quieter and more melodic subject in B-flat major is reached. This is at first put quite plainly, in the violin, with simple pianoforte accompaniment; but as it proceeds further, the accompaniment becomes more elaborate, the two instruments working together to a climax ff. Then comes the working-out section of the movement, which is entirely contructed out of parts of the first and second themes and of a subsidiary motive, used as a figure in the accompaniment of the second theme. The working-out ends with a pedal on D, of several bars length, and thus leads naturally back to the first theme, which appears in much the same way as at its first entrance. The second theme follows, naturally in G major, and with a more varied accompaniment than before. A short and animated coda, in G minor, finishes the movement, the first bars of the first theme being brought in at the end.

The second movement is made up of a short piece in the form of a Siciliano (in D major, 6-8 time) and of a brisk intermezzo (in A major, 2-4 time), which interrupts it for a minute. After the intermezzo the Siciliano is repeated in a shortened form, and ends the movement quietly.

The third movement is an adagio (E-flat major, 4-4 time) of a serious character. The theme, the first half of it, is given out by the pianoforte, the violin entering with the second half. The first part of the theme is then repeated by the violin, leading to what may be called the second theme, in E-flat minor. Then comes an episode in which the violin also takes the melody, with arpeggios accompanying on the pianoforte. This leads back to the first theme, which is then repeated in a somewhat varied form, so far as the disposition of the instruments is concerned, and which, with a slight repetition of the second theme, and a quiet coda, concludes the movement.

The fourth movement, allegro assai, G minor, 4-4, is on the whole of an animated character. It is not of the usual rondo form, but is more like the ordinary first movement. The second theme, of a more broad and melodic character than the first, is in E flat, although its second appearance is in G major, according to custom. Each time the second theme appears, it is connected with the first by practically the same episode. The working out in which the second theme is used contrapuntally, and the first simply with accompaniment of arpeggios on the pianoforte, is rather long. It is constructed wholly out of fragments of the two themes, with the exception of a slight episode chiefly carried on by the pianoforte. Then comes the regular repetition of the two themes, the second theme having this time a more varied and individual accompaniment; and for a coda, the theme of the adagio reappears, the movement ending quietly in G major, in much the same way as the adagio.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Society is one of the finest concert organizations in the world, and New-York can well afford to give it a hearty greeting at the concert to be given in Steinway Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, has taken Boston by storm, and as was predicted at the time of his first concert by The Tribune, has been a great stimulus to musical discussion. The programme of Tuesday's concert is as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Concerto for Violin, in D ..... Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Symphony in C minor ..... Schumann

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1889.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours"
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D, op. 77
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (Unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

It would have been well if the Beethoven overture had been omitted; as it was the concert was too long.

Two of the numbers were heard here for the first time. The "Bear" symphony, so-called according to Pohl on account of the "Bear-bass" with which the final movement opens, was written for a society at Paris; with the exception of the last movement, it was not interesting. It was played with much clearness; it is a question, however, whether the pains taken were worth the trouble, for the themes themselves are commonplace, nor is the contrapuntal treatment unusual. Mr. Kneisel did all that is in the power of man to make the Brahms concerto an attractive number. Never did he play better both as a virtuoso and a musician. Yet the richness of his tone, the ease and sureness of his execution, the musical intelligence and the modest and necessary subordination of self,—all these qualities so marked in his playing could not save the concerto from the verdict, that it is upon the whole a long and dull composition. It is true that, particularly in the first movement, there are beautiful moments, but as Rossini said of the music of Wagner, "What dreadful half-hours!" If this be "subjective" music, let us have something "objective," even though it approach triviality. The oboe solo with which the adagio opens has been called "delicious"; it was certainly beautifully played by Mr. Sautet, and it would be a delight to hear that gentleman practise the scales; for whatever he does is beautiful both in idea and the carrying of it out; but as for the air itself,—well, there are very worthy people who say they enjoy every line of "Sordello." The hearty and spontaneous applause which was given to Mr. Kneisel was surely more for him as a man and as a musician than for the work itself; though there are possibly among us people who think they show both quality and breeding by loudly praising what they neither enjoy nor understand.

The "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, which was put upon a program early in the season and was removed for a singular reason, has at last been played. It would seem as though the postponement and long delay had fretted the nerves of the members of the orchestra; for there were several inexcusable blunders in the performance. Such slips could be excused in an amateur orchestra; they were certainly unworthy of the orchestra which Mr. Nikisch in October pronounced the third best in the world, only surpassed by the orchestras in two towns of Saxony. Yet even these blunders could not destroy the unearthly beauty of the symphony. How wonderful is the coloring of the instrumentation. "With a few "horn-progressions," with here and there a short clarinet or oboe solo supported by the simplest and most natural accompaniment, Schubert produces orchestral effects which no raffinement of Wagner-like instrumentation approaches." Perhaps it is well that Schubert never finished it. There is a pleasure in imagining what Schubert might have written. It is a fragment, as Keat's "Hyperion"; as "Dennis Duval"; as the romance of Hawthorne, "the unfinished window in Aladdin's palace."

Clipping from Register
New Haven Conn
Date 12/9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is definitely engaged for Friday, May 16, '90. This orchestra is one of the most brilliant concert orchestras in the world, and under the lead of their new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nickesch, the musicians seem to have gained an enthusiam which makes their playing a revelation. The members play con amore, and the spectacle of a conductor directing everything from memory is an inspiration in itself. The enterprise of the University Musical Society in securing so great an attraction should be recognized and supported by our citizens for several reasons. It is in the first place a distinct advantage to both the city and University, for the class of citizens and students who look at the possibilities of the artistic culture afforded by a city or institution before making a decision regarding residence, contributes an element of strength rather than weakness. Moreover, it is a great privilege to hear such a concert as is possible only in the larger cities. Again if the series is a success it will be perpetuated in coming years and will most assuredly make an impression for good. The society is anxious that the citizens and students should have the best talent that can be secured and consequently we insist that those who have not taken associate membership tickets should do so at once. It will require the sale of 100 tickets to make the society secure financially. Another sale of more than this number will make possible still another concert of the highest grade. Send in your name and membership feee of $2.00 to Prof. Stanley who will see that a ticket is mailed immediately.

Clipping from Advertiser
New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch has arranged to give four concerts at Steinway hall, on the following Tuesday evenings: December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18. This orchestra is the only one in the United States organized and maintained all the year round, and has, on the occasions of its former visits to this city under Mr. Gericke, proved itself to be one of the finest bands in the country, exciting widespread and lively interest among all New York music lovers by reason of its finished and meritorious performances. Mr. Nikisch, who will make his first appearance here on these occasions, enjoys not only a great European reputation, but also one already acquired in Boston. Undoubtedly these four concerts will be a feature of our musical season, and if only half of the encomiums that have found their way from Boston to New York be true, much enjoyment may be expected from the series now arranged. The subscription sale opened this morning.

Times
Phila. Pa.
12/7

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the opening of the series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday, December 18. On this occasion Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia.

Clipping from Tribune
New Haven Conn
Date 12/10

emory.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The lists for the Boston Symphony concerts at Steinert's are already very large, and the first concert on Monday night, December 16, will undoubtedly be attended by a big audience. The reputation of this company renders praise unnecessary, and the fact that nearly all of the tickets have been subscribed for will not cause surprise. A few subscriptions may be placed at Steinert's, and the sale of the remaining single seats will open on Thursday.

Clipping from Journal
New York N. Y.
Date 12/11

The Quaker Belle at the matinee with the cast as before.

Boston Symphony Concerts.—The next event of musical interest after the Sarasate-d'Albert concerts will be these four concerts—Tuesday evenings, December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18—at Steinway Hall. Arthur Nikisch has already been placed by the Bostonians upon the same pedestal with Levy, Mottl and Richter. Whether in the estimation of New Yorkers he will equal Thomas and Seidl remains to be seen. So much has been said of him that little of interest remains to be told. His chief fame as conductor was gained at the New Opera at Leipsic, where his orchestra soon equalled the Gewandhaus orchestra. He has received orders and decorations from all parts of Germany. The very high standard maintained by the Boston orchestra under Gericke, and at present under Nikisch, will doubtless ensure a full attendance at the coming concerts.

Clipping from Express
New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The many delighted attendants at the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in previous years will welcome with pleasure the announcement of four concerts to be given at Steinway Hall during the present season by the same organization. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will be remembered, is the only orchestra in the United States organized and maintained during the entire year for the daily performance of symphonic and high-class music; and, furthermore, its concerts are the only orchestral concerts that will be given in New York this season outside of those arranged by the Philharmonic and Symphonic societies. They will enlist the services of eighty-two performers under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The concerts given by the orchestra in Boston have been unprecedentedly successful. The subscription sale for the New York concert begins at Steinway Hall to-day, and the dates fixed are December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18.

NEW HAVEN EVE
THE REGISTER.
DECEMBER 12, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

HYPERION THEATER.

MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 16.

First Appearance of the Celebrated Conductor,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

SOLOIST:

Mr. ANTON HEKKING.

PROGRAMME—Overture, "Euryanthi," Weber. Fantasie for 'Cello, "O, Cara Memoria," Servais. Symphony No. 8, Beethoven. Soli for 'Cello (a) Traumerei, Schumann (b) Papillon, Popper. Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, Liszt.

Season Tickets for the series of four Concerts $5. The sale of single tickets opens Thursday, Dec. 12, at Steinerts' Music Store.

d11 5dlSu C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and will prove a treat to all lovers of music. The concert will be given under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, a instructor of acknowledged ability, and the artists who are to take part have been long known to the musical world as among the best in their line.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1889.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last evening's symphony concert, the soloist in which was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, was of too important a feature for such brief notice as the pressure of advertising today would render necessary. It will be criticised at length in the next issue of THE TIMES.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Mozart, Mackenzie and Rubinstein were the composers for the second concert of the season by the Adamowski quartette in Steinert hall Monday evening. The Mozart quartette in D major is one of a collection of three written for Frederic William in 1789. It was earnestly played, yet, until the last movement, much of the expression was too impassioned and withal too fiery to be in any way true to the Mozartean simplicity of the music. The performance of the final allegro was just what it should have been, and its thematic details were set forth with admirable clearness and fidelity.

Mr. Adamowski played the "Benedictus" by Mackenzie with a warmth of tone and poetic feeling that were highly effective in their justice to an unpretentiously well-made and artistic composition. With the Rubinstein trio in G minor Mr. Clayton Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski were all praiseworthy, Mr. Johns doing much excellent work and in a very sincere, discriminating and able manner.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER.
DECEMBER 14, 1889.

The sale of seats for the Boston symphony concert, at the Hyperion, next Monday evening, has been very large, and the orchestra will be greeted by an audience it deserves. This will be the first opportunity granted to New Haven people to see the brilliant young conductor, Mr. Nikisch. The concert will be an event to be enjoyed by all lovers of music who attend.

The engagement of "One of the Finest" closes at the Grand to-night. The

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1889.

[41]

Second Kneisel Concert.

NOT so well filled was Chickering Hall as for other concerts of this series, but nevertheless well occupied. From the quartet, Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Hehking, we had only one number, Schubert's beautiful D minor Quartet, composed when he was only twenty-nine, and using with such effect his Death-song.

Rose Stewart sang, in a sweet, unconstrained way, three songs: Au die Tauben, by Brahms; Liszt's Loreley; and a charming cradle song by Liszt. It did not enhance the beauty of her singing that she played her own accompaniments, though she did so very cleverly; and it was annoying to have a long wait while one piano was removed, by the sliding door and the elevator, and another brought up.

The larger had been played by Mr. Foote in his new Sonata for Violin and Piano, op. 20, written last summer, and now given for the first time in public. The whole work is interesting, but the second movement is a gem, the Siciliano. The programme sketch is as follows:

The first movement, in G minor, 9-8 time, opens immediately with the principal theme, given out by the violin ff. After a complete statement of it thus, and a little episodical matter, it comes once again briefly, this time by the pianoforte. A few more bars, and the quieter and more melodic subject in B-flat major is reached. This is at first put quite plainly, in the violin, with simple pianoforte accompaniment; but as it proceeds further, the accompaniment becomes more elaborate, the two instruments working together to a climax ff. Then comes the working-out section of the movement, which is entirely contructed out of parts of the first and second themes and of a subsidiary motive, used as a figure in the accompaniment of the second theme. The working-out ends with a pedal on D, of several bars length, and thus leads naturally back to the first theme, which appears in much the same way as at its first entrance. The second theme follows, naturally in G major, and with a more varied accompaniment than before. A short and animated coda, in G minor, finishes the movement, the first bars of the first theme being brought in at the end.

The second movement is made up of a short piece in the form of a Siciliano (in D major, 6-8 time) and of a brisk intermezzo (in A major, 2-4 time), which interrupts it for a minute. After the intermezzo the Siciliano is repeated in a shortened form, and ends the movement quietly.

The third movement is an adagio (E-flat major, 4-4 time) of a serious character. The theme, the first half of it, is given out by the pianoforte, the violin entering with the second half. The first part of the theme is then repeated by the violin, leading to what may be called the second theme, in E-flat minor. Then comes an episode in which the violin also takes the melody, with arpeggios accompanying on the pianoforte. This leads back to the first theme, which is then repeated in a somewhat varied form, so far as the disposition of the instruments is concerned, and which, with a slight repetition of the second theme, and a quiet coda, concludes the movement.

The fourth movement, allegro assai, G minor, 4-4, is on the whole of an animated character. It is not of the usual rondo form, but is more like the ordinary first movement. The second theme, of a more broad and melodic character than the first, is in E flat, although its second appearance is in G major, according to custom. Each time the second theme appears, it is connected with the first by practically the same episode. The working out in which the second theme is used contrapuntally, and the first simply with accompaniment of arpeggios on the pianoforte, is rather long. It is constructed wholly out of fragments of the two themes, with the exception of a slight episode chiefly carried on by the pianoforte. Tnen comes the regular repetition of the two themes, the second theme having this time a more varied and individual accompaniment; and for a coda, the theme of the adagio reappears, the movement ending quietly in G major, in much the same way as the adagio.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Society is one of the finest concert organizations in the world, and New-York can well afford to give it a hearty greeting at the concert to be given in Steinway Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, has taken Boston by storm, and as was predicted at the time of his first concert by The Tribune, has been a great stimulus to musical discussion. The programme of Tuesday's concert is as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Concerto for violin, in D ..... Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1889.

The Ninth Symphony Concert.

Haydn.....Symphony in C major, "L'Ours"
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D, op. 77
(First time in Boston.)
Schubert.....Symphony in B minor (Unfinished)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"

It would have been well if the Beethoven overture had been omitted; as it was the concert was too long.

Two of the numbers were heard here for the first time. The "Bear" symphony, so-called according to Pohl on account of the "Bear-bass" with which the final movement opens, was written for a society at Paris; with the exception of the last movement, it was not interesting. It was played with much clearness; it is a question, however, whether the pains taken were worth the trouble, for the themes themselves are commonplace, nor is the contrapuntal treatment unusual. Mr. Kneisel did all that is in the power of man to make the Brahms concerto an attractive number. Never did he play better both as a virtuoso and a musician. Yet the richness of his tone, the ease and sureness of his execution, the musical intelligence and the modest and necessary subordination of self,—all these qualities so marked in his playing could not save the concerto from the verdict, that it is upon the whole a long and dull composition. It is true that, particularly in the first movement, there are beautiful moments, but as Rossini said of the music of Wagner, "What dreadful half-hours!" If this be "subjective" music, let us have something "objective," even though it approach triviality. The oboe solo with which the adagio opens has been called "delicious"; it was certainly beautifully played by Mr. Sautet, and it would be a delight to hear that gentleman practise the scales; for whatever he does is beautiful both in idea and the carrying of it out; but as for the air itself,—well, there are very worthy people who say they enjoy every line of "Sordello." The hearty and spontaneous applause which was given to Mr. Kneisel was surely more for him as a man and as a musician than for the work itself; though there are possibly among us people who think they show both quality and breeding by loudly praising what they neither enjoy nor understand.

The "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, which was put upon a program early in the season and was removed for a singular reason, has at last been played. It would seem as though the postponement and long delay had fretted the nerves of the members of the orchestra; for there were several inexcusable blunders in the performance. Such slips could be excused in an amateur orchestra; they were certainly unworthy of the orchestra which Mr. Nikisch in October pronounced the third best in the world, only surpassed by the orchestras in two towns of Saxony. Yet even these blunders could not destroy the unearthly beauty of the symphony. How wonderful is the coloring of the instrumentation. "With a few "horn-progressions," with here and there a short clarinet or oboe solo supported by the simplest and most natural accompaniment, Schubert produces orchestral effects which no raffinement of Wagner-like instrumentation approaches." Perhaps it is well that Schubert never finished it. There is a pleasure in imagining what Schubert might have written. It is a fragment, as Keat's "Hyperion"; as the romance of Hawthorne, "the unfinished window in Aladdin's palace."

Clipping from Register
Ann Arbor Mich
Date 12/9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is definitely engaged for Friday, May 16, '90. This orchestra is one of the most brilliant concert orchestras in the world, and under the lead of their new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nickesch, the musicians seem to have gained an enthusiam which makes their playing a revelation. The members play con amore, and the spectacle of a conductor directing everything from memory is an inspiration in itself. The enterprise of the University Musical Society in securing so great an attraction should be recognized and supported by our citizens for several reasons. It is in the first place a distinct advantage to both the city and University, for the class of citizens and students who look at the possibilities of the artistic culture afforded by a city or institution before making a decision regarding residence, contributes an element of strength rather than weakness. Moreover, it is a great privilege to hear such a concert as is possible only in the larger cities. Again if the series is a success it will be perpetuated in coming years and will most assuredly make an impression for good. The society is anxious that the citizens and students should have the best talent that can be secured and consequently we insist that those who have not taken associate membership tickets should do so at once. It will require the sale of 100 tickets to make the society secure financially. Another sale of more than this number will make possible still another concert of the highest grade. Send in your name and membership feee of $2.00 to Prof. Stanley who will see that a ticket is mailed immediately.

Clipping from Advertiser
New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch has arranged to give four concerts at Steinway hall, on the following Tuesday evenings: December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18. This orchestra is the only one in the United States organized and maintained all the year round, and has, on the occasions of its former visits to this city under Mr. Gericke, proved itself to be one of the finest bands in the country, exciting widespread and lively interest among all New York music lovers by reason of its finished and meritorious performances. Mr. Nikisch, who will make his first appearance here on these occasions, enjoys not only a great European reputation, but also one already acquired in Boston. Undoubtedly these four concerts will be a feature of our musical season, and if only half of the encomiums that have found their way from Boston to New York be true, much enjoyment may be expected from the series now arranged. The subscription sale opened this morning.

Clipping from Times
Phila. Pa.
12/7

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the opening of the series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday, December 18. On this occasion Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, will make his first appearance in Philadelphia.

Clipping from Tribune
New Haven Conn
Date 12/10

Clipping from Journal
New York N. Y.
Date 12/11

...the cast as before.

Boston Symphony Concerts.—The next event of musical interest after the Sarasate-d'Albert concerts will be these four concerts—Tuesday evenings, December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18—at Steinway Hall. Arthur Nikisch has already been placed by the Bostonians upon the same pedestal with Levy, Mottl and Richter. Whether in the estimation of New Yorkers he will equal Thomas and Seidl remains to be seen. So much has been said of him that little of interest remains to be told. His chief fame as conductor was gained at the New Opera at Leipsic, where his orchestra soon equalled the Gewandhaus orchestra. He has received orders and decorations from all parts of Germany. The very high standard maintained by the Boston orchestra under Gericke, and at present under Nikisch, will doubtless ensure a full attendance at the coming concerts.

...memory.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The lists for the Boston Symphony concerts at Steinert's are already very large, and the first concert on Monday night, December 16, will undoubtedly be attended by a big audience. The reputation of this company renders praise unnecessary, and the fact that nearly all of the tickets have been subscribed for will not cause surprise. A few subscriptions may be placed at Steinert's, and the sale of the remaining single seats will open on Thursday.

THE NEW HAVEN EVENING REGISTER.

DECEMBER 14, 1889.

The sale of seats for the Boston symphony concert, at the Hyperion, next Monday evening, has been very large, and the orchestra will be greeted by an audience it deserves. This will be the first opportunity granted to New Haven people to see the brilliant young conductor, Mr. Nikisch. The concert will be an event to be enjoyed by all lovers of music who attend.

The engagement of "One of the Finest" closes at the Grand to-night. The Clipping from Evening

New York N. Y.
Date 12/9

...Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The many delighted attendants at the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in previous years will welcome with pleasure the announcement of four concerts to be given at Steinway Hall during the present season by the same organization. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will be remembered, is the only orchestra in the United States organized and maintained during the entire year for the daily performance of symphonic and high-class music; and, furthermore, its concerts are the only orchestral concerts that will be given in New York this season outside of those arranged by the Philharmonic and Symphonic societies. They will enlist the services of eighty-two performers under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The concerts given by the orchestra in Boston have been unprecedentedly successful. The subscription sale for the New York concert begins at Steinway Hall to-day, and the dates fixed are December 17, January 14, February 11 and March 18.

NEW HAVEN EVE
THE REGISTER.
DECEMBER 12, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

HYPERION THEATER.

MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 16.

First Appearance of the Celebrated Conductor,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

SOLOIST:

Mr. ANTON HEKKING.

PROGRAMME—Overture, "Euryanthi," Weber. Fantasie for 'Cello, "O, Cara Memoria," Servais. Symphony No. 8, Beethoven. Soli for 'Cello (a) Traumerei, Schumann (b) Papillon, Popper. Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, Liszt.

Season Tickets for the series of four Concerts $5. The sale of single tickets opens Thursday, Dec. 12, at Steinerts' Music Store.

d11 5d1Su C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and will prove a treat to all lovers of music. The concert will be given under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, a instructor of acknowledged ability, and the artists who are to take part have been long known to the musical world as among the best in their line.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1889.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last evening's symphony concert, the soloist in which was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, was of too important a feature for such brief notice as the pressure of advertising today would render necessary. It will be criticised at length in the next issue of THE TIMES.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

Mozart, Mackenzie and Rubinstein were the composers for the second concert of the season by the Adamowski quartette in Steinert hall Monday evening. The Mozart quartette in D major is one of a collection of three written for Frederic William in 1789. It was earnestly played, yet, until the last movement, much of the expression was too impassioned and withal too fiery to be in any way true to the Mozartean simplicity of the music. The performance of the final allegro was just what it should have been, and its thematic details were set forth with admirable clearness and fidelity.

Mr. Adamowski played the "Benedictus" by Mackenzie with a warmth of tone and poetic feeling that were highly effective in their justice to an unpretentiously well-made and artistic composition. With the Rubinstein trio in G minor Mr. Clayton Johns and the Messrs. Adamowski were all praiseworthy, Mr. Johns doing much excellent work and in a very sincere, discriminating and able manner.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1889.

Second Kneisel Concert.

NOT so well filled was Chickering Hall as for other concerts of this series, but nevertheless well occupied. From the quartet, Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Hehking, we had only one number, Schubert's beautiful D minor Quartet, composed when he was only twenty-nine, and using with such effect his Death-song.

Rose Stewart sang, in a sweet, unconstrained way, three songs: Au die Tauben, by Brahms; Liszt's Loreley; and a charming cradle song by Liszt. It did not enhance the beauty of her singing that she played her own accompaniments, though she did so very cleverly; and it was annoying to have a long wait while one piano was removed, by the sliding door and the elevator, and another brought up.

The larger had been played by Mr. Foote in his new Sonata for Violin and Piano, op. 20, written last summer, and now given for the first time in public. The whole work is interesting, but the second movement is a gem, the Siciliano. The programme sketch is as follows:

The first movement, in G minor, 9-8 time, opens immediately with the principal theme, given out by the violin ff. After a complete statement of it thus, and a little episodical matter, it comes once again briefly, this time by the pianoforte. A few more bars, and the quieter and more melodic subject in B-flat major is reached. This is at first put quite plainly, in the violin, with simple pianoforte accompaniment; but as it proceeds further, the accompaniment becomes more elaborate, the two instruments working together to a climax ff. Then comes the working-out section of the movement, which is entirely contructed out of parts of the first and second themes and of a subsidiary motive, used as a figure in the accompaniment of the second theme. The working-out ends with a pedal on D, of several bars length, and thus leads naturally back to the first theme, which appears in much the same way as at its first entrance. The second theme follows, naturally in G major, and with a more varied accompaniment than before. A short and animated coda, in G minor, finishes the movement, the first bars of the first theme being brought in at the end.

The second movement is made up of a short piece in the form of a Siciliano (in D major, 6-8 time) and of a brisk intermezzo (in A major, 2-4 time), which interrupts it for a minute. After the intermezzo the Siciliano is repeated in a shortened form, and ends the movement quietly.

The third movement is an adagio (E-flat major, 4-4 time) of a serious character. The theme, the first half of it, is given out by the pianoforte, the violin entering with the second half. The first part of the theme is then repeated by the violin, leading to what may be called the second theme, in E-flat minor. Then comes an episode in which the violin also takes the melody, with arpeggios accompanying on the pianoforte. This leads back to the first theme, which is then repeated in a somewhat varied form, so far as the disposition of the instruments is concerned, and which, with a slight repetition of the second theme, and a quiet coda, concludes the movement.

The fourth movement, allegro assai, G minor, 4-4, is on the whole of an animated character. It is not of the usual rondo form, but is more like the ordinary first movement. The second theme, of a more broad and melodic character than the first, is in E flat, although its second appearance is in G major, according to custom. Each time the second theme appears, it is connected with the first by practically the same episode. The working out in which the second theme is used contrapuntally, and the first simply with accompaniment of arpeggios on the pianoforte, is rather long. It is constructed wholly out of fragments of the two themes, with the exception of a slight episode chiefly carried on by the pianoforte. Tnen comes the regular repetition of the two themes, the second theme having this time a more varied and individual accompaniment; and for a coda, the theme of the adagio reappears, the movement ending quietly in G major, in much the same way as the adagio.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Society is one of the finest concert organizations in the world, and New-York can well afford to give it a hearty greeting at the concert to be given in Steinway Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, has taken Boston by storm, and as was predicted at the time of his first concert by The Tribune, has been a great stimulus to musical discussion. The programme of Tuesday's concert is as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Concerto for violin, in D ..... Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, December 16, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.

Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.

NEW HAVEN HOTEL.

Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.

Leave New Haven directly after concert. Horse cars to steamer "Northam."

Arrive in New York Tuesday, Dec. 17. Breakfast at 8 A. M.

METROPOLITAN HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.

REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M.

Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 18, at 8.30 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Philadelphia, 11 A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.

Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Dec. 19, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.

Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.

CARROLLTON HOUSE.

Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.

Leave Baltimore Friday, Dec. 20, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.

Arrive Washington 10.15 A. M.

WILLARD'S HOTEL.

Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.

Leave Washington directly after Concert.

Arrive Boston Saturday, Dec. 21, at 4 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Dec. 16, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

HOTEL LIST. 1889-90.

A. Nikisch.	Campanari. Fiumara.	H. Heindl. Rietzel.
F. R. Comee. C. M. Loeffler.	Simpson. Greene.	E. M. Heindl. J. E. Eichler.
F. Kneisel.	Fiedler. Moldauer.	Schormann. Schumann.
T. Adamowski. J. Adamowski.	Nichols. Field.	Bareither. Jennewein.
Hekking.	Zach. Schuecker.	Gerhardt. Hampe.
Mole.	Kneer. Goldie.	Demuth. Reibl.
P. Muller.	A. Goldstein. S. Goldstein.	Fox. Dietsch.
Roth. Behr.	Kolster. Kuehn.	Nightingale. J. Edw. Eichler.
Svecenski. Grunberg.	Metzger. Gunzel.	Korth. F. Muller.
Kuntz. J. Akeroyd.	Mingels. E. Loeffler.	Post. Taubert.
J. Mullaly.	Kluge. Michael.	McKenzie. Evans.
Swornsbourne. Schuchmann.	Hoyer. Barth.	Human. Kurth.
Stewart. Marble.	Mahn. Krafft.	Butler. Reinhart.
Goldschmidt. Schultz.	Patz. Delisle.	Hannemann. Gantzberg.
Knecht. Winternitz

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night—Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

A smaller audience than usual attended the concert of Saturday, the weather being undoubtedly responsible for the diminution. The programme was however, quite as interesting as its immediate predecessors and was carried out in a generally excellent manner. The overture to "Sakuntala" was one of Mr. Nikisch's successes and was given with a crisp, clear, ensemble that was refreshing to hear. The climax was lofty in the extreme and for once the interior voices were well balanced and the harmonies became especially solid on this account.

The concerto which followed was better suited to the climate of Amsterdam than that of Boston, for it dealt largely in Dutch tunes, which were developed in the last two movements especially, with considerable bravura. The work began, with what many orchestral compositions end with—a tonic-dominant figure on the kettledrums, but this figure was made more rhythmic than many of its class, and was delivered with martial effect. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist and proved herself quite the equal of any lady player we have recently had in this city. Her forte seemed to be in forte, and the power she displayed in heavy octave work and in bravura passages was remarkable.

The shading of the second movement was commendable, and to the bassoon player, too, some meed of praise should be given, for his theme played an important part in the ending of the movement, and the imitations on the deeper instruments were also finely done. But apart from the pianist, the greatest praise must be given both to the first and second horns for their splendid work in the third movement, which was the most pleasing portion of the whole Litolff Concerto. The work has four movements, not quite a la Brahms, however, and the finale is founded on the national hymn of Holland, which appears adorned with all possible ornamentation. The introduction to this begins with some powerful strokes given by the orchestra in unison, which are a distinct reminder of the chief figure in Beethoven's violin concerto, but are scarcely made sufficient use of to substantiate a charge of plagiarism. The end is remarkably heroic, and Mrs. Zeisler gave a degree of power to the closing phrases that convinced every auditor that she had not come to the end of her physical force. She was recalled twice by the audience with some degree of enthusiasm.

The Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with the proper amount of ecstacy, but scarcely with the requisite refinements of shading. The three movement symphony which Schumann chose to call "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" was given with all the comprehension of the subtleties of the composer which Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of Schumann on the occasion of his first concert in Boston; there was no affectation in the reading, but everything was clear, direct and impressive. The concert was, as a whole, a good presentation of the better points of our conductor, and in it his faults were reduced to a minimum.

There will be no symphony concert this week since our orchestra is now to charm the ears of the inhabitants of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other less favored localities. It will be curious to note the effect of our conductor's style on such able critics as Finck, Krehbiel, Henderson, Floersheim, etc., for in Boston the opinions have been so diverse, and expressed at times with so much of bitterness that musical criticism has almost become factional, and a species of "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die!" spirit has arisen to the great detriment of art.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was over long, and its closing moments were disturbed by the departure of the audience. One hour and a half, the limit hitherto observed at these concerts, is a wise one, and Mr. Nikisch would do well to adhere to it. The concert opened with a symphony by Haydn in C major, called, for some reason or other, "L'Ours," which had not been heard in Boston before. It is among its composer's more vigorous and more forcible works, is wonderfully fresh, full of interest, and in many respects shows Haydn in a light in which he is not familiar here. It was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch, and as finely played by the orchestra. It was followed by Brahms's concerto for violin, in D, which was also new to Boston. On the whole, it is the most genial of its composer's works that have been given here; is more flowing in style, more melodious and more graceful in effect, and, though abundant in the learning that Brahms is so fond of displaying, is by no means dry and, what is more, presents no abstruseness that baffles the understanding on a first hearing. The opening movement is profuse in beauties, noble in character, and though long, is always interesting. The adagio is a lovely bit of writing, and the finale, in its gaiety and brilliancy, was a genuine surprise. The work was magnificently read and played by Mr. Kneisel, whose performance was marked by exquisite finish of style and by a large and impressive dignity that were admirably in keeping with the character of the concerto. For purity of intonation, fluency of technique and warmth and richness of coloring, the effort could not easily be surpassed, and we doubt if any more musicianly and artistic violin playing has ever been heard here than was brought to bear on this work by Mr. Kneisel. There was not a trace of mere virtuosity in the effort, despite the temptations which the more brilliant moments of the concerto held out for the display of technical achievement, and the performance was as delightful as it was masterly from beginning to end. Mr. Kneisel's musicianship was gratifying exemplified in the fine cadenza he composed for the first movement, and in which his treatment of the leading themes was wholly in sympathy with the spirit of the concerto. As high as the artist stood before, the deep artistic feeling and the refined and affluent technical skill with which he played this work deservedly increased the esteem in which he was held. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and twice recalled. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony came next, and obtained full justice at the hands of both conductor and orchestra. The concert ended with a glorious performance of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, in which Mr. Nikisch won another of his overture successes; but the concert had proved long enough before this feature of the programme was reached, and it was listened to by only a fraction of the large audience that heard what had preceded it.

[42]

The Symphony Concert, Mrs. Zeisler, Soloist.

A Brilliant Programme Played Grandly—End of the Juch Opera Season—Queer Story About "The Gondoliers" Libretto—The D'Albert Piano Recitals—Gossip.

The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, who in her earlier appearances in this city has gained a general recognition of her abilities. Her reappearance last evening made her most pronounced success here, and she was received and her playing applauded by the audience with hearty enthusiasm. Her selection of the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E flat, op. 45, by Litolff, as her contribution to the programme, brought to the attention of these audiences a most enjoyable composition, which has had but a single hearing in Boston, and that way back in the old days of the then prominent Germania orchestra, when, in 1853, Alfred Jaell was the solo player. It is a work full to overflowing with brilliant melodious ideas and gives the pianist great prominence throughout. It demands much more than mere technical skill for its proper interpretation, and affords a soloist ample opportunities for displays of virtuosity. The lovely old Dutch tunes used as some of the themes are elaborated with rare skill and taste, and these were sung upon the solo instrument with fine expression by the pianist. Altogether the concerto made a most pleasing feature of the evening, and its selection by Mrs. Zeisler was most judicious. The orchestral selections of the evening were Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala"; Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, which made up a vastly pleasing programme, in the performance of which Mr. Nikisch gave further evidence of his tendency toward a more conservative reading of familiar works. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale were grandly interpreted, and the Wagner prelude was also a most enjoyable performance. Next Saturday the usual concert will be omitted, owing to the absence of the orchestra in other cities during the coming week. The programme for Saturday evening, the 28th inst., is: Symphony poem, "Fest-Klange," Liszt; concerto for pianoforte, in G, Rubinstein; pastorale from Christmas oratorio, Bach; symphony No. 1, in C minor, Gade. The soloist will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra makes its first tour for the season during the coming week, and much interest will be felt in the comments made upon the organization under Mr. Nikisch, who will, during the tour, make his debut in New York and Philadelphia. The concerts for the week are planned as follows: Monday, New Haven; Tuesday, Steinway Hall, New York; Wednesday, Philadelphia; Thursday, Baltimore; Friday, Washington. The programme announced for New York is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for violin, Brahms, Mr. Kneisel; prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, Schumann. The soloists for this trip are, in New Haven, Mr. Hekking, 'cello; in New York, Mr. Kneisel, violin; in Philadelphia, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, piano; in Baltimore, Mr. Carl Faelten, piano. In Washington the concert will be the opening of the new Lincoln Hall, and an inaugural address is expected by Judge Fuller.

Beside the orchestra, the concert programme will introduce Mlle. Decca, soprano; M. Manoury, baritone (first appearance in America); Mr. Joseffy, pianist; Mr. Lichtenberg, violinist, and Miss Margulies, pianist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The patrons of music are having an abundance of piano playing these weeks. With Baermann's charming piano recitals, with the D'Albert concerts in Music Hall, with Mr. Baermann himself as piano soloist a few weeks ago, it would seem as if a little variety might be afforded at the Symphony concerts without so much bunching of soloists. At the outset we had a succession of 'cello soloists. Saturday evening there was the second piano soloist, and Miss Aus Der Ohe is to play at the next concert. It was somewhere stated that there was to be less piano solo work at these concerts this year; but be this as it may, it would surely be more agreeable to the audiences to have this work distributed through the course.

This digression is not intended for a reflection upon the quality of the work given by the soloists, and it is always a pleasure to hear Miss Aus Der Ohe. But that pleasure would be enhanced by having her appearance at a time when we have not had a surfeit of piano music. The soloist Saturday evening, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, chose a concerto from Litolff—something that had not been given in Boston since the days of the old Germania concerts—a work calling for brilliancy of execution, and calculated to display the technique of the performer. The second and closing movements were founded upon old Dutch melodies, and were familiar to most of the audience. The method of working out seemed, however, in sharp contrast to the works usually given at these concerts. The andante is a very beautiful movement, and was nicely orchestrated. In this the soloist was not so successful as in the more rapid movements calling for execution and power. Her performance gave evident pleasure to the audience, and she gained a recall.

There were more vacant seats in Music Hall than have been seen thus far, and the length of the programme induced many to leave the hall before the completion of the Schumann number, which was one of the finest things of the evening. There was much enthusiasm manifested over the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," which abounded in beautiful effects, strong contrasts and excellent shading. It was worked up by Mr. Nikisch in the grandest style, and when the climax was reached one could forgive any amount of enthusiasm. The Wagner number, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," was a delectable gem, and it was, all in all, one of the choicest programmes given in the course. The orchestra played clearly and in sympathy with each other and the director, two characteristics that has been done this season. There is to be a Symphony Saturday night and then the orchestra makes its first trip to New York, Philadelphia and Washington.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, December 16, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.

Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.

NEW HAVEN HOTEL.

Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.

Leave New Haven directly after concert. Horse cars to steamer "Northam."

Arrive in New York Tuesday, Dec. 17. Breakfast at 8 A. M.

METROPOLITAN HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.

REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M.

Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 18, at 8.30 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Philadelphia, 11 A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.

Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Dec. 19, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.

Arrive Baltimore, 1.15 P. M.

CARROLLTON HOTEL.

Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.

Leave Baltimore Friday, Dec. 20, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.

Arrive Washington at 10.15 A. M.

WILLARD'S HOTEL.

Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.

Leave Washington directly after Concert.

Arrive Boston Saturday, Dec. 21, at 1 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to reach Saturday, after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Dec. 16, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HOTEL LIST. 1889-90.

A. Nikisch.	Cammeyer.	Hall.
	Fiumara.	Reed.
F. R. Comee.	Simpson	L. M. Heindl.
C. M. Loeffler.	Greene	J. E. Eichler.
	Fiedler.	Schumann.
F. Kneisel.	Mohaupt.	Schumann.
C. T. Adamowski.	Nichols.	Loeffler.
J. Adamowski	Field.	Heinzeimann.
	Zach.	Gerhardt.
Hekking.	Schroecker.	Hamper.
	Kneer.	Demuth.
Mohr.	Goldie.	Reibi.
	A. Goldstein.	Fox.
P. Muller.	S. Goldstein.	Dietsch.
Roth.	Kolster	Nagle.
Behr.	Kuehn.	J. W. Eichler.
Svecenski	Metzger.	Korth.
Grunberg.	Gunzel.	P. Muller.
Kuntz.	Mingels.	Post.
J. Akeroyd.	E. Loeffler	Tambert.
J. Mullaly.	Kluge.	McKenzie.
	Michael.	Evans.
Swornsbourne.	Hoyer.	Human.
Schuchmann.	Barth.	Kurth.
Stewart.	Mahn.	Butler.
Marble.	Krafft.	Reinhart.
Goldschmidt.	Patz.	Hannemann.
Schultz.	Delisle.	Gantzberg.
Knecht.
Winternitz

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night —Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

A smaller audience than usual attended the concert of Saturday, the weather being undoubtedly responsible for the diminution. The programme was however, quite as interesting as its immediate predecessors and was carried out in a generally excellent manner. The overture to "Sakuntala" was one of Mr. Nikisch's successes and was given with a crisp, clear, ensemble that was refreshing to hear. The climax was lofty in the extreme and for once the interior voices were well balanced and the harmonies became especially solid on this account.

The concerto which followed was better suited to the climate of Amsterdam than that of Boston, for it dealt largely in Dutch tunes, which were developed in the last two movements especially, with considerable bravura. The work began, with what many orchestral compositions end with—a tonic-dominant figure on the kettledrums, but this figure was made more rhythmic than many of its class, and was delivered with martial effect. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist and proved herself quite the equal of any lady player we have recently had in this city. Her forte seemed to be in forte, and the power she displayed in heavy octave work and in bravura passages was remarkable.

The shading of the second movement was commendable, and to the bassoon player, too, some meed of praise should be given, for his theme played an important part in the ending of the movement, and the imitations on the deeper instruments were also finely done. But apart from the pianist, the greatest praise must be given both to the first and second horns for their splendid work in the third movement, which was the most pleasing portion of the whole Litolff Concerto. The work has four movements, not quite a la Brahms, however, and the finale is founded on the national hymn of Holland, which appears adorned with all possible ornamentation. The introduction to this begins with some powerful strokes given by the orchestra in unison, which are a distinct reminder of the chief figure in Beethoven's violin concerto, but are scarcely made sufficient use of to substantiate a charge of plagiarism. The end is remarkably heroic, and Mrs. Zeisler gave a degree of power to the closing phrases that convinced every auditor that she had not come to the end of her physical force. She was recalled twice by the audience with some degree of enthusiasm.

The Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with the proper amount of ecstacy, but scarcely with the requisite refinements of shading. The three movement symphony which Schumann chose to call "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" was given with all the comprehension of the subtleties of the composer which Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of Schumann on the occasion of his first concert in Boston; there was no affectation in the reading, but everything was clear, direct and impressive. The concert was, as a whole, a good presentation of the better points of our conductor, and in it his faults were reduced to a minimum.

There will be no symphony concert this week since our orchestra is now to charm the ears of the inhabitants of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other less favored localities. It will be curious to note the effect of our conductor's style on such able critics as Finck, Krehbiel, Henderson, Floersheim, etc., for in Boston the opinions have been so diverse, and expressed at times with so much of bitterness that musical criticism has almost become factional, and a species of "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die!" spirit has arisen to the great detriment of art.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was over long, and its closing moments were disturbed by the departure of the audience. One hour and a half, the limit hitherto observed at these concerts, is a wise one, and Mr. Nikisch would do well to adhere to it. The concert opened with a symphony by Haydn in C major, called, for some reason or other, "L'Ours," which had not been heard in Boston before. It is among its composer's more vigorous and more forcible works, is wonderfully fresh, full of interest, and in many respects shows Haydn in a light in which he is not familiar here. It was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch, and as finely played by the orchestra. It was followed by Brahms's concerto for violin, in D, which was also new to Boston. On the whole, it is the most genial of its composer's works that have been given here; is more flowing in style, more melodious and more graceful in effect, and, though abundant in the learning that Brahms is so fond of displaying, is by no means dry and, what is more, presents no abstruseness that baffles the understanding on a first hearing. The opening movement is profuse in beauties, noble in character, and though long, is always interesting. The adagio is a lovely bit of writing, and the finale, in its gaiety and brilliancy, was a genuine surprise. The work was magnificently read and played by Mr. Kneisel, whose performance was marked by exquisite finish of style and by a large and impressive dignity that were admirably in keeping with the character of the concerto. For purity of intonation, fluency of technique and warmth and richness of coloring, the effort could not easily be surpassed, and we doubt if any more musicianly and artistic violin playing has ever been heard here than was brought to bear on this work by Mr. Kneisel. There was not a trace of mere virtuosity in the effort, despite the temptations which the more brilliant moments of the concerto held out for the display of technical achievement, and the performance was as delightful as it was masterly from beginning to end. Mr. Kneisel's musicianship was gratifying exemplified in the fine cadenza he composed for the first movement, and in which his treatment of the leading themes was wholly in sympathy with the spirit of the concerto. As high as the artist stood before, the deep artistic feeling and the refined and affluent technical skill with which he played this work deservedly increased the esteem in which he was held. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and twice recalled. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony came next, and obtained full justice at the hands of both conductor and orchestra. The concert ended with a glorious performance of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, in which Mr. Nikisch won another of his overture successes; but the concert had proved long enough before this feature of the programme was reached, and it was listened to by only a fraction of the large audience that heard what had preceded it.

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, DECEMBER 15, 1889.

[42]

The Symphony Concert, Mrs. Zeisler, Soloist.

A Brilliant Programme Played Grandly—End of the Juch Opera Season—Queer Story About "The Gondoliers" Libretto—The D'Albert Piano Recitals—Gossip.

The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, who in her earlier appearances in this city has gained a general recognition of her abilities. Her reappearance last evening made her most pronounced success here, and she was received and her playing applauded by the audience with hearty enthusiasm. Her selection of the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E flat, op. 45, by Litolff, as her contribution to the programme, brought to the attention of these audiences a most enjoyable composition, which has had but a single hearing in Boston, and that way back in the old days of the then prominent Germania orchestra, when, in 1853, Alfred Jaell was the solo player. It is a work full to overflowing with brilliant melodious ideas and gives the pianist great prominence throughout. It demands much more than mere technical skill for its proper interpretation, and affords a soloist ample opportunities for displays of virtuosity. The lovely old Dutch tunes used as some of the themes are elaborated with rare skill and taste, and these were sung upon the solo instrument with fine expression by the pianist. Altogether the concerto made a most pleasing feature of the evening, and its selection by Mrs. Zeisler was most judicious. The orchestral selections of the evening were Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala"; Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, which made up a vastly pleasing programme, in the performance of which Mr. Nikisch gave further evidence of his tendency toward a more conservative reading of familiar works. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale were grandly interpreted, and the Wagner prelude was also a most enjoyable performance. Next Saturday the usual concert will be omitted, owing to the absence of the orchestra in other cities during the coming week. The programme for Saturday evening, the 28th inst., is: Symphony poem, "Fest-Klange," Liszt; concerto for pianoforte, in G, Rubinstein; pastorale from Christmas oratorio, Bach; symphony No. 1, in C minor, Gade. The soloist will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra makes its first tour for the season during the coming week, and much interest will be felt in the comments made upon the organization under Mr. Nikisch, who will, during the tour, make his debut in New York and Philadelphia. The concerts for the week are planned as follows: Monday, New Haven; Tuesday, Steinway Hall, New York; Wednesday, Philadelphia; Thursday, Baltimore; Friday, Washington. The programme announced for New York is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for violin, Brahms, Mr. Kneisel; prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, Schumann. The soloists for this trio are, in New Haven, Mr. Hekking, 'cello; in New York, Mr. Kneisel, violin; in Philadelphia, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, piano; in Baltimore, Mr. Carl Faelten, piano. In Washington the concert will be the opening of the new Lincoln Hall, and an inaugural address is expected by Judge Fuller.

Beside the orchestra, the concert programme will introduce Mlle. Decca, soprano; M. Manoury, baritone (first appearance in America); Mr. Joseffy, pianist; Mr. Lichtenberg, violinist, and Miss Margulies, pianist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The patrons of music are having an abundance of piano playing these weeks. With Baermann's charming piano recitals, with the D'Albert concerts in Music Hall, with Mr. Baermann himself as piano soloist a few weeks ago, it would seem as if a little variety might be afforded at the Symphony concerts without so much bunching of soloists. At the outset we had a succession of 'cello soloists. Saturday evening there was the second piano soloist, and Miss Aus Der Ohe is to play at the next concert. It was somewhere stated that there was to be less piano solo work at these concerts this year; but be this as it may, it would surely be more agreeable to the audiences to have this work distributed through the course.

This digression is not intended for a reflection upon the quality of the work given by the soloists, and it is always a pleasure to hear Miss Aus Der Ohe. But that pleasure would be enhanced by having her appearance at a time when we have not had a surfeit of piano music. The soloist Saturday evening, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, chose a concerto from Litolff—something that had not been given in Boston since the days of the old Germania concerts—a work calling for brilliancy of execution, and calculated to display the technique of the performer. The second and closing movements were founded upon old Dutch melodies, and were familiar to most of the audience. The method of working out seemed, however, in sharp contrast to the works usually given at these concerts. The andante is a very beautiful movement, and was nicely orchestrated. In this the soloist was not so successful as in the more rapid movements, calling for execution and power. Her performance gave evident pleasure to the audience, and she gained a recall.

There were more vacant seats in Music Hall than have been seen thus far, and the length of the programme induced many to leave the hall before the completion of the Schumann number, which was one of the finest things of the evening. There was much enthusiasm manifest over the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," which abounded in beautiful effects, strong contrasts and excellent shading. It was worked up by Mr. Nikisch in the grandest style, and when the climax was reached one could forgive any amount of enthusiasm. The Wagner number, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," was a veritable gem, and it was, all in all, one of the choicest programmes given in the course. The orchestra played clearly and in sympathy with each other and the director. No better work has been done this season. There is to be no Symphony Saturday night and the orchestra makes its first trip to New York, Philadelphia and Washington.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

UNIVERSITY HALL, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

FRIDAY, MAY 16th, 1890,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE University Musical Society.

CHORAL UNION SERIES.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston, Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saturday night's snow storm did not have such an appreciable effect upon the size of the audience as might have been expected. Music Hall was well filled and the following programme was offered:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise."
No. 3, in E flat, op. 45.....Litolff
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.Schumann

The beautiful Goldmark overture, which is a certain favorite in all countries, was very finely played, and in the properly romantic spirit which should characterize its interpretation. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played the pianoforte concerto remarkably well. This lady is possessed of great verve and fire, combined with unusually great technical powers, but it is to be regretted that she should have selected a composition of so desperately uninteresting a character. It was only striking as an exhibition of pianistic fireworks, and is doubtless very difficult to play, but our Boston Symphony audience is accustomed to have an artist pay them the compliment of selecting a work which appeals to their intelligence, and a display of mere virtuosity is out of place at these concerts.

The immortal prelude to Wagner's wonderful love-drama was played nothing short of superbly. It is doubtful if such a reading of any part of Wagner's composition has ever been heard in this city before. It showed Mr. Nikisch again in the light of a man most preeminently suited to the interpretation of the Bayreuth master, and aroused a burning desire with many listeners that some day he might give a concert consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's musik-dramas. The orchestra responded nobly and like one man to all their conductor's wishes, and the horn quartet in particular deserve great credit for the manner in which they acquitted themselves of their far from easy share of the score. To speak in detail, Mr. Nikisch gave one new beauty to the work by his reading. Although the horns and trombones are used very freely, the former almost incessantly throughout, the trumpets do not appear at all until two bars before the final fortissimo of the long crescendo. They are ordinarily completely covered by the heavy trombones, but Mr. Nikisch, justly feeling that Wagner had particularly refrained from using them before in order to make their entrance more striking when it did come, allowed their clear, splendid notes to ring out proudly above all the other brass, and the effect obtained was almost magical.

The Schumann work is referred to on the programme as "a symphony without a slow movement." It has certainly this character to a certain extent, but that definition seems rather too flattering. The overture is neither so long nor so interesting as the first movement of a symphony should be, and the finale, although very bright and spirited, is cast in a somewhat lighter mould than one might expect to find in a work of symphonic pretensions. The scherzo, on the other hand, is very beautiful and quite capable of comparison with any other similar movement by this composer. The whole work was splendidly played. Mr. Nikisch seems to be a true prophet of Schumann, and he is particularly happy in giving a much warmer coloring to his orchestral composition than one is in the habit of expecting. There will be no concert next Saturday, as the orchestra goes to New York. The series will be resumed Dec. 28, and Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will play the Rubinstein pianoforte concerto in G major.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 15, 1889.

Nikisch Offers a Pleasant German Programme.

Mr. Nikisch's programme yesterday was thoroughly German, but it was also an offering to be sincerely enjoyed by lovers of good music from whatever nation. He is for the most part so brilliant and original a director—giving new effects and developing new beauties in the most familiar classics—that one is always sure to find much to enjoy and much to appreciate in any concert by the great orchestra that, following his baton, interprets his thoughts so well. At the same time, Mr. Nikisch is certainly to be encouraged in any plan that shall make the symphony series more truly representative of the whole world of noble music. Oddly enough, there was no symphony in the Symphony concert last week. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch had in mind the well-remembered occasion when three symphonies made up his programme and sought to restore the conventional balance in presenting this programme. Goldmark's fine "Sakuntala" overture was the opening selection. It found a very delicate and poetic interpretation at the hands of Mr. McNikisch, who seemed to catch perfectly the spirit and purpose of the Hungarian composer. Litolff, whose "Robespierre" overture everybody has heard, but not at the "Symphony" concerts, was represented by a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, given for the first time in Boston. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist of the occasion, is not a graceful performer, but she possesses undoubted skill and considerable power; and, admirably supported as her playing was by the orchestra, the performance gave excellent satisfaction. The Litolff concerto is interesting throughout, and the national airs of Holland are introduced in the closing portion of the work quite effectively, though by no means so impressively as is the "Marseillaise" in the familiar overture. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with marvelous effect. One would say after hearing such an interpretation, that Mr. Nikisch must be in the fullest sympathy with Wagner's most advanced musical thought; surely no one, however biased by prejudice, could resist the subtle charm of this prelude, so daintily and poetically set forth. There is never any lack of appreciation for Schumann on Mr. Nikisch's part, and the overture, scherzo and finale by this composer that ended the programme found a delightful performance.

This week the orchestra goes on its travels, to conquer new publics and return on the 28th with new laurels. This is to be its programme: Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge" (first time here), the pastorale from Bach's Christmas oratorio and Rubinstein's symphony in C minor, with Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in G, and Miss Aus der Ohe as the interpreter of this.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala."
Litolff: Concerto-Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "National Hollandois," Op. 45.
Wagner: Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde."
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

The "Sakuntala" overture was almost ideally well played. The work itself is none of the strongest, and we have often felt that its fittest function would be to accompany something gorgeously spectacular on the stage—say that beautiful "Prismatic Fountain" that used to figure in the "Black Crook," years ago. Its beauties are quite of that order; it sounds a little artificial and tawdry in the concert room. But, be its beauties as they may, they were superbly brought out by Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra. The "Tristan" prelude, which was given with the coda added by Wagner for concert performance, suffered from Mr. Nikisch's doing too much, as he has done twice or thrice before. Each separate phrase was dwelt on with such elaborate emphasis, its last drop of expressiveness squeezed out so carefully, that the whole lost much in musical coherence and continuity. Some isolated effects were brought out with splendid distinctness, especially the repeated entrances of the Love-potion phrase, first on the oboe, then with overpowering force on all the heavy brass, during the alternate rise and fall of the violins, about the middle of the piece; but, as a whole, the prelude sounded rather heavy and dragging. The Schumann Overture, Scherzo and Finale did not go very brilliantly, either; but its lack of effectiveness may have been partly owing to its coming immediately after the "Tristan" prelude.

Litolff's "Dutch" concerto-symphony is a work which may fairly be said to have had its day. And, by the way, it did have its day in Boston a good while ago, the announcement on the programme, that this was its first performance here, to the contrary notwithstanding; it has been played here at least three times before: by Alfred Jaell, Gustav Satter and B. J. Lang. It has its good points—the Scherzo, with its jolly little Volkslied second theme, is really capital—but, daring and original as it may have seemed when it was written, it sounds very old, withered and trivial now. At best, it can hold a respectable place among "virtuoso" concertos. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played it admirably, with superb brilliancy, clearness and force; but it was very badly accompanied by the orchestra almost throughout. Indeed, the accompaniment was positively shabby.

The next programme, to be given on Dec. 27 and 28 (there will be no rehearsal or concert next Friday and Saturday) is: Liszt, symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge"; Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto in G; Bach, pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio"; Gade, Symphony No. 1, in C-minor. Miss Adele aus der Ohe will be the pianist.

TRAVELLER

DECEMBER 16 1889.

Tenth Symphony Concert—Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Soloist.

The tenth Symphony concert programme was:

Goldmark—Overture, "Sakuntala."
Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3; in E flat, op. 45.
Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde."
Schumann—Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and her performance of the brilliant solo part in Mr. Litolff's not uninteresting concerto was unqualifiedly brilliant. The part is showy, abounding in bravura passages and as is the case with the entire work, is more superficial than deep, but the work is an excellent vehicle for a finished technique like Mrs. Zeisler's, and although musically written, and often with excellent feeling, the ability it discloses is not uniform; in short, it is a piece for the Jaels and Satters of a past generation. The work has not been heard here for years. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was heartily applauded and recalled for her admirable performance.

Mr. Nikisch is probably the finest interpreter of Schumann we have had here. The performance of the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale on Saturday was a clear and beautiful reading of one of the subtlest of composers. The rich coloring of the Goldmark overture was brought out finely, the band seeming infused with their poetic subject; the glowing climax of the "Sakuntala" was simply superb under Mr. Nikisch's ardent lead. Towards Wagner, our conductor has exercised a moderation which should commend itself to the obstructionists in music; we wish he were more partisan. The wonderful prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was somewhat less well performed than we had expected. Mr. Nikisch's conception of the music bore out the statement of a neighbor on the evening of the concert, that we should hear a performance more eloquent than that under Felix Mottl, but although the tonality of the orchestra was beautiful, the playing remained just a little removed from that point of absolute finish which could be called perfect. There will be no concert this week. The programme for Saturday evening, the 28th inst., is: Symphony poem, "Fest-Klange," Liszt; Concerto for pianoforte in G, Rubinstein; Pastorale from Christmas oratorio, Bach; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Gade. The soloist will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe. It is quite possible that a little piece of French music appropriate to Christmas time

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Monday, December ... 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Programme For To-Night — Herr Nikisch, the New Conductor, to Make His First Appearance Here.

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Fantasie for 'Cello—O Cara Memoria.....F. Servais
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Allegro vivace con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Tempo di Minuetto.
Allegro vivace.
Soli for 'Cello.
a. "Traumerei"—(Revery).....Schumann
b. "Papillon"—(The Butterfly).....Popper
Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt

The above programme will be rendered at the first concert of the season to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion Theater this evening. Herr Arthur Nikisch, the famous young musician who has been recently chosen conductor of the orchestra in place of Herr Gericke, will make his first appearance before a New Haven audience, and while all the old favorites have been retained, several new faces will be seen among the members of the orchestra. Among the new comers is Mr. Anton Hekking, the 'cellist who has been selected as the soloist of the evening. Herr Nikisch has evidently fairly won his reputation as an inimitable programme maker—at any rate, he has shown good judgment in selecting a well known, though seldom played symphony for the opening of our musical season. All the other selections, with but one exception, have been performed here within the memory of the concert-goers, and so the music will be familiar as well as strictly classical. This is as it should be, for to make classical compositions familiar to all lovers of music should always be one of the chief aims of orchestral concerts.

Three years ago Herr Gericke chose Webr's overture to the opera of "Euryanthe" as the first selection of the first concert for the season 1886—7. It was his first appearance in New Haven and by a singular coincidence Herr Nikisch will make his first debut here by conducting the same work. The themes of this overture are taken from the opera. The first motive expresses Adolar's trust in the faithfulness of Euryanthe and the second motive portrays the confidence and joy with which he anticipates his reunion with his beloved. Besides these themes there are two episodes. The first, in largo time, is given to muted violins accompanied by violas and has reference to that part of the opera in which Euryanthe conveys to the wicket Eglantine the secret concerning the spectral appearance of some unfortunate lovers. The second episode and its treatment doubtless had a special significance in the composer's mind, but what it was cannot now be ascertained.

Much has been written concerning the eighth or "little" symphony, which was composed in the summer of 1812 while Beethoven was seeking health in a quiet Austrian town during one of the dreariest periods of his life. But the symphony is the liveliest, cheeriest and jolliest as well as the shortest of the nine. The theme of the allegretto scherzando, which Berlioz declared had "fallen entire from heaven into the mind of the composer," had a more human origin, for it was originally the tune which Beethoven composed to a catch to be sung at a supper given to Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. The finale is one of the most brilliant and sparkling and fully-developed works of the master. To hear this symphony as interpreted by a leader who has become world-famous as an exponent of Beethoven is sure to prove a rare musical treat.

During the last few years several of Liszt's immortal "symphonic poems" have been rendered here by orchestras under the direction of Theodore Thomas and the Boston Symphony orchestra, but, if we mistake not, "Les Preludes" has never been performed here. As its name implies, the work has a poetic basis—a passage from Lamartine's "Meditations Poeques" was placed by the composer himself at the head of the score. "What is our life," wrote Lamartine, but a series of Preludes to that unknown song of which Death intones the first solemn note? Love constitutes the enchanting dawn of all existence; but where is an experience in which the first sensations of happiness are not disturbed by some storm, the deadly breath of which dispels its fond illusions, while blasting lightning burns up its altars?" It was to give musical expression to such thoughts as these that "Les Preludes" was composed and it cannot fail to exercise the powers of attention of all who hear it.

Mr. Hekking comes to this country highly recommended, and the selections he is to render will fully test his claims as a virtuoso. The fantaise by F. Servais was performed here about eight years ago at the Gerster concert by M. Adolphe Fischer. Schumann's "Traumerei," arranged for the violin, was admirably given by Mr. Wilhelm Ohliger at the Hegner concert the other evening. Mr. David Papper himself appeared here a few years ago, but whether he played "Le Papillon" or some other frisky selection we are unable to state.

Such a concert ought to be well attended. It is evident that the management are doing everything in their power to secure a successful season.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

UNIVERSITY HALL, ANN ARBOR, MICH.,

FRIDAY, MAY 16th, 1890,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE University Musical Society.

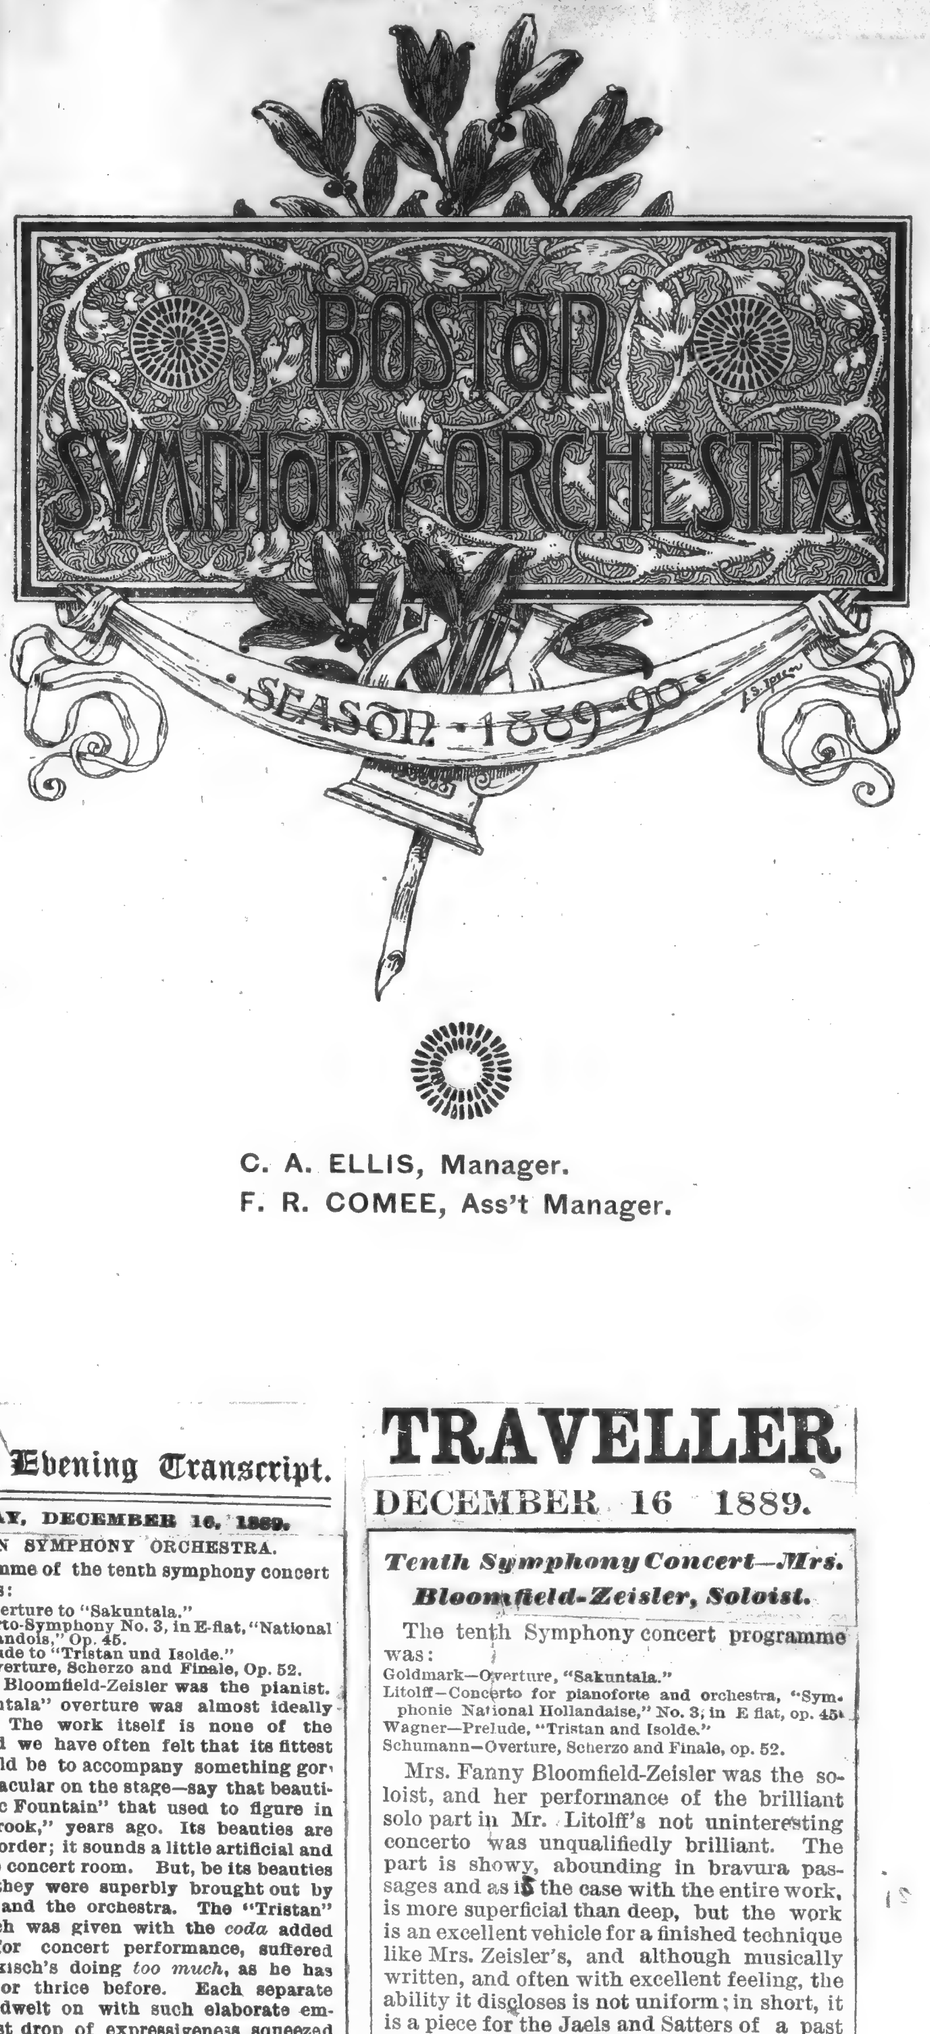
CHORAL UNION SERIES.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1889.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saturday night's snow storm did not have such an appreciable effect upon the size of the audience as might have been expected. Music Hall was well filled and the following programme was offered:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra,
"Symphonie National Hollandaise."
No. 3, in E flat, op. 45.....Litolff
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.Schumann

The beautiful Goldmark overture, which is a certain favorite in all countries, was very finely played, and in the properly romantic spirit which should characterize its interpretation. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played the pianoforte concerto remarkably well. This lady is possessed of great verve and fire, combined with unusually great technical powers, but it is to be regretted that she should have selected a composition of so desperately uninteresting a character. It was only striking as an exhibition of pianistic fireworks, and is doubtless very difficult to play, but our Boston Symphony audience is accustomed to have an artist pay them the compliment of selecting a work which appeals to their intelligence, and a display of mere virtuosity is out of place at these concerts.

The immortal prelude to Wagner's wonderful love-drama was played nothing short of superbly. It is doubtful if such a reading of any part of Wagner's compositions has ever been heard in this city before. It showed Mr. Nikisch again in the light of a man most preeminently suited to the interpretation of the Bayreuth master, and aroused a burning desire with many listeners that some day he might give a concert consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's musik-dramas. The orchestra responded nobly and like one man to all their conductor's wishes, and the horn quartet in particular deserve great credit for the manner in which they acquitted themselves of their far from easy share of the score. To speak in detail, Mr. Nikisch gave one new beauty to the work by his reading. Although the horns and trombones are used very freely, the former almost incessantly throughout, the trumpets do not appear at all until two bars before the final fortissimo of the long crescendo. They are ordinarily completely covered by the heavy trombones, but Mr. Nikisch, justly feeling that Wagner had particularly refrained from using them before in order to make their entrance more striking when it did come, allowed their clear, splendid notes to ring out proudly above all the other brass, and the effect obtained was almost magical.

The Schumann work is referred to on the programme as "a symphony without a slow movement." It has certainly this character, to a certain extent, but that definition seems rather too flattering. The overture is neither so long nor so interesting as the first movement of a symphony should be, and the finale, although very bright and spirited, is cast in a somewhat lighter mould than one might expect to find in a work of symphonic pretensions. The scherzo, on the other hand, is very beautiful and quite capable of comparison with any other similar movement by this composer. The whole work was splendidly played. Mr. Nikisch seems to be a true prophet of Schumann, and he is particularly happy in giving a much warmer coloring to his orchestral composition than one is in the habit of expecting. There will be no concert next Saturday, as the orchestra goes to New York. The series will be resumed Dec. 28, and Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will play the Rubinstein pianoforte concerto in G major.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 15, 1889.

Nikisch Offers a Pleasant German Programme.

Mr. Nikisch's programme yesterday was thoroughly German, but it was also an offering to be sincerely enjoyed by lovers of good music from whatever nation. He is for the most part so brilliant and original a director—giving new effects and developing new beauties in the most familiar classics—that one is always sure to find much to enjoy and much to appreciate in any concert by the great orchestra that, following his baton, interprets his thoughts so well. At the same time, Mr. Nikisch is certainly to be encouraged in any plan that shall make the Symphony series more truly representative of the whole world of noble music. Oddly enough, there was no symphony in the Symphony concert last week. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch had in mind the well-remembered occasion when three symphonies made up his programme and sought to restore the conventional balance in presenting this programme. Goldmark's fine "Sakuntala" overture was the opening selection. It found a very delicate and poetic interpretation at the hands of Mr. McNikisch, who seemed to catch perfectly the spirit and purpose of the Hungarian composer. Litolff, whose "Robespierre" overture everybody has heard, but not at the "Symphony" concerts, was represented by a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, given for the first time in Boston. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist of the occasion, is not a graceful performer, but she possesses undoubted skill and considerable power; and, admirably supported as her playing was by the orchestra, the performance gave excellent satisfaction. The Litolff concerto is interesting throughout, and the national airs of Holland are introduced in the closing portion of the work quite effectively, though by no means so impressively as is the "Marseillaise" in the familiar overture. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with marvellous effect. One would say after hearing such an interpretation, that Mr. Nikisch must be in the fullest sympathy with Wagner's most advanced musical thought; surely no one, however biased by prejudice, could resist the subtle charm of this prelude, so daintily and poetically set forth. There is never any lack of appreciation for Schumann on Mr. Nikisch's part, and the overture, scherzo and finale by this composer that ended the programme found a delightful performance.

This week the orchestra goes on its travels, to conquer new publics and return on the 28th, with new laurels. This is to be the programme: Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest Klaenage" (first time here), the pastorale from Bach's Christmas oratorio and Gade's symphony in C minor, with Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in G, and Adele aus der Ohe as the interpreter of this masterwork.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala."
Litolff: Concerto-Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, "National Hollandois," Op. 45.
Wagner: Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde."
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

The "Sakuntala" overture was almost ideally well played. The work itself is none of the strongest, and we have often felt that its fittest function would be to accompany something gorgeously spectacular on the stage—say that beautiful "Prismatic Fountain" that used to figure in the "Black Crook," years ago. Its beauties are quite of that order; it sounds a little artificial and tawdry in the concert room. But, be its beauties as they may, they were superbly brought out by Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra. The "Tristan" prelude, which was given with the coda added by Wagner for concert performance, suffered from Mr. Nikisch's doing too much, as he has done twice or thrice before. Each separate phrase was dwelt on with such elaborate emphasis, its last drop of expressiveness squeezed out so carefully, that the whole lost much in musical coherence and continuity. Some isolated effects were brought out with splendid distinctness, especially the repeated entrances of the Love-potion phrase, first on the oboe, then with overpowering force on all the heavy brass, during the alternate rise and fall of the violins, about the middle of the piece; but, as a whole, the prelude sounded rather heavy and dragging. The Schumann Overture, Scherzo and Finale did not go very brilliantly, either; but its lack of effectiveness may have been partly owing to its coming immediately after the "Tristan" prelude.

Litolff's "Dutch" concerto-symphony is a work which may fairly be said to have had its day. And, by the way, it did have its day in Boston a good while ago, the announcement on the programme, that this was its first performance here, to the contrary notwithstanding; it has been played here at least three times before: by Alfred Jaell, Gustav Satter and B. J. Lang. It has its good points—the Scherzo, with its jolly little Volkslied second theme, is really capital—but, daring and original as it may have seemed when it was written, it sounds very old, withered and trivial now. At best, it can hold a respectable place among "virtuoso" concertos. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played it admirably, with superb brilliancy, clearness and force; but it was very badly accompanied by the orchestra almost throughout. Indeed, the accompaniment was positively shabby.

The next programme, to be given on Dec. 27 and 28 (there will be no rehearsal or concert next Friday and Saturday) is: Liszt, symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge"; Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto in G; Bach, pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio"; Gade, Symphony No. 1, in C-minor. Miss Adele aus der Ohe will be the pianist.

TRAVELLER

DECEMBER 16 1889.

Tenth Symphony Concert—Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Soloist.

The tenth Symphony concert programme was:

Goldmark—Overture, "Sakuntala."
Litolff—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E flat, op. 45.
Wagner—Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde."
Schumann—Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and her performance of the brilliant solo part in Mr. Litolff's not uninteresting concerto was unqualifiedly brilliant. The part is showy, abounding in bravura passages and as is the case with the entire work, is more superficial than deep, but the work is an excellent vehicle for a finished technique like Mrs. Zeisler's, and although musically written, and often with excellent feeling, the ability it discloses is not uniform; in short, it is a piece for the Jaels and Satters of a past generation. The work has not been heard here for years. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was heartily applauded and recalled for her admirable performance.

Mr. Nikisch is probably the finest interpreter of Schumann we have had here. The performance of the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale on Saturday was a clear and beautiful reading of one of the subtlest of composers. The rich coloring of the Goldmark overture was brought out finely, the band seeming infused with their poetic subject; the glowing climax of the "Sakuntala" was simply superb under Mr. Nikisch's ardent lead. Towards Wagner, our conductor has exercised a moderation which should commend itself to the obstructionists in music; we wish he were more partisan. The wonderful prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was somewhat less well performed than we had expected. Mr. Nikisch's conception of the music bore out the statement of a neighbor on the evening of the concert, that we should hear a performance more eloquent than that under Felix Mottl, but although the tonality of the orchestra was beautiful, the playing remained just a little removed from that point of absolute finish which could be called perfect. There will be no concert this week. The programme for Saturday evening, the 28th inst., is: Symphony poem, "Fest-Klange," Liszt; Concerto for pianoforte in G, Rubinstein; Pastorale from Christmas oratorio, Bach; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Gade. The soloist will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe. It is quite possible that a little piece of French music appropriate to Christmas time may also be given at the next concert.

Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Monday, December 16, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Programme For To-Night — Herr Nikisch, the New Conductor, to Make His First Appearance Here.

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Fantasie for 'Cello—O Cara Memoria.....F. Servais
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Allegro vivace con brio.
Allegretto schérzando.
Tempo di Minuetto.
Allegro vivace.
Soli for 'Cello.
a. "Traumerei"—(Revery).....Schumann
b. "Papillon"—(The Butterfly).....Popper
Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt

The above programme will be rendered at the first concert of the season to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion Theater this evening. Herr Arthur Nikisch, the famous young musician who has been recently chosen conductor of the orchestra in place of Herr Gericke, will make his first appearance before a New Haven audience, and while all the old favorites have been retained, several new faces will be seen among the members of the orchestra. Among the new comers is Mr. Anton Hekking, the 'cellist who has been selected as the soloist of the evening. Herr Nikisch has evidently fairly won his reputation as an inimitable programme maker—at any rate, he has shown good judgment in selecting a well known, though seldom played symphony for the opening of our musical season. All the other selections, with but one exception, have been performed here within the memory of the concert-goers, and so the music will be familiar as well as strictly classical. This is as it should be, for to make classical compositions familiar to all lovers of music should always be one of the chief aims of orchestral concerts.

Three years ago Herr Gericke chose Wehr's overture to the opera of "Euryanthe" as the first selection of the first concert for the season 1886—7. It was his first appearance in New Haven and by a singular coincidence Herr Nikisch will make his first debut here by conducting the same work. The themes of this overture are taken from the opera. The first motive expresses Adolar's trust in the faithfulness of Euryanthe and the second motive portrays the confidence and joy with which he anticipates his reunion with his beloved. Besides these themes there are two episodes. The first, in largo time, is given to muted violins accompanied by violas and has reference to that part of the opera in which Euryanthe conveys to the wicket Eglantine the secret concerning the spectral appearance of some unfortunate lovers. The second episode and its treatment doubtless had a special significance in the composer's mind, but what it was cannot now be ascertained.

Much has been written concerning the eighth or "little" symphony, which was composed in the summer of 1812 while Beethoven was seeking health in a quiet Austrian town during one of the dreariest periods of his life. But the symphony is the liveliest, cheeriest and jolliest as well as the shortest of the nine. The theme of the allegretto scherzando, which Berlioz declared had "fallen entire from heaven into the mind of the composer," had a more human origin, for it was originally the tune which Beethoven composed to a catch to be sung at a supper given to Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. The finale is one of the most brilliant and sparkling and fully-developed works of the master. To hear this symphony as interpreted by a leader who has become world-famous as an exponent of Beethoven is sure to prove a rare musical treat.

During the last few years several of Liszt's immortal "symphonic poems" have been rendered here by orchestras under the direction of Theodore Thomas and the Boston Symphony orchestra, but, if we mistake not, "Les Preludes" has never been performed here. As its name implies, the work has a poetic basis—a passage from Lamartine's "Meditations Poeques" was placed by the composer himself at the head of the score. "What is our life," wrote Lamartine, but a series of Preludes to that unknown song of which Death intones the first solemn note? Love constitutes the enchanting dawn of all existence; but where is an experience in which the first sensations of happiness are not disturbed by some storm, the deadly breath of which dispels its fond illusions, while blasting lightning burns up its altars?" It was to give musical expression to such thoughts as these that "Les Preludes" was composed and it cannot fail to exercise the powers of attention of all who hear it.

Mr. Hekking comes to this country highly recommended, and the selections he is to render will fully test his claims as a virtuoso. The fantaise by F. Servais was performed here about eight years ago at the Gerster concert by M. Adolphe Fischer. Schumann's "Traumerei," arranged for the violin, was admirably given by Mr. Wilhelm Ohliger at the Hegner concert the other evening. Mr. David Papper himself appeared here a few years ago, but whether he played "Le Papillon" or some other frisky selection we are unable to state.

Such a concert ought to be well attended. It is evident that the management are doing everything in their power to secure a successful season.

[44]

[illegible] Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Tuesday, December 17, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion Theater last evening was well attended and much enjoyed. A railroad accident delayed the arrival of the music vans and it was half-past eight o'clock before the concert commenced. The audience waited patiently, however, and when Herr Nikish appeared he was given a hearty round of applause. He is a young man of striking personal appearance, who took up his baton and without score or even a music desk led his orchestra through the mazes of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Les Preludes." As a conductor he may have many faults—the critics will point them out soon enough—but he has the one great virtue of interpreting classical music as if he were not afraid of it. It cannot be said that he introduced many novations, but his method is more free than that of Thomas or of Gericke and yet neither one of these leaders ever had the orchestra under more perfect control. Aside from his merit as a musician he is to the average concert attendant a very fascinating conductor. In every wave of the hand command sits throned serene and he is evidently a leader in fact as well as in name. The personnel of the orchestra is essentially the same as that of last season, with the single important exception of Herr Giese, the 'cellist, who has been supplanted by Herr Anton Hekking. Herr Hekking played admirably last evening and his rendition of Popper's "Papillon" was heartily encored, but there were many present who would have liked it better if the substitution had not been made. To-night Herr Nikisch makes his debut in New York city and it will be strange indeed if he does not arouse the enthusiasm of a metropolitan audience and the admiration of the severest critics. The next concert will be given on Monday evening, January 13, 1890.

NEWS—NEWPORT MC

DECEMBER 16, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra makes its first tour for the season this week. The concerts for the week are planned as follows:—Tonight, New Haven; Tuesday, Steinway Hall, New York; Wednesday, Philadelphia; Thursday, Baltimore; Friday, Washington. The program announced for New York is:—Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for violin, Brahms, Mr. Kneisel; prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, Schumann. The soloists for this trip are. In New Haven, Mr. Hekking, 'cello; in New York, Mr. Kneisel, violin; in Philadelphia, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, piano; in Baltimore, Mr. Carl Faelten, piano. In Washington the concert will be the opening of the new Lincoln Hall, and an inaugural address is expected by Judge Fuller. Besides the orchestra, the concert program will introduce Mlle. Decca, soprano; M. Manoury, baritone (first appearance in America); Mr. Joseffy, pianist; Mr. Lichtenberg, violinist, and Miss Margulies, pianist.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1889.

NIKISCH IN NEW YORK.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra Scores a Signal Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 17, 1889. Darkness, rain and mud were powerless to keep away from Steinway Hall this evening an assemblage that almost filled the large auditorium of the concert hall. The audience, too, was of a highly representative character, and, although of a distinctly professional and musical type, was uncommonly brilliant. It was some minutes after 8 o'clock before the large line of carriages around the hall passed eastward and scattered. The welcome that the throng gave Mr. Nikisch was cordial and genuine, and, after the first number on the programme, it was clear that his powers as a conductor were understood and prized. There was but one opinion as to the quality of the Symphony orchestra, and this was to the effect that it showed no falling off from last year's standard of superlative excellence. All this was conceded by the applause, and more emphatically still by the murmur of pleased approval that rose on all sides after the plaudits came to an end at the close of the "Euryanthe" overture. This was the opening piece of the programme, and was followed in succession by Brahms' violin concerto, the Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isold" and Schumann's D minor symphony. The excitement grew as the evening progressed, and, as far as could be gathered from audible comment in every direction, the highest possible estimate was set upon the whole performance. In perfection of detail and finish it was conceded that nothing like the Wagner piece had ever been listened to in New York, while the emotional coloring and alternate delicacy and force with which the Schumann symphony was rendered produced a still more vivid impression even than the sensuous beauty and wonderful variety of tone noticeable in its interpretation.

The easy and unaffected manner of Mr. Nikisch was another theme of agreeable remark, and his method of conducting, unaided by the score, was the more effective from the fact that the leader's mastery of every note was revealed in his immediate transmission of every accent and of every shade of meaning to his men. The altogether exceptional nature of this feature of Mr. Nikisch's conductorship told more and more forcfully upon the spectators as the concert went on, and it would be hard to say in what exact proportions wonder at the musician's memory, delight at the poetry of his conception and admiration of his magnetism and firm control of his forces were combined in the tribute of acclamation that crowned his night's work. Mr. Nikisch's position as a working conductor of the grandest orchestra in the country was established, in the judgment of all persons that have knowledge of the feelings of such a New York audience as sways the concert-room by its decision, by his initial appearance with the Symphony orchestra in New York tonight.

Boston Post.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, DEC. 18, 1889

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—[SPECIAL.]—Mr. Nikisch's first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening created a very great degree of enthusiasm. In spite of the bad weather, Steinway Hall was crowded with an eager and enthusiastic audience. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; violin concerto, Brahms; prelude to "Tristan," and Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Nikisch was warmly applauded on his appearance, but after the beautiful reading of the overture the enthusiasm was enormous. Mr. Kneisel seemed doubly inspired by the favorable conditions, and played the concerto even more finely than in Boston. After the first movement he was greeted with a general storm of applause, which was kept up for a long time, but he richly deserved it, for his work was a fine example of violin playing of the very highest order. The prelude to "Tristan" was also even better played than in Boston. The enthusiasm had evidently fired the whole orchestra, and each man played with his whole soul. It would be impossible to conceive of a more glowing interpretation of this great love song. The symphony also was remarkably well played and with immense fire and spirit. The applause after the concert was warm and genuine. There seems to be but one opinion among local musicians. Several said to me that they considered the concert to be practically epoch-creating, and one can easily believe that in many places tonight Liszt's famous toast to Nikisch will be repeated—"Here's to the elect of the elect."

ARTHUR WELD.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The long heralded opening concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will occur this evening. The occasion will undoubtedly be one fully justifying all anticipations of pleasure. The following programme will be rendered:

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Fantasie for 'Cello—C Cara Memora.....F. Servais
Mr. Anton Heckking.
Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Allegro vivace con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Tempo di Minuetto,
Allegro vivace,
Soli for 'Cello.
a. "Traumerei"—(Revery).....Schuman
b. "Papillon"—(The Butterfly).....Popper
Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt

Herr Arthur Nikisch, the famous young musician who has been recently chosen conductor of the orchestra in place of Herr Gericke, will make his first appearance before a New Haven audience, and while all the old favorites have been retained, several new faces will be seen amonng the members of the orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Greeted by a Large Audience.

A good audience at the Hyperion last evening testified the interest with which New Haven looked for the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under new leadership. Even the delay of half an hour, caused by the accident on the New Haven and Northampton railroad, did not exhaust their patience, and they greeted Herr Nikisch, when he stepped upon the stand at 8:30, with the warmest applause. He proved himself a worthy successor to Gericke during the evening. His manner of conducting was quiet but exceedingly graceful and expressive, and the sympathy between himself and his orchestra was very evident.

Weber's familiar overture to Euryanthe opened the program and was finely rendered. Beethoven's "Little Symphony," the 8th, was full of the light vivacious movement which it requires. The scherzo, especially, which was taken in a little slower tempo than usual. It was in Liszt's Symphonic Poem Les Preludes, however, that Herr Nikisch showed himself at his best, evincing all the fire and abandon of interpretation ascribed to him.

Herr Hekking, the new 'cello player, carried the audience by storm with his exquisite rendition of the fantaisie "Cara Memoria," and the dainty Papillon by Popper. In the Traumerei one could have wished for a little more of Giese's depth and broadness of tone. The next concert will be looked forward to with delight.

AS LED BY HERR NIKISCH

MUSIC BY THE FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Opening of the New Haven Series of Four Concerts—Personal Appearance of the New Leader—The Solo Selection Unsatisfactory.

At eight o'clock last evening most of the Boston Symphony orchestra's audience had assembled at the Hyperion, but none of the preliminary tuning up of the large orchestra was to be heard. An announcement was made from the stage that the musicians had been delayed by a railroad accident, and that the performance would not commence for half an hour.

The audience was patient and at 8:35 the Symphony men made their appearance. "The marvellous boy," Herr Schnecker, was there with his harp, and the luxuriant locks of Herr Reiter, the French-horn player, were frequently seen, when the players rose to shake themselves for a moment between the selections. But the familiar face of Herr Giese, whose 'cello playing is so pleasantly remembered, was missing. Among the men on the stage, was one of a quiet, thoughtful appearance, rather slender and tall, with a dark brown beard. This was Herr Hekking, who has taken Mr. Giese's place. Herr Kneisel looked somewhat younger and handsome for the loss of his moustache.

There was a moment of expectation after the orchestra was seated, and then Herr Arthur Nikisch entered from the side, and he had walked in a quiet unconcerned way half the distance to his little platform before he was observed, but when recognized he was moderately applauded. Herr Nikisch has an unusually poetic and intelligent but slightly palid face, black hair and a full beard. His figure is slight and a trifle under medium height, although well proportioned. Through the first piece he held himself with both feet together in a military pose and used only his baton-hand; but later he stood more at ease and used both. His gestures were few, and always quiet and easy. He had his musicians under as good control as ever his splendid predecessor had them. The general impression of his ability as a conductor, as expressed after the concert, was extremely favorable, some even considering him an improvement on Herr Gericke.

The opening number, the familiar "Euryanthe" overture, was played perhaps a trifle faster than usual; in fact, in all of last evening's work the director's tendency seemed towards a rapid tempo. The exquisite motif of happy love was very clearly enunciated, and given with splendid power in the finale, while the music of the weird scene at Emma's tomb excellently displayed the acknowledged delicacy of the orchestra's work.

Herr Hekking unfortunately had made his selections with rather bad taste, but his execution of them was beyond criticism. Schumann's familiar "Träumerei" was a piece worthy of the artist and suitable to his instrument, but the "Papillon" and "O Cara Memoria" were evidently "show pieces" and proved the player guilty of that besetting sin of virtuosé, a glorification of self and a callousness about the intrinsic musical value of the pieces they play. Herr Hekking handles his instrument wonderfully and does his technical feats with dexterity and ease. The character of two of his pieces, which would have made them very suitable for a violin, gave his hearers little chance to enjoy the deep notes which are the glory of the 'cello. Beethooven's Symphony No. 8 is one of the least excellent, and though very well rendered did not create much enthusiasm. The fine elaboration of themes and richness of the master's work are very apparent, but the tone is monotonous. Herr Hekking brought out the bits of delicate melody with great clearness and sweetness.

The final piece, Lisze's symphonic poem "Les Prèludes," was the great success of the evening, and the increased number of players in the orchestra gave its noble climax the necessary volume.

It is to be hoped that among the soloists at the coming concerts we may hear a good baritone or basso, and perhaps Mr. Schnecker's harp playing and Mr. Reiter's mellow horn again. It would also be an improvement to break the concert into two parts with a breathing space between, and a performance in which eight numbers could be given instead of the usual four or five would be a welcome variety, even if no symphony in its entirety could figure on the bill.

R. H.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Those who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past and those who have read of Mr. Nikisch's successful efforts in troubling the musical waters in Boston had their expectations raised to a lofty pitch when they went to the first of the orchestra's concerts for this season in Steinway Hall last night. If any were disappointed they were hard to please, for the concert was a delightful and stimulating affair, exceedingly meritorious and conducive to thought in all its parts, and unique, as such concerts go in New-York, in being of such a length as left the listeners refreshed instead of wearied with too much enjoyment at the close. There have been a few changes in the band since it last visited us under the direction of Mr. Gericke, but practically it is unchanged. Its superiority to the best of our local organizations in the department of stringed instruments is still undisputed, and perhaps also its inferiority in the wood-wind choir. But these matters are of minor significance in an estimate of last night's concert, in which, while the material manifestation was fully adequate to the spiritual intention, it was the latter that invited to reflection and that provided the keenest enjoyment. Under Mr. Nikisch's direction it may safely be said that the technical finish of the orchestra's playing is not brought so constantly and impressively to the attention of the listeners as formerly, but in its place we have something infinitely better—a robust tone and a vitality of proclamation which sacrifices nothing of the composer's intended eloquence to the love of placidity and undisturbed euphony. Mr. Nikisch evidently believes that the breath which the blowers of brass breathe into their instruments should be the breath of life, and when the music stands in need of a sonorous forte he brings it out. Fortunately he is gifted with a beautiful sense of symmetry and balance of tone, and never permits the outbursts of sound to obscure the musical idea. In his development of climaxes he proceeds with the most refined care, and with a deliberation which is rare among men who cherish theories like his concerning the privilege of conductors in reading the works of composers. He never precipitates a climax by anticipation, but builds it up steadily and strongly, and when the supreme moment is at hand, strikes like a thunderbolt.

It is possible to speak thus of Mr. Nikisch while thinking of the playing of his band, for the reason that there was never a moment in last night's concert in which it was not obvious that his purposes were realized in the performance. Few conductors are so fortunate as he in this respect. It is a trite phrase, but one that is so expressive that to paraphrase would only weaken it, and so we set it down that he plays upon his orchestra as upon an instrument. This advantage accrues to him through the organization of the Symphony Orchestra, which is kept together solely for the purpose of giving weekly concerts of the highest class. Mr. Higginson's public spirit and generosity have done for Boston what Mr. Thomas has long and vainly striven to persuade the people of New-York to do for their city. Speaking, then, of the playing of the orchestra as if it were the manifestation of Mr. Nikisch's judgment, taste and will, it may be said that he appeared most admirable in Schumann's D minor symphony, which closed the concert. The overture to "Euryanthe," which introduced the evening's pleasures, was played in a much more finished style, technically, and was given with marvellous beauty, but we fancy there were those in the audience who would have been better pleased had its jubilant close, which echoes so much of the chivalric spirit, been given with greater warmth and animation than was possible within the limitations of Mr. Nikisch's moderate tempo. As for the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" while we are accustomed in New-York to have the poignancy of its passion impressed upon us more favorably, it may be said that a more thrilling performance than was reached at its climax is scarcely conceivable.

The one solo performance of the evening provided a two-fold surprise and delight. Mr. Kneisel played Brahms's violin concerto in D, op. 77, a stately, even magnificent, composition, worthy to be placed by the side of the concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn for the innate nobility of its thoughts, the sustained power evinced in its development, and its freedom from everything meretricious in idea and treatment. With Brahms alive to produce such music in the classic forms, the end of "formal music" cannot be said to have arrived. Mr. Kneisel played it masterfully, superbly; with much loveliness and purity of tone; with a sturdy disregard of all mere prettinesses and catch-penny effects, even in the cadenza where solo-players are supposed to have a dispensation (under a possibly apocryphal utterance of Mozart's) to do what they please within the space of time represented by the hold. The cadenza was of Mr. Kneisel's own composition, and a testimony to his soundness and seriousness as a musician. The concerto ought to be heard again, and often, if possible, from Mr. Kneisel, who introduced it here.

[44]

Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Tuesday, December 17, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion Theater last evening was well attended and much enjoyed. A railroad accident delayed the arrival of the music vans and it was half-past eight o'clock before the concert commenced. The audience waited patiently, however, and when Herr Nikish appeared he was given a hearty round of applause. He is a young man of striking personal appearance, who took up his baton and without score or even a music desk led his orchestra through the mazes of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Les Preludes." As a conductor he may have many faults—the critics will point them out soon enough—but he has the one great virtue of interpreting classical music as if he were not afraid of it. It cannot be said that he introduced many novations, but his method is more free than that of Thomas or of Gericke and yet neither one of these leaders ever had the orchestra under more perfect control. Aside from his merit as a musician he is to the average concert attendant a very fascinating conductor. In every wave of the hand command sits throned serene and he is evidently a leader in fact as well as in name. The personnel of the orchestra is essentially the same as that of last season, with the single important exception of Herr Giese, the 'cellist, who has been supplanted by Herr Anton Hekking. Herr Hekking played admirably last evening and his rendition of Popper's "Papillon" was heartily encored, but there were many present who would have liked it better if the substitution had not been made. To-night Herr Nikisch makes his debut in New York city and it will be strange indeed if he does not arouse the enthusiasm of a metropolitan audience and the admiration of the severest critics. The next concert will be given on Monday evening, January 13, 1890.

NEWS--NEWPORT MC

DECEMBER 16, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra makes its first tour for the season this week. The concerts for the week are planned as follows:—Tonight, New Haven; Tuesday, Steinway Hall, New York; Wednesday, Philadelphia; Thursday, Baltimore; Friday, Washington. The program announced for New York is—Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for violin, Brahms, Mr. Kneisel; prelude, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, Schumann. The soloists for this trip are. In New Haven, Mr. Hekking, 'cello; in New York, Mr. Kneisel, violin; in Philadelphia, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, piano; in Baltimore, Mr. Carl Faelten, piano. In Washington the concert will be the opening of the new Lincoln Hall, and an inaugural address is expected by Judge Fuller. Besides the orchestra, the concert program will introduce Mlle. Decca, soprano; M. Manoury, baritone (first appearance in America); Mr. Joseffy, pianist; Mr. Lichtenberg, violinist, and Miss Margulies, pianist.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1889.

NIKISCH IN NEW YORK.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra Scores a Signal Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 17, 1889. Darkness, rain and mud were powerless to keep away from Steinway Hall this evening an assemblage that almost filled the large auditorium of the concert hall. The audience, too, was of a highly representative character, and, although of a distinctly professional and musical type, was uncommonly brilliant. It was some minutes after 8 o'clock before the large line of carriages around the hall passed eastward and scattered. The welcome that the throng gave Mr. Nikisch was cordial and genuine, and, after the first number on the programme, it was clear that his powers as a conductor were understood and prized. There was but one opinion as to the quality of the Symphony orchestra, and this was to the effect that it showed no falling off from last year's standard of superlative excellence. All this was conceded by the applause, and more emphatically still by the murmur of pleased approval that rose on all sides after the plaudits came to an end at the close of the "Euryanthe" overture. This was the opening piece of the programme, and was followed in succession by Brahms' violin concerto, the Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isold" and Schumann's D minor symphony. The excitement grew as the evening progressed, and, as far as could be gathered from audible comment in every direction, the highest possible estimate was set upon the whole performance. In perfection of detail and finish it was conceded that nothing like the Wagner piece had ever been listened to in New York, while the emotional coloring and alternate delicacy and force with which the Schumann symphony was rendered produced a still more vivid impression even than the sensuous beauty and wonderful variety of tone noticeable in its interpretation.

The easy and unaffected manner of Mr. Nikisch was another theme of agreeable remark, and his method of conducting, unaided by the score, was the more effective from the fact that the leader's mastery of every note was revealed in his immediate transmission of every accent and of every shade of meaning to his men. The altogether exceptional nature of this feature of Mr. Nikisch's conductorship told more and more forcfully upon the spectators as the concert went on, and it would be hard to say in what exact proportions wonder at the musician's memory, delight at the poetry of his conception and admiration of his magnetism and firm control of his forces were combined in the tribute of acclamation that crowned his night's work. Mr. Nikisch's position as a working conductor of the grandest orchestra in the country was established, in the judgment of all persons that have knowledge of the feelings of such a New York audience as sways the public at large by its decision, by his initial appearance with the Symphony orchestra in New York tonight.

Boston Post.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, DEC. 18, 1889

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—[SPECIAL.]—Mr. Nikisch's first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening created a very great degree of enthusiasm. In spite of the bad weather, Steinway Hall was crowded with an eager and enthusiastic audience. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; violin concerto, Brahms; prelude to "Tristan," and Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Nikisch was warmly applauded on his appearance, but after the beautiful reading of the overture the enthusiasm was enormous. Mr. Kneisel seemed doubly inspired by the favorable conditions, and played the concerto even more finely than in Boston. After the first movement he was greeted with a general storm of applause, which was kept up for a long time, but he richly deserved it, for his work was a fine example of violin playing of the very highest order. The prelude to "Tristan" was also even better played than in Boston. The enthusiasm had evidently fired the whole orchestra, and each man played with his whole soul. It would be impossible to conceive of a more glowing interpretation of this great love song. The symphony also was remarkably well played and with immense fire and spirit. The applause after the concert was warm and genuine. There seems to be but one opinion among local musicians. Several said to me that they considered the concert to be practically epoch-creating, and one can easily believe that in many places tonight Liszt's famous toast to Nikisch will be repeated—"Here's to the elect of the elect."

ARTHUR WELD.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The long heralded opening concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will occur this evening. The occasion will undoubtedly be one fully justifying all anticipations of pleasure. The following programme will be rendered:

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Fantasie for 'Cello—C Cara Memora.....F. Servais
Mr. Anton Heckking,
Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Allegro vivace con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Tempo di Minuetto,
Allegro vivace,
Soli for 'Cello.
a.) "Traumerel"—(Revery).....Schuman
b.) "Papillon"—(The Butterfly).....Popper
Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt

Herr Arthur Nikisch, the famous young musician who has been recently chosen conductor of the orchestra in place of Herr Gericke, will make his first appearance before a New Haven audience, and while all the old favorites have been retained, several new faces will be seen amonng the members of the orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Greeted by a Large Audience.

A good audience at the Hyperion last evening testified the interest with which New Haven looked for the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under new leadership. Even the delay of half an hour, caused by the accident on the New Haven and Northampton railroad, did not exhaust their patience, and they greeted Herr Nikisch, when he stepped upon the stand at 8:30, with the warmest applause. He proved himself a worthy successor to Gericke during the evening. His manner of conducting was quiet but exceedingly graceful and expressive, and the sympathy between himself and his orchestra was very evident.

Weber's familiar overture to Euryanthe opened the program and was finely rendered. Beethoven's "Little Symphony," the 8th, was full of the light vivacious movement which it requires. The scherzo, especially, which was taken in a little slower tempo than usual. It was in Liszt's Symphonic Poem Les Preludes, however, that Herr Nikisch showed himself at his best, evincing all the fire and abandon of interpretation ascribed to him.

Herr Hekking, the new 'cello player, carried the audience by storm with his exquisite rendition of the fantaisie "Cara Memoria," and the dainty Papillon by Popper. In the Traumerei one could have wished for a little more of Giese's depth and broadness of tone. The next concert will be looked forward to with delight.

AS LED BY HERR NIKISCH

MUSIC BY THE FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Opening of the New Haven Series of Four Concerts—Personal Appearances of the New Leader—The Solo Selection Unsatisfactory.

At eight o'clock last evening most of the Boston Symphony orchestra's audience had assembled at the Hyperion, but none of the preliminary tuning up of the large orchestra was to be heard. An announcement was made from the stage that the musicians had been delayed by a railroad accident, and that the performance would not commence for half an hour.

The audience was patient and at 8:35 the Symphony men made their appearance. "The marvellous boy," Herr Schnecker, was there with his harp, and the luxuriant locks of Herr Reiter, the French-horn player, were frequently seen, when the players rose to shake themselves for a moment between the selections. But the familiar face of Herr Giese, whose 'cello playing is so pleasantly remembered, was missing. Among the men on the stage, was one of a quiet, thoughtful appearance, rather slender and tall, with a dark brown beard. This was Herr Hekking, who has taken Mr. Giese's place. Herr Kneisel looked somewhat younger and handsome for the loss of his moustache.

There was a moment of expectation after the orchestra was seated, and then Herr Arthur Nikisch entered from the side, and he had walked in a quiet unconcerned way half the distance to his little platform before he was observed, but when recognized he was moderately applauded. Herr Nikisch has an unusually poetic and intelligent but slightly palid face, black hair and a full beard. His figure is slight and a trifle under medium height, although well proportioned. Through the first piece he held himself with both feet together in a military pose and used only his baton-hand; but later he stood more at ease and used both. His gestures were few, and always quiet and easy. He had his musicians under as good control as ever his splendid predecessor had them. The general impression of his ability as a conductor, as expressed after the concert, was extremely favorable, some even considering him an improvement on Herr Gericke

The opening number, the familiar "Euryanthe" overture, was played perhaps a trifle faster than usual; in fact, in all of last evening's work the director's tendency seemed towards a rapid tempo. The exquisite motif of happy love was very clearly enunciated, and given with splendid power in the finale, while the music of the weird scene at Emma's tomb excellently displayed the acknowledged delicacy of the orchestra's work.

Herr Hekking unfortunately had made his selections with rather bad taste, but his execution of them was beyond criticism. Schumann's familiar "Träumerei" was a piece worthy of the artist and suitable to his instrument, but the "Papillon" and "O Cara Memoria" were evidently "show pieces" and proved the player guilty of that besetting sin of virtuosé, a glorification of self and a callousness about the intrinsic musical value of the pieces they play. Herr Hekking handles his instrument wonderfully and does his technical feats with dexterity and ease. The character of two of his pieces, which would have made them very suitable for a violin, gave his hearers little chance to enjoy the deep notes which are the glory of the 'cello. Beethooven's Symphony No. 8 is one of the least excellent, and though very well rendered did not create much enthusiasm. The fine elaboration of themes and richness of the master's work are very apparent, but the tone is monotonous. Herr Hekking brought out the bits of delicate melody with great clearness and sweetness.

The final piece, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Prèludes," was the great success of the evening, and the increased number of players in the orchestra gave its noble climax the necessary volume.

It is to be hoped that among the soloists at the coming concerts we may hear a good baritone or basso, and perhaps Mr. Schnecker's harp playing and Mr. Reiter's mellow horn again. It would also be an improvement to break the concert into two parts with a breathing space between, and a performance in which eight numbers could be given instead of the usual four or five would be a welcome variety, even if no symphony in its entirety could figure on the bill.

R. H.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Those who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past and those who have read of Mr. Nikisch's successful efforts in troubling the musical waters in Boston had their expectations raised to a lofty pitch when they went to the first of the orchestra's concerts for this season in Steinway Hall last night. If any were disappointed they were hard to please, for the concert was a delightful and stimulating affair, exceedingly meritorious and conducive to thought in all its parts, and unique, as such concerts go in New-York, in being of such a length as left the listeners refreshed instead of wearied with too much enjoyment at the close. There have been a few changes in the band since it last visited us under the direction of Mr. Gericke, but practically it is unchanged. Its superiority to the best of our local organizations in the department of stringed instruments is still undisputed, and perhaps also its inferiority in the wood-wind choir. But these matters are of minor significance in an estimate of last night's concert, in which, while the material manifestation was fully adequate to the spiritual intention, it was the latter that invited to reflection and that provided the keenest enjoyment. Under Mr. Nikisch's direction it may safely be said that the technical finish of the orchestra's playing is not brought so constantly and impressively to the attention of the listeners as formerly, but in its place we have something infinitely better—a robust tone and a vitality of proclamation which sacrifices nothing of the composer's intended eloquence to the love of placidity and undisturbed euphony. Mr. Nikisch evidently believes that the breath which the blowers of brass breathe into their instruments should be the breath of life, and when the music stands in need of a sonorous forte he brings it out. Fortunately he is gifted with a beautiful sense of symmetry and balance of tone, and never permits the outbursts of sound to obscure the musical idea. In his development of climaxes he proceeds with the most refined care, and with a deliberation which is rare among men who cherish theories like his concerning the privilege of conductors in reading the works of composers. He never precipitates a climax by anticipation, but builds it up steadily and strongly, and when the supreme moment is at hand, strikes like a thunderbolt.

It is possible to speak thus of Mr. Nikisch while thinking of the playing of his band, for the reason that there was never a moment in last night's concert in which it was not obvious that his purposes were realized in the performance. Few conductors are so fortunate as he in this respect. It is a trite phrase, but one that is so expressive that to paraphrase would only weaken it, and so we set it down that he plays upon his orchestra as upon an instrument. This advantage accrues to him through the organization of the Symphony Orchestra, which is kept together solely for the purpose of giving weekly concerts of the highest class. Mr. Higginson's public spirit and generosity have done for Boston what Mr. Thomas has long and vainly striven to persuade the people of New-York to do for their city. Speaking, then, of the playing of the orchestra as if it were the manifestation of Mr. Nikisch's judgment, taste and will, it may be said that he appeared most admirable in Schumann's D minor symphony, which closed the concert. The overture to "Euryanthe," which introduced the evening's pleasures, was played in a much more finished style, technically, and was given with marvellous beauty, but we fancy there were those in the audience who would have been better pleased had its jubilant close, which echoes so much of the chivalric spirit, been given with greater warmth and animation than was possible within the limitations of Mr. Nikisch's moderate tempo. As for the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" while we are accustomed in New-York to have the poignancy of its passion impressed upon us more favorably, it may be said that a more thrilling performance than was reached at its climax is scarcely conceivable.

The one solo performance of the evening provided a two-fold surprise and delight. Mr. Kneisel played Brahms's violin concerto in D, op. 77, a stately, even magnificent, composition, worthy to be placed by the side of the concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn for the innate nobility of its thoughts, the sustained power evinced in its development, and its freedom from everything meretricious in idea and treatment. With Brahms alive to produce such music in the classic forms, the end of "formal music" cannot be said to have arrived. Mr. Kneisel played it masterfully, superbly; with much loveliness and purity of tone; with a sturdy disregard of all mere prettinesses and catch-penny effects, even in the cadenza where solo-players are supposed to have a dispensation (under a possibly apocryphal utterance of Mozart's) to do what they please within the space of time represented by the hold. The cadenza was of Mr. Kneisel's own composition, and a testimony to his soundness and seriousness as a musician. The concerto ought to be heard again, and often, if possible, from Mr. Kneisel, who introduced it here.

[45]

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1889.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

"It is no disparagement to our own excellent orchestral organizations to say that the annual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as important in their line as any entertainments that occur in this city, not excepting the notable concerts of the Philharmonic Society. We have no instrumental body which is kept at work throughout the season every week under the guidance of one man, and our bands cannot be expected to achieve those high results which are to be reached only through constant and rigorous drill. Last night's concert, the first given here this season by the excellent players from Boston, was made more than commonly interesting by the début here of the new conductor of the band, Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

"The programme was, with the exception of one number, made up of compositions quite familiar to this public. The number referred to was Brahms's violin concerto in D, opus 77. From the interesting remarks in the programme book by G. H. Wilson we extract the following: 'This concerto was written expressly for Dr. Joachim, who played the solo part when it was first performed in public at a concert at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, on the evening of New Year's Day, 1879. It is in the same key as the symphony from the pen of its composer which preceded it; and some critics have discovered a certain family likeness between the two works, particularly as regards the first movement. In form the concerto is a strict classic. Even Mendelssohn's innovations are passed over by Brahms, who writes in three separate movements, with tuttis, soli, and cadenzas, &c., just where his predecessors, Mozart, Beethoven, and Spohr would expect to find them; yet the details and spirit of the work are essentially modern. It is, moreover, a composition in which the solo part is subjective.

"'From that point in the first movement leading to the usual pause and cadenza, Brahms permits the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel has written a cadenza which rests in part upon subjects contained in the movement of which it becomes a link. Apart from the musical interest the cadenza possesses, it stands as the first example in composition by the present concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard here.'

"No objection need be made to the composer's return to the early form of the classical concerto, though it is not the wisest plan to leave the cadenza to the pleasure of the soloist. However, when his work is so well done as Mr. Kneisel's, the result is happy. The concerto is a good piece of composition, somewhat austere in spirit, but fluent, symmetrical, and wholly intelligible. The last assertion cannot always be made in regard to Brahms's music. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the work was a very beautiful exhibition of violin playing, round, pure, and sympathetic in tone, scholarly in phrasing, clean in bowing, accurate in stopping, and carefully studied in every detail. His playing of his own cadenza was masterly and aroused the warmest kind of enthusiasm, which broke forth again at the close of the number. That the soloist, appearing before an audience in whose ears the witchery of Sarasate was so fresh, should have been so heartily applauded was a high tribute to his ability. Mr. Kneisel is an artist, and he will always be welcomed in this city.

"The orchestra played the overture to 'Euryanthe,' the prelude to 'Tristan and Isolde,' and Schumann's ever-lovely D minor symphony. The readers of this journal have already had extended comment on Mr. Nikisch's qualities as a conductor. It is not necessary, therefore, to say much at this time. His reading of the 'Euryanthe' overture was admirable, but it would undoubtedly have gained in impressiveness had he imparted a more vigorous movement to the final allegro.

"The 'Tristan' vorspiel was read nobly. The announcement of the opening motive was pregnant with dramatic power, the crescendo in the 'cello phrase being most effective. The tremendous climax, one of the mightiest utterances in all music, was given with great breadth and dignity, and with a magnificently-expressive balance of the interwoven voice parts. But the conductor's finest achievement was in the symphony. It was played in a marvelously fine manner. The performance of it showed that Mr. Nikisch could make an orchestra not only sing, but also declaim, a feature which was equally conspicuous in the cantabile passage of the overture. Under this leader the orchestra does not, it is true, achieve such exquisite polish as it did under Mr. Gericke, but it reveals something far better—a grand sweep of power and a masterful dramatic force. That Mr. Nikisch was successful last night is beyond a question, and New-York has almost as much reason to be thankful for his presence in America as Boston ought to have.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH WELCOMED.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN STEINWAY HALL UNDER THE NEW LEADER.

An immense audience gathered in Steinway Hall last night to welcome to this city Herr Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to listen to what this excellent body of musicians would make of the admirable programme announced.

No happier selection could have been made than the list arranged. It was a programme essentially modern in spirit, and yet not aggressively so. It presented that wonderful tone-picture, the prelude to "Tristan," which Berlioz once called a "chromatic wail without musical meaning," and Brahms' violin concerto in D. But, upon the other hand, the conservatives could take comfort in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and one of the most beautiful symphonies in existence—that of Schumann in C minor.

Herr Nikisch is a young and handsome fellow who takes his task with extreme seriousness. In manner he resembles Bulow as a conductor. He is not content with beating time; he literally leads his orchestra. He is the master musician, playing upon a vast instrument made up of many players. This, of course, is the highest function of the ideal leader. Herr Nikisch has nothing of the metronome in him. His mood changes with every bar of the music.

It will naturally be asked, How does the Boston orchestra's work under Herr Nikisch compare with its work under his predecessor, Herr Gericke? The difference was felt in the first dozen bars of the "Euryanthe" overture, and steadily accented during the evening. The famous band, which Boston owes to the generosity of Mr. Higginson, is not so wonderful an instrument as it was, but it is handled with greater freedom. Whether upon the whole there is gain or loss depends upon taste.

I am inclined to think, judging from last night's achievements, that, so far as New York is concerned, Mr. Gericke's orchestra was more of a wonder than Mr. Nikisch's will ever be. Our own orchestra can give us concerts every whit as perfect as that of last night, whereas in certain respects the finish, delicacy, beauty and balance of tone of the Boston band under Herr Gericke was unequalled in this country.

Comparison aside, last night's concert was a delightful one, and was applauded with the [illegible]. The band played throughout the symphony with splendid vigor [illegible] Kneisel's playing of [illegible] was admirable in many re[illegible]

The Sun.

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS CONDUCTOR.

Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Bow in New York.

Steinway Hall was crowded last night with a musical audience, the attraction being the first appearance in New York of Arthur Nikisch, the new leader of Boston's well-known Symphony Orchestra. There had been so much said of the splendid work done by the new conductor by the Boston critics, that there was a natural curiosity on the part of New Yorkers to hear him. The Symphony Orchestra's work was well known. Much was said of it here in praise and blame when it came under the leadership of Mr. Gericke. It was a splendidly trained organization; its renditions were marked by a superb finish, but it was generally admitted that this finish had been gained at the expense of what may briefly be called the soul.

Reports from Boston were to the effect that Mr. McKisch had brought about a spiritual regeneration of Mr. Higginson's forces, that he had been able to effect wonders on the basis of drilled excellence left by Gericke. Consequently people went to Steinway Hall last night with the expectation of delightful surprises. The new conductor made his appearance promptly and was received with slight recognition. He took his position on a very high platform and proceeded to conduct without a score. He is a surprisingly young man, dark and dapper, resembling somewhat Reinhold Hermann. His gestures are restrained and his movements like those of a polished actor. He began with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," of which he gave a very good if not brilliant rendering. Under him the orchestra had evidently gained in this much in dramatic expression, in clearness of phrasing, in precision and strength of attack, but the rendition of the overture as a whole was not distinguished by the breadth and beauty such as have often been given to it. The second number was Brakin's concerto for violin and orchestra in D (op. 77), the soloist being Mr. Kneisel, the concertmeister of the organization. It may be sufficient to say here that Mr. Kneisel, coming as he did after Sarasate, made a most brilliant success, and had four or five recalls.

The interest of the evening was of course with the new conductor, whose next number was the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," a work which is very familiar to all concert audiences. In this it must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch did only respectably. It was, in fact, scarcely Wagner at all. The overture as rendered by the Bostonians had nothing of the thrilling intensity that Seidl gives to it that carries an audience away with the throbbing woes of two unfortunate lovers. It had nothing of Wagner's genius in it. It was too calm, too studied, too sleepy and without a breath of inspiration. Seidl and Thomas as Wagner conductors rose immeasurably under its last night's rendition. In the symphony, Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, however, the Boston leader reached a very high point of artistic excellence. In this the orchestra played with most vigorous and artistic feeling. In the strength and powerful sweep of the cadences, it would be difficult to equal, certainly to surpass, this fine performance. Altogether, in exquisite poetry of feeling and delicate beauty, particularly on the strings, Mr. Nikisch does not touch Mr. Thomas, and in the sentimentality and artificiality of his Wagner reading he cannot be mentioned in the same breath with Seidl's overwhelming greatness in the interpretation of "Tristan."

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1889

MR. NIKISCH'S DEBUT IN PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Dec. 18.—[SPECIAL.]—Mr. Nikisch scored another great success by his debut in the Academy of Music here tonight. The enormous theatre was nearly wholly filled with a representative audience, which was immensely enthusiastic. The programme:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Piano concerto ..... Litoiff
"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
D minor symphony ..... Schumann

The beautiful interpretation of the overture did not fail to produce the enthusiasm which it so justly deserves. With each additional hearing of this work one cannot but feel overgrowing admiration for the really thoughtful manner in which it is read. Greater familiarity with this really wonderful conductor's methods certainly conveys the impression that whether what he does is right or not, it is most certainly the result of very deep study and determined artistic convictions. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler played again the Litolff concerto. With all respect for her excellent methods, it must be admitted that a second hearing of this tiresome work only confirms the impression already chronicled in these columns. It is hopelessly dull and uninteresting, and, worse than that, it is often unmusical. Mrs. Zeisler played very well. "Les Preludes" was very finely played and very warmly received, and for the fifth time the Schumann symphony was simply superb in every detail of conception and execution. As in New York, there seems to be but one opinion here among the critics and amateurs. They seem to feel that Mr. Nikisch has taken the beautiful orchestral machine so carefully and skilfully constructed by his predecessor and "imbued the matter with life." There is no doubt that a most genuine and unqualified success may be chronicled.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE METRONOME

PUBLISHED MONTHLY,

ESTABLISHED JANUARY, 1885.

PUBLISHED AT 6 4TH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 11.—Among the many queer things encountered in musical circles may be mentioned several of Mr. Nikisch's symphony programmes, the one for last week's concert being, perhaps, as peculiar in construction as any, and consisting of Haydn's Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Who ever heard of so pronounced a symphony programme as the foregoing? But it has this advantage, at least, that in construction it pleases all the critics, a certain faction of which have contended that the symphony should occupy the first place on the programme; another faction have, with equal vigor of speech, insisted upon its appearance in the middle; while a third, and by no means insignificant, faction have endeavored to demonstrate that its rightful place was as the closing number. So we see Mr. Nikisch has for once pleased all hands, in a measure. Then, for contrast, let us glance at the programme announced for this week's concert, which is as follows:—"Anacreon" overture, Cherubini; Concerto for 'cello, Eckert, Norwegian Raphsody, Svendsen; "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Symphony in E, Goetz—Leo Schultz 'cello soloist. Here we have a programme of five numbers, two of which introduce the same leading instrument, the violincello. This same sort of thing has occurred at least once previously during the present season, and is an innovation that cannot be looked upon with favor by musicians. It would scarcely be tolerated in a concert by any of our local orchestras or military bands, and, even if tolerated, would be considered in bad form and occasion much comment. There is, then, absolutely nothing to be said in favor of such action, and considerable to be said against it. With such vast artistic resources as are possessed by this organization it does not seem necessary to listen to two solos by the same performer on the same occasion. A much more interesting style of programme is that of the first of the season's "Young People's Popular Concerts," which is to be given on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 14, by the same orchestra, and for which Mr. Nikisch announces the following selections:—Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Vocalaria, Mme. Alves; (a) Sigfried Idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demerseman, soloist, Mr. Chas. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. The flute concerto will be performed for the first time in America, and it is unnecessary to state in advance that Mr. Mole will give a most excellent rendition of the work, for he is unquestionably one of the most skillful artists who have ever visited our shores. The writer has had many opportunities to hear him in private, where he was not called upon to give as finished performances as would be expected in public; but even then his tone and execution were as perfect as at any performance of the Symphony Orchestra; and in the hands of no other performer have we ever witnessed such wonderfel control of every detail in the manipulation of the Boehm flute as is shown by this admirable artist. Not that he is the only flutist in the world; that is mere nonsense; but it would do some of the advocates of the ordinary flute a power of good to spend a few dollars in learning to "go and do likewise."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

TUESDAY DECEMBER 17

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusual Success for the Boston Orchestra. The House Not Well Filled.

The first concert this season of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Hyperion last night was an unusual success. Such small drawbacks as a house that ought to have been better filled and a railroad accident which delayed the beginning of the concert until a quarter before nine, were at once forgotten at the first strains of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." This interesting work was rendered with a perfection and poetic coloring seldom heard. Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, seems not to have been too highly praised. He possesses above all not only a remarkable control over his men but also over himself, and realizes what so few conductors seem willing to acknowledge, that the influence over the body of musicians they are, as it were, to play upon, is almo t exclusively gained by degrees at rehearsals, and that no amount of squirming and contortions in the concert room will add what has not already been accomplished. Mr. Nikisch's manner has a happy combination of dignity, quiet but absolute command and modesty. His reading of Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," showed unusual composure, finish of detail, and freedom from the almost universal fault of too quick tempi. Of course Mr. Nikisch found his band in a very high state of mechanical perfection as it left Mr. Gericke's hands. The real extent of his power as a leader can only be determined after a longer trial.

The soloist, Mr. Hepping, first cellist of the orchestra, was very warmly received. His command over the technique of his instrument is absolute, his intonation remarkably pure, his tone brilliant, but perhaps rather more sensational than soulful.

The concerts promise to be extremely interesting and profitable. It will be a sad testimonial of New Haven's taste if they are not greeted by full houses.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1889.

THE "SYMPHONY" WAS THERE.

Our Orchestra Helps Dedicate a New Music Hall in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20.—A large and handsome lecture and music hall, which cost $200,000 and stands on the site of the old Lincoln Hall, was dedicated tonight under the auspices of such well-known ladies as Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. J. C. Bancroft and Mrs. Jeanette M. Thurber.

A thoroughly enjoyed musical entertainment was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and representatives of the faculty of the National Conservatory of Music, including Theophile Manoury, director of the vocal department; Miss Adele Margulies, pianist; Leopold Lichtenberg, violin; Victor Herbert, cello, and Rafael Joseffy, pianist. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was Arthur Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Washington.

Boston [illegible]

FRIDAY [illegible] DEC. 20, [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY AT BALTIMORE.

Mr. Nikisch Scores Another Great Triumph —Honest Criticism.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 19.—[SPECIAL.]—In spite of the bad weather which so persistently follows the first journey of the Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, the Lyceum Theatre in this city was crowded with a fashionable and music-loving audience, which listened to the following programme with close attention:

Overture—"Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Piano concerto in G ..... Rubinstein
Les Preludes ..... Liszt
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

The overture was beautifully played, and was very effective. Mr. Carl Faelten of the New England Conservatory played the concerto finely as to technique, and with fire and spirit, but it is not a very interesting work, as it is almost wholly devoid of thematic development, and not sufficiently original or melodious to counteract its lack of consecutive musical construction. It is almost impossible to describe how beautifully "Les Preludes" sounded in this house. It was, moreover, admirably played, and the prolonged applause at the close was the best possible proof of the genuine impression which it made upon the audience. Of course, the musical climax of the concert was the immortal symphony. It is certain that a second hearing of this work under Mr. Nickisch more than confirms all that was said on the occasion of its recent performance in Boston. It is indeed a superb interpretation, and probably if such people as were dissatisfied on a first hearing were to have the opportunity of listening again to Mr. Nikisch's ideas on this subject they would be easily converted. If there is any truth in the "vox populi, vox Dei" theory, the Baltimore public has set the seal of its unqualified approval upon this conductor's manner of presenting Beethoven's masterpieces. The musicians and music lovers in this part of the world seem to be wholly free from the besetting sin of captiousness and hypercriticism which is often seen in Boston to such an extent. The really beautiful music which Mr. Nikisch has given the people on this trip has not only gone straight to their intellects, but, more than that, it has opened a place for him in their hearts which few conductors have ever won for themselves in so short a time. After these splendid concerts, it is an unalloyed pleasure to see the open, honest manner in which the audiences express their delight; the applause also constantly excites the orchestra to greater efforts, and the enthusiasm transmits itself to each individual. When the music is good, why not applaud? Ought we not to think for a moment, and then, perhaps, blush a little, when we see that in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore there has been no discordant view to mar the complete success of the work by our new conductor. It would seem as if these people were more honest in their criticism than we are. They also knew Mr. Nikisch's predecessor, and owed many pleasant and delightful evenings to his artistic work, but they are apparently not so given over to comparisons as we are, and the fact that they admired Mr. Gericke does not make it impossible for them to also admire Mr. Nikisch. In short, they seem to really love music enough to listen to it and enjoy it for its own sake.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

A Brilliant Audience Last Evening Attended the Formal Opening.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 20, 1889. Lincoln Music Hall was opened this evening to the public by a grand concert for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Musically and socially the event was one of the chief events of the season. Socially the benefit was under the patronage of the most distinguished ladies in Washington, its special patrons being Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman, Mrs. John Chandler Bancroft and Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, and among the ladies under whose auspices the concert was given were Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Justice Gray, Mrs. Henry Cabot [illegible], Mrs. Philip Sheridan and Mme. [illegible] Barcado, Countess de Sponneck and Baroness Rosen of the diplomatic corps. Most of the seats in the house were sold at $5 each, and the admonition on the tickets to come in evening dress was pretty generally obeyed. Nearly all the society people of Washington were present, and the costumes in the boxes and the orchestra circle were very elegant. The Boston Symphony orchestra and the National Conservatory of Music, New York, united to make the musical event notable. Director Nikisch made his first bow to a Washington audience. He was very cordially received, and the orchestra, which is well known in Washington, fully sustained its exceptionally high reputation. Miss Marie Decca sung an aria from the "Magic Flute," and a duo with M. Manonroy of the National Conservatory, who also sung an aria from "Massenet's Herodiade." Joseffy played once alone, and once with Miss Adele Margulies, also of the National Conservatory, the latter number being arranged for two pianos. The other soloists were Mr. Theodore Lichtenburg and Mr. Victor Herbert. The audience was most enthusiastic, and the orchestra and soloists were applauded over and over, but the programme as originally fixed was a long one, and no encores were rendered. Lincoln Music Hall gives Washington one more theatre, and affords almost the only place for occasional concerts. The decoration is not completed, but the hall promises to be a handsome one, and its acoustic properties are good. It is of moderate proportions.

[45]

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1889.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is no disparagement to our own excellent orchestral organizations to say that the annual visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as important in their line as any entertainments that occur in this city, not excepting the notable concerts of the Philharmonic Society. We have no instrumental body which is kept at work throughout the season every week under the guidance of one man, and our bands cannot be expected to achieve those high results which are to be reached only through constant and vigorous drill. Last night's concert, the first given here this season by the excellent players from Boston, was made more than commonly interesting by the début here of the new conductor of the band, Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The programme was, with the exception of one number, made up of compositions quite familiar to this public. The number referred to was Brahms's violin concerto in D, opus 77. From the interesting remarks in the programme book by G. H. Wilson we extract the following: "This concerto was written expressly for Dr. Joachim, who played the solo part when it was first performed in public at a concert at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, on the evening of New Year's Day, 1879. It is in the same key as the symphony from the pen of its composer which preceded it; and some critics have discovered a certain family likeness between the two works, particularly as regards the first movement. In form the concerto is a strict classic. Even Mendelssohn's innovations are passed over by Brahms, who writes in three separate movements, with tuttis, soli, and cadenzas, &c., just where his predecessors, Mozart, Beethoven, and Spohr would expect to find them; yet the details and spirit of the work are essentially modern. It is, moreover, a composition in which the solo part is subjective.

"From that point in the first movement leading to the usual pause and cadenza, Brahms permits the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel has written a cadenza which roots in part upon subjects contained in the movement of which it becomes a link. Apart from the musical interest the cadenza possesses, it stands as the first example in composition by the present concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard here."

No objection need be made to the composer's return to the early form of the classical concerto, though it is not the wisest plan to leave the cadenza to the pleasure of the soloist. However, when his work is so well done as Mr. Kneisel's, the result is happy. The concerto is a good piece of composition, somewhat austere in spirit, but fluent, symmetrical, and wholly intelligible. The last assertion cannot always be made in regard to Brahms's music. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the work was a very beautiful exhibition of violin playing, round, pure, and sympathetic in tone, scholarly in phrasing, clean in bowing, accurate in stopping, and carefully studied in every detail. His playing of his own cadenza was masterly and aroused the warmest kind of enthusiasm, which broke forth again at the close of the number. That the soloist, appearing before an audience in whose ears the witchery of Sarasate was so fresh, should have been so heartily applauded was a high tribute to his ability. Mr. Kneisel is an artist, and he will always be welcomed in this city.

The orchestra played the overture to "Euryanthe," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's ever-lovely D minor symphony. The readers of this journal have already had extended comment on Mr. Nikisch's qualities as a conductor. It is not necessary, therefore, to say much at this time. His reading of the "Euryanthe" overture was admirable, but it would undoubtedly have gained in impressiveness had he imparted a more vigorous movement to the final allegro.

The "Tristan" vorspiel was read nobly. The announcement of the opening motive was pregnant with dramatic power, the crescendo in the 'cello phrase being most effective. The tremendous climax, one of the mightiest utterances in all music, was given with great breadth and dignity, and with a magnificently-expressive balance of the interwoven voice parts. But the conductor's finest achievement was in the symphony. It was played in a marvelously fine manner. The performance of it showed that Mr. Nikisch could make an orchestra not only sing, but also declaim, a feature which was equally conspicuous in the cantabile passage of the overture. Under this leader the orchestra does not, it is true, achieve such exquisite polish as it did under Mr. Gericke, but it reveals something far better—a grand sweep of power and a masterful dramatic force. That Mr. Nikisch was successful last night is beyond a question, and New-York has almost as much reason to be thankful for his presence in America as Boston ought to have.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH WELCOMED.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN STEINWAY HALL UNDER THE NEW LEADER.

An immense audience gathered in Steinway Hall last night to welcome to this city Herr Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to listen to what this excellent body of musicians would make of the admirable programme announced.

No happier selection could have been made than the list arranged. It was a programme essentially modern in spirit, and yet not aggressively so. It presented that wonderful tone-picture, the prelude to "Tristan," which Berlioz once called a "chromatic wail without musical meaning," and Brahms' violin concerto in D. But, upon the other hand, the conservatives could take comfort in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and one of the most beautiful symphonies in existence—that of Schumann in C minor.

Herr Nikisch is a young and handsome fellow who takes his task with extreme seriousness. In manner he resembles Bulow as a conductor. He is not content with beating time; he literally leads his orchestra. He is the master musician, playing upon a vast instrument made up of many players. This, of course, is the highest function of the ideal leader. Herr Nikisch has nothing of the metronome in him. His mood changes with every bar of the music.

It will naturally be asked, How does the Boston orchestra's work under Herr Nikisch compare with its work under his predecessor, Herr Gericke? The difference was felt in the first dozen bars of the "Euryanthe" overture, and steadily accented during the evening. The famous band, which Boston owes to the generosity of Mr. Higginson, is not so wonderful an instrument as it was, but it is handled with greater freedom. Whether upon the whole there is gain or loss depends upon taste.

I am inclined to think, jugging from last night's achievements, that, so far as New York is concerned, Mr. Gericke's orchestra was more of a wonder than Mr. Nikisch's will ever be. Our own orchestra can give us concerts every whit as perfect as that of last night, whereas in certain respects—finish, delicacy, beauty and balance of tone—the Boston band under Herr Gericke was unrivalled in this country.

[illegible] comparison aside, last night's concert [illegible] a beautiful one, and was applauded with the [illegible] it deserved. The band played throughout [illegible] in the symphony, with splendid vigor [illegible] musical spirit, and Herr Kneisel's playing of [illegible] was admirable in many respects. [illegible] was recalled many times, and [illegible] Nikisch received

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS CONDUCTOR.

Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Bow in New York.

Steinway Hall was crowded last night with a musical audience, the attraction being the first appearance in New York of Arthur Nikisch, the new leader of Boston's well-known Symphony Orchestra. There had been so much said of the splendid work done by the new conductor by the Boston critics, that there was a natural curiosity on the part of New Yorkers to hear him. The Symphony Orchestra's work was well known. Much was said of it here in praise and blame when it came under the leadership of Mr. Gericke. It was a splendidly trained organization; its renditions were marked by a superb finish, but it was generally admitted that this finish had been gained at the expense of what may briefly be called the soul.

Reports from Boston were to the effect that Mr. McKisch had brought about a spiritual regeneration of Mr. Higginson's forces, that he had been able to effect wonders on the basis of drilled excellence left by Gericke. Consequently people went to Steinway Hall last night with the expectation of delightful surprises. The new conductor made his appearance promptly and was received with slight recognition. He took his position on a very high platform and proceeded to conduct without a score. He is a surprisingly young man, dark and dapper, resembling somewhat Reinhold Hermann. His gestures are restrained and his movements like those of a polished actor. He began with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," of which he gave a very good if not brilliant rendering. Under him the orchestra had evidently gained in this much in dramatic expression, in clearness of phrasing, in precision and strength of attack, but the rendition of the overture as a whole was not distinguished by the breadth and beauty such as have often been given to it. The second number was Brakin's concerto for violin and orchestra in D (op. 77), the soloist being Mr. Kneisel, the concertmeister of the organization. It may be sufficient to say here that Mr. Kneisel, coming as he did after Sarasate, made a most brilliant success, and had four or five recalls.

The interest of the evening was of course with the new conductor, whose next number was the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," a work which is very familiar to all concert audiences. In this it must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch did only respectably. It was, in fact, scarcely Wagner at all. The overture as rendered by the Bostonians had nothing of the thrilling intensity that Seidl gives to it that carries an audience away with the throbbing woes of two unfortunate lovers. It had nothing of Wagner's genius in it. It was too calm, too studied, too sleepy and without a breath of inspiration. Seidl and Thomas as Wagner conductors rose immeasurably under its last night's rendition. In the symphony, Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, however, the Boston leader reached a very high point of artistic excellence. In this the orchestra played with most vigorous and artistic feeling. In the strength and powerful sweep of the cadences, it would be difficult to equal, certainly to surpass, this fine performance. Altogether, in exquisite poetry of feeling and delicate beauty, particularly on the strings, Mr. Nikisch does not touch Mr. Thomas, and in the sentimentality and artificiality of his Wagner reading he cannot be mentioned in the same breath with Seidl's overwhelming greatness in the interpretation of "Tristan."

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1889

MR. NIKISCH'S DEBUT IN PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Dec. 18.—[SPECIAL.]—Mr. Nikisch scored another great success by his debut in the Academy of Music here tonight. The enormous theatre was nearly wholly filled with a representative audience, which was immensely enthusiastic. The programme:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Piano concerto ..... Litolff
"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
D minor symphony ..... Schumann

The beautiful interpretation of the overture did not fail to produce the enthusiasm which it so justly deserves. With each additional hearing of this work one cannot but feel overgrowing admiration for the really thoughtful manner in which it is read. Greater familiarity with this really wonderful conductor's methods certainly conveys the impression that whether what he does is right or not, it is most certainly the result of very deep study and determined artistic convictions. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler played again the Litolff concerto. With all respect for her excellent methods, it must be admitted that a second hearing of this tiresome work only confirms the impression already chronicled in these columns. It is hopelessly dull and uninteresting, and, worse than that, it is often unmusical. Mrs. Zeisler played very well. "Les Preludes" was very finely played and very warmly received, and for the fifth time the Schumann symphony was simply superb in every detail of conception and execution. As in New York, there seems to be but one opinion here among the critics and amateurs. They seem to feel that Mr. Nikisch has taken the beautiful orchestral machine so carefully and skilfully constructed by his predecessor and "imbued the matter with life." There is no doubt that a most genuine and unqualified success may be chronicled.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE METRONOME

PUBLISHED MONTHLY,

ESTABLISHED JANUARY, 1885.

PUBLISHED AT 6 4TH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 11.—Among the many queer things encountered in musical circles may be mentioned several of Mr. Nikisch's symphony programmes, the one for last week's concert being, perhaps, as peculiar in construction as any, and consisting of Haydn's Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Who ever heard of so pronounced a symphony programme as the foregoing? But it has this advantage, at least, that in construction it pleases all the critics, a certain faction of which have contended that the symphony should occupy the first place on the programme; another faction have, with equal vigor of speech, insisted upon its appearance in the middle; while a third, and by no means insignificant, faction have endeavored to demonstrate that its rightful place was as the closing number. So we see Mr. Nikisch has for once pleased all hands, in a measure. Then, for contrast, let us glance at the programme announced for this week's concert, which is as follows,—"Anacreon" overture, Cherubini; Concerto for 'cello, Eckert, Norwegian Raphsody, Svendsen; "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra, Brusch; Symphony in E, Goetz—Leo Schultz 'cello soloist. Here we have a programme of five numbers, two of which introduce the same leading instrument, the violincello. This same sort of thing has occurred at least once preyiously during the present season, and is an innovation that csnnot be looked upon with favor by musicians. It would scarcely be tolerated in a concert by any of our local orchestras or military bands, and, even if tolerated, would be considered in bad form and occasion much comment. There is, then, absolutely nothing to be said in favor of such action, and considerable to be said against it. With such vast artistic resources as are possessed by this organization it does not seem necessary to listen to two solos by the same performer on the same occasion. A much more interesting style of programme is that of the first of fhe season's "Young People s Popular Concerts," which is to be given on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 14, by the same orchestra, and for which Mr. Nikisch announces the following selections:—Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Vocalaria, Mme. Alves; (a) Sigfried Idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demerseman, soloist, Mr. Chas. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. The flute concerto will be performed for the first time in America, and it is unnecessary to state in advance that Mr. Mole will give a most excellent rendition of the work, for he is unquestionably one of the most skillful artists who have ever visited our shores. The writer has had many opportunities to hear him in private, where he was not called upon to give as finished performances as would be expected in public; but even then his tone and execution were as perfect as at any performance of the Symphony Orchestra; and in the hands of no other performer have we ever witnessed such wonderfel control of every detail in the manipulation of the Boehm flute as is shown by this admirable artist. Not that he is the only flutist in the world; that is mere nonsense; but it would do some of the advocates of the ordinary flute a power of good to spend a few dollars in learning to "go and do likewise."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

TUESDAY DECEMBER 17

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusual Success for the Boston Orchestra. The House Not Well Filled.

The first concert this season of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Hyperion last night was an unusual success. Such small drawbacks as a house that ought to have been better filled and a railroad accident which delayed the beginning of the concert until a quarter before nine, were at once forgotten at the first strains of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." This interesting work was rendered with a perfection and poetic coloring seldom heard. Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, seems not to have been too highly praised. He possesses above all not only a remarkable control over his men but also over himself, and realizes what so few conductors seem willing to acknowledge, that the influence over the body of musicians they are, as it were, to play upon, is almo t exclusively gained by degrees at rehearsals, and that no amount of squirming and contortions in the concert room will add what has not already been accomplished. Mr. Nikisch's manner has a happy combination of dignity, quiet but absolute command and modesty. His reading of Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," showed unusual composure, finish of detail, and freedom from the almost universal fault of too quick tempi. Of course Mr. Nikisch found his band in a very high state of mechanical perfection as it left Mr. Gericke's hands. The real extent of his power as a leader can only be determined after a longer trial.

The soloist, Mr. Hepping, first cellist of the orchestra, was very warmly received. His command over the technique of his instrument is absolute, his intonation remarkably pure, his tone brilliant, but perhaps rather more sensational than soulful.

The concerts promise to be extremely interesting and profitable. It will be a sad testimonial of New Haven's taste if they are not greeted by full houses.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1889.

THE "SYMPHONY" WAS THERE.

Our Orchestra Helps Dedicate a New Music Hall in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20.—A large and handsome lecture and music hall, which cost $200,000 and stands on the site of the old Lincoln Hall, was dedicated tonight under the auspices of such well-known ladies as Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. J. C. Bancroft and Mrs. Jeanette M. Thurber.

A thoroughly enjoyed musical entertainment was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and representatives of the faculty of the National Conservatory of Music, including Theophile Manoury, director of the vocal department; Miss Adele Margulies, pianist; Leopold Lichtenberg, violin; Victor Herbert, cello, and Rafael Joseffy, pianist. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was Arthur Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Washington.

Boston Post.

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1889

THE SYMPHONY AT BALTIMORE.

Mr. Nikisch Scores Another Great Triumph —Honest Criticism.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 19.—[SPECIAL.]—In spite of the bad weather which so persistently follows the first journey of the Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, the Lyceum Theatre in this city was crowded with a fashionable and music-loving audience, which listened to the following programme with close attention:

Overture—"Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Piano concerto in G ..... Rubinstein
Les Preludes ..... Liszt
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

The overture was beautifully played, and was very effective. Mr. Carl Faelten of the New England Conservatory played the concerto finely as to technique, and with fire and spirit, but it is not a very interesting work, as it is almost wholly devoid of thematic development, and not sufficiently original or melodious to counteract its lack of consecutive musical construction. It is almost impossible to describe how beautifully "Les Preludes" sounded in this house. It was, moreover, admirably played, and the prolonged applause at the close was the best possible proof of the genuine impression which it made upon the audience. Of course, the musical climax of the concert was the immortal symphony. It is certain that a second hearing of this work under Mr. Nickisch more than confirms all that was said on the occasion of its recent performance in Boston. It is indeed a superb interpretation, and probably if such people as were dissatisfied on a first hearing were to have the opportunity of listening again to Mr. Nikisch's ideas on this subject they would be easily converted. If there is any truth in the "vox populi, vox Dei" theory, the Baltimore public has set the seal of its unqualified approval upon this conductor's manner of presenting Beethoven's masterpieces. The musicians and music lovers in this part of the world seem to be wholly free from the besetting sin of captiousness and hypercriticism which is often seen in Boston to such an extent. The really beautiful music which Mr. Nikisch has given the people on this trip has not only gone straight to their intellects, but, more than that, it has opened a place for him in their hearts which few conductors have ever won for themselves in so short a time. After these splendid concerts, it is an unalloyed pleasure to see the open, honest manner in which the audiences express their delight; the applause also constantly excites the orchestra to greater efforts, and the enthusiasm transmits itself to each individual. When the music is good, why not applaud? Ought we not to think for a moment, and then, perhaps, blush a little, when we see that in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore there has been no discordant view to mar the complete success of the work by our new conductor. It would seem as if these people were more honest in their criticism than we are. They also knew Mr. Nikisch's predecessor, and owed many pleasant and delightful evenings to his artistic work, but they are apparently not so given over to comparisons as we are, and the fact that they admired Mr. Gericke does not make it impossible for them to also admire Mr. Nikisch. In short, they seem to really love music enough to listen to it and enjoy it for its own sake.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

A Brilliant Audience Last Evening Attended the Formal Opening.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 20, 1889. Lincoln Music Hall was opened this evening to the public by a grand concert for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Musically and socially the event was one of the chief events of the season. Socially the benefit was under the patronage of the most distinguished ladies in Washington, its special patrons being Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman, Mrs. John Chandler Bancroft and Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, and among the ladies under whose auspices the concert was given were Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Justice Gray, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan and Mme. de Hercado, Countess de Sponneck and Baroness Rosen of the diplomatic corps. Most of the seats in the house were sold at $5 each, and the admonition on the tickets to come in evening dress was pretty generally obeyed. Nearly all the society people of Washington were present, and the costumes in the boxes and the orchestra circle were very elegant. The Boston Symphony orchestra and the National Conservatory of Music, New York, united to make the musical event notable. Director Nikisch made his first bow to a Washington audience. He was very cordially received, and the orchestra, which is well known in Washington, fully sustained its exceptionally high reputation. Miss Marie Decca sung an aria from the "Magic Flute," and a duo with M. Manonroy of the National Conservatory, who also sung an aria from "Massenet's Herodiade." Joseffy played once alone, and once with Miss Adele Margulies, also of the National Conservatory, the latter number being arranged for two pianos. The other soloists were Mr. Theodore Lichtenburg and Mr. Victor Herbert. The audience was most enthusiastic, and the orchestra and soloists were applauded over and over, but the programme as originally fixed was a long one, and no encores were rendered. Lincoln Music Hall gives Washington one more theatre, and affords almost the only place for occasional concerts. The decoration is not completed, but the hall promises to be a handsome one, and its acoustic properties are good. It is of moderate proportions.

[45]

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 18, 1889.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is no disparagement to our own excellent orchestral organizations to say that the annual visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as important in their line as any entertainments that occur in this city, not excepting the notable concerts of the Philharmonic Society. We have no instrumental body which is kept at work throughout the season every week under the guidance of one man, and our bands cannot be expected to achieve those high results which are to be reached only through constant and vigorous drill. Last night's concert, the first given here this season by the excellent players from Boston, was made more than commonly interesting by the début here of the new conductor of the band, Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The programme was, with the exception of one number, made up of compositions quite familiar to this public. The number referred to was Brahms's violin concerto in D, opus 77. From the interesting remarks in the programme book by G. H. Wilson we extract the following: "This concerto was written expressly for Dr. Joachim, who played the solo part when it was first performed in public at a concert at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, on the evening of New Year's Day, 1879. It is in the same key as the symphony from the pen of its composer which preceded it; and some critics have discovered a certain family likeness between the two works, particularly as regards the first movement. In form the concerto is a strict classic. Even Mendelssohn's innovations are passed over by Brahms, who writes in three separate movements, with tuttis, soli, and cadenzas, &c., just where his predecessors, Mozart, Beethoven, and Spohr would expect to find them; yet the details and spirit of the work are essentially modern. It is, moreover, a composition in which the solo part is subjective.

"From that point in the first movement leading to the usual pause and cadenza, Brahms permits the performer to step in and fill the gap. Mr. Kneisel has written a cadenza which rests in part upon subjects contained in the movement of which it becomes a link. Apart from the musical interest the cadenza possesses, it stands as the first example in composition by the present concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard here."

No objection need be made to the composer's return to the early form of the classical concerto, though it is not the wisest plan to leave the cadenza to the pleasure of the soloist. However, when his work is so well done as Mr. Kneisel's, the result is happy. The concerto is a good piece of composition, somewhat austere in spirit, but fluent, symmetrical, and wholly intelligible. The last assertion cannot always be made in regard to Brahms's music. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the work was a very beautiful exhibition of violin playing, round, pure, and sympathetic in tone, scholarly in phrasing, clean in bowing, accurate in stopping, and carefully studied in every detail. His playing of his own cadenza was masterly and aroused the warmest kind of enthusiasm, which broke forth again at the close of the number. That the soloist, appearing before an audience in whose ears the witchery of Sarasate was so fresh, should have been so heartily applauded was a high tribute to his ability. Mr. Kneisel is an artist, and he will always be welcomed in this city.

The orchestra played the overture to "Euryanthe," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's ever-lovely D minor symphony. The readers of this journal have already had extended comment on Mr. Nikisch's qualities as a conductor. It is not necessary, therefore, to say much at this time. His reading of the "Euryanthe" overture was admirable, but it would undoubtedly have gained in impressiveness had he imparted a more vigorous movement to the final allegro.

The "Tristan" vorspiel was read nobly. The announcement of the opening motive was pregnant with dramatic power, the crescendo in the 'cello phrase being most effective. The tremendous climax, one of the mightiest utterances in all music, was given with great breadth and dignity, and with a magnificently-expressive balance of the interwoven voice parts. But the conductor's finest achievement was in the symphony. It was played in a marvelously fine manner. The performance of it showed that Mr. Nikisch could make an orchestra not only sing, but also declaim, a feature which was equally conspicuous in the cantabile passage of the overture. Under this leader the orchestra does not, it is true, achieve such exquisite polish as it did under Mr. Gericke, but it reveals something far better—a grand sweep of power and a masterful dramatic force. That Mr. Nikisch was successful last night is beyond a question, and New-York has almost as much reason to be thankful for his presence in America as Boston ought to have.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH WELCOMED.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN STEINWAY HALL UNDER THE NEW LEADER.

An immense audience gathered in Steinway Hall last night to welcome to this city Herr Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to listen to what this excellent body of musicians would make of the admirable programme announced.

No happier selection could have been made than the list arranged. It was a programme essentially modern in spirit, and yet not aggressively so. It presented that wonderful tone-picture, the prelude to "Tristan," which Berlioz once called a "chromatic wail without musical meaning," and Brahms' violin concerto in D. But, upon the other hand, the conservatives could take comfort in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and one of the most beautiful symphonies in existence—that of Schumann in C minor.

Herr Nikisch is a young and handsome fellow who takes his task with extreme seriousness. In manner he resembles Bulow as a conductor. He is not content with beating time; he literally leads his orchestra. He is the master musician, playing upon a vast instrument made up of many players. This, of course, is the highest function of the ideal leader. Herr Nikisch has nothing of the metronome in him. His mood changes with every bar of the music.

It will naturally be asked, How does the Boston orchestra's work under Herr Nikisch compare with its work under his predecessor, Herr Gericke? The difference was felt in the first dozen bars of the "Euryanthe" overture, and steadily accented during the evening. The famous band, which Boston owes to the generosity of Mr. Higginson, is not so wonderful an instrument as it was, but it is handled with greater freedom. Whether upon the whole there is gain or loss depends upon taste.

I am inclined to think, judging from last night's achievements, that, so far as New York is concerned, Mr. Gericke's orchestra was more of a wonder than Mr. Nikisch's will ever be. Our own orchestra can give us concerts every whit as perfect as that of last night, whereas in certain respects—finish, delicacy, beauty and balance of tone—the Boston band under Herr Gericke was unrivalled in this country.

To leave comparison aside, last night's concert was a beautiful one, and was applauded with the heartiness it deserved. The band played throughout, notably in the symphony, with splendid vigor and musical spirit, and Herr Kneisel's playing of the Brahms concerto was admirable in many respects. Mr. Kneisel was recalled many times, and at the close of the concert Herr Nikisch received

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1889.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS CONDUCTOR.

Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Bow in New York.

Steinway Hall was crowded last night with a musical audience, the attraction being the first appearance in New York of Arthur Nikisch, the new leader of Boston's well-known Symphony Orchestra. There had been so much said of the splendid work done by the new conductor by the Boston critics, that there was a natural curiosity on the part of New Yorkers to hear him. The Symphony Orchestra's work was well known. Much was said of it here in praise and blame when it came under the leadership of Mr. Gericke. It was a splendidly trained organization; its renditions were marked by a superb finish, but it was generally admitted that this finish had been gained at the expense of what may briefly be called the soul.

Reports from Boston were to the effect that Mr. McKisch had brought about a spiritual regeneration of Mr. Higginson's forces, that he had been able to effect wonders on the basis of drilled excellence left by Gericke. Consequently people went to Steinway Hall last night with the expectation of delightful surprises. The new conductor made his appearance promptly and was received with slight recognition. He took his position on a very high platform and proceeded to conduct without a score. He is a surprisingly young man, dark and dapper, resembling somewhat Reinhold Hermann. His gestures are restrained and his movements like those of a polished actor. He began with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," of which he gave a very good if not brilliant rendering. Under him the orchestra had evidently gained in this much in dramatic expression, in clearness of phrasing, in precision and strength of attack, but the rendition of the overture as a whole was not distinguished by the breadth and beauty such as have often been given to it. The second number was Brakin's concerto for violin and orchestra in D (op. 77), the soloist being Mr. Kneisel, the concertmeister of the organization. It may be sufficient to say here that Mr. Kneisel, coming as he did after Sarasate, made a most brilliant success, and had four or five recalls.

The interest of the evening was of course with the new conductor, whose next number was the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," a work which is very familiar to all concert audiences. In this it must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch did only respectably. It was, in fact, scarcely Wagner at all. The overture as rendered by the Bostonians had nothing of the thrilling intensity that Seidl gives to it that carries an audience away with the throbbing woes of two unfortunate lovers. It had nothing of Wagner's genius in it. It was too calm, too studied, too sleepy and without a breath of inspiration. Seidl and Thomas as Wagner conductors rose immeasurably under its last night's rendition. In the symphony, Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, however, the Boston leader reached a very high point of artistic excellence. In this the orchestra played with most vigorous and artistic feeling. In the strength and powerful sweep of the cadences, it would be difficult to equal, certainly to surpass, this fine performance. Altogether, in exquisite poetry of feeling and delicate beauty, particularly on the strings, Mr. Nikisch does not touch Mr. Thomas, and in the sentimentality and artificiality of his Wagner reading he cannot be mentioned in the same breath with Seidl's overwhelming greatness in the interpretation of "Tristan."

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1889

MR. NIKISCH'S DEBUT IN PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Dec. 18.—[SPECIAL.]—Mr. Nikisch scored another great success by his debut in the Academy of Music here tonight. The enormous theatre was nearly wholly filled with a representative audience, which was immensely enthusiastic. The programme:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Piano concerto ..... Litoiff
"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
D minor symphony ..... Schumann

The beautiful interpretation of the overture did not fail to produce the enthusiasm which it so justly deserves. With each additional hearing of this work one cannot but feel overgrowing admiration for the really thoughtful manner in which it is read. Greater familiarity with this really wonderful conductor's methods certainly conveys the impression that whether what he does is right or not, it is most certainly the result of very deep study and determined artistic convictions. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler played again the Litolff concerto. With all respect for her excellent methods, it must be admitted that a second hearing of this tiresome work only confirms the impression already chronicled in these columns. It is hopelessly dull and uninteresting, and, worse than that, it is often unmusical. Mrs. Zeisler played very well. "Les Preludes" was very finely played and very warmly received, and for the fifth time the Schumann symphony was simply superb in every detail of conception and execution. As in New York, there seems to be but one opinion here among the critics and amateurs. They seem to feel that Mr. Nikisch has taken the beautiful orchestral machine so carefully and skilfully constructed by his predecessor and "imbued the matter with life." There is no doubt that a most genuine and unqualified success may be chronicled.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE METRONOME

PUBLISHED MONTHLY,

ESTABLISHED JANUARY, 1885.

PUBLISHED AT 6 4TH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 11.—Among the many queer things encountered in musical circles may be mentioned several of Mr. Nikisch's symphony programmes, the one for last week's concert being, perhaps, as peculiar in construction as any, and consisting of Haydn's Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Who ever heard of so pronounced a symphony programme as the foregoing? But it has this advantage, at least, that in construction it pleases all the critics, a certain faction of which have contended that the symphony should occupy the first place on the programme; another faction have, with equal vigor of speech, insisted upon its appearance in the middle; while a third, and by no means insignificant, factiön have endeavored to demonstrate that its rightful place was as the closing number. So we see Mr. Nikisch has for once pleased all hands, in a measure. Then, for contrast, let us glance at the programme announced for this week's concert, which is as follows,—"Anacreon" overture, Cherubini; Concerto for 'cello, Eckert, Norwegian Raphsody, Svendsen; "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra, Brusch; Symphony in E, Goetz—Leo Schultz 'cello soloist. Here we have a programme of five numbers, two of which introduce the same leading instrument, the violincello. This same sort of thing has occurred at least once previously during the present season, and is an innovation that cannot be looked upon with favor by musicians. It would scarcely be tolerated in a concert by any of our local orchestras or military bands, and, even if tolerated, would be considered in bad form and occasion much comment. There is, then, absolutely nothing to be said in favor of such action, and considerable to be said against it. With such vast artistic resources as are possessed by this organization it does not seem necessary to listen to two solos by the same performer on the same occasion. A much more interesting style of programme is that of the first of the season's "Young People's Popular Concerts," which is to be given on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 14, by the same orchestra, and for which Mr. Nikisch announces the following selections:—Overture, 'Barber of Seville," Rossini; Vocalaria, Mme. Alves; (a) Sigfried Idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demerseman, soloist, Mr. Chas. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. The flute concerto will be performed for the first time in America, and it is unnecessary to state in advance that Mr. Mole will give a most excellent rendition of the work, for he is unquestionably one of the most skillful artists who have ever visited our shores. The writer has had many opportunities to hear him in private, where he was not called upon to give as finished performances as would be expected in public; but even then his tone and execution were as perfect as at any performance of the Symphony Orchestra; and in the hands of no other performer have we ever witnessed such wonderfel control of every detail in the manipulation of the Boehm flute as is shown by this admirable artist. Not that he is the only flutist in the world; that is mere nonsense; but it would do some of the advocates of the ordinary flute a power of good to spend a few dollars in learning to "go and do likewise."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

TUESDAY DECEMBER 17

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusual Success for the Boston Orchestra. The House Not Well Filled.

The first concert this season of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Hyperion last night was an unusual success. Such small drawbacks as a house that ought to have been better filled and a railroad accident which delayed the beginning of the concert until a quarter before nine, were at once forgotten at the first strains of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." This interesting work was rendered with a perfection and poetic coloring seldom heard. Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, seems not to have been too highly praised. He possesses above all not only a remarkable control over his men but also over himself, and realizes what so few conductors seem willing to acknowledge, that the influence over the body of musicians they are, as it were, to play upon, is almost exclusively gained by degrees at rehearsals, and that no amount of squirming and contortions in the concert room will add what has not already been accomplished. Mr. Nikisch's manner has a happy combination of dignity, quiet but absolute command and modesty. His reading of Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," showed unusual composure, finish of detail, and freedom from the almost universal fault of too quick tempi. Of course Mr. Nikisch found his band in a very high state of mechanical perfection as it left Mr. Gericke's hands. The real extent of his power as a leader can only be determined after a longer trial.

The soloist, Mr. Hepping, first cellist of the orchestra, was very warmly received. His command over the technique of his instrument is absolute, his intonation remarkably pure, his tone brilliant, but perhaps rather more sensational than soulful.

The concerts promise to be extremely interesting and profitable. It will be a sad testimonial of New Haven's taste if they are not greeted by full houses.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1889.

THE "SYMPHONY" WAS THERE.

Our Orchestra Helps Dedicate a New Music Hall in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20.—A large and handsome lecture and music hall, which cost $200,000 and stands on the site of the old Lincoln Hall, was dedicated tonight under the auspices of such well-known ladies as Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. J. C. Bancroft and Mrs. Jeanette M. Thurber.

A thoroughly enjoyed musical entertainment was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and representatives of the faculty of the National Conservatory of Music, including Theophile Manoury, director of the vocal department; Miss Adele Margulies, pianist; Leopold Lichtenberg, violin; Victor Herbert, cello, and Rafael Joseffy, pianist. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was Arthur Nikisch, who made his first appearance in Washington.

Boston Post.

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1889

THE SYMPHONY AT BALTIMORE.

Mr. Nikisch Scores Another Great Triumph —Honest Criticism.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 19.—[SPECIAL.]—In spite of the bad weather which so persistently follows the first journey of the Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, the Lyceum Theatre in this city was crowded with a fashionable and music-loving audience, which listened to the following programme with close attention:

Overture—"Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Piano concerto in G ..... Rubinstein
Les Preludes ..... Liszt
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

The overture was beautifully played, and was very effective. Mr. Carl Faelten of the New England Conservatory played the concerto finely as to technique, and with fire and spirit, but it is not a very interesting work, as it is almost wholly devoid of thematic development, and not sufficiently original or melodious to counteract its lack of consecutive musical construction. It is almost impossible to describe how beautifully "Les Preludes" sounded in this house. It was, moreover, admirably played, and the prolonged applause at the close was the best possible proof of the genuine impression which it made upon the audience. Of course, the musical climax of the concert was the immortal symphony. It is certain that a second hearing of this work under Mr. Nickisch more than confirms all that was said on the occasion of its recent performance in Boston. It is indeed a superb interpretation, and probably if such people as were dissatisfied on a first hearing were to have the opportunity of listening again to Mr. Nikisch's ideas on this subject they would be easily converted. If there is any truth in the "vox populi, vox Dei" theory, the Baltimore public has set the seal of its unqualified approval upon this conductor's manner of presenting Beethoven's masterpieces. The musicians and music lovers in this part of the world seem to be wholly free from the besetting sin of captiousness and hypercriticism which is often seen in Boston to such an extent. The really beautiful music which Mr. Nikisch has given the people on this trip has not only gone straight to their intellects, but, more than that, it has opened a place for him in their hearts which few conductors have ever won for themselves in so short a time. After these splendid concerts, it is an unalloyed pleasure to see the open, honest manner in which the audiences express their delight; the applause also constantly excites the orchestra to greater efforts, and the enthusiasm transmits itself to each individual. When the music is good, why not applaud? Ought we not to think for a moment, and then, perhaps, blush a little, when we see that in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore there has been no discordant view to mar the complete success of the work by our new conductor. It would seem as if these people were more honest in their criticism than we are. They also knew Mr. Nikisch's predecessor, and owed many pleasant and delightful evenings to his artistic work, but they are apparently not so given over to comparisons as we are, and the fact that they admired Mr. Gericke does not make it impossible for them to also admire Mr. Nikisch. In short, they seem to really love music enough to listen to it and enjoy it for its own sake.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL.

A Brilliant Audience Last Evening Attended the Formal Opening.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 20, 1889. Lincoln Music Hall was opened this evening to the public by a grand concert for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Musically and socially the event was one of the chief events of the season. Socially the benefit was under the patronage of the most distinguished ladies in Washington, its special patrons being Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville W. Fuller, Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman, Mrs. John Chandler Bancroft and Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, and among the ladies under whose auspices the concert was given were Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Justice Gray, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan and Mme. de Marcado, Countess de Sponneck and Baroness Rosen of the diplomatic corps. Most of the seats in the house were sold at $5 each, and the admonition on the tickets to come in evening dress was pretty generally obeyed. Nearly all the society people of Washington were present, and the costumes in the boxes and the orchestra circle were very elegant. The Boston Symphony orchestra and the National Conservatory of Music, New York, united to make the musical event notable. Director Nikisch made his first bow to a Washington audience. He was very cordially received, and the orchestra, which is well known in Washington, fully sustained its exceptionally high reputation. Miss Marie Decca sung an aria from the "Magic Flute," and a duo with M. Manonroy of the National Conservatory, who also sung an aria from "Massenet's Herodiade." Joseffy played once alone, and once with Miss Adele Margulies, also of the National Conservatory, the latter number being arranged for two pianos. The other soloists were Mr. Theodore Lichtenburg and Mr. Victor Herbert. The audience was most enthusiastic, and the orchestra and soloists were applauded over and over, but the programme as originally fixed was a long one, and no encores were rendered. Lincoln Music Hall gives Washington one more theatre, and affords almost the only place for occasional concerts. The decoration is not completed, but the hall promises to be a handsome one, and its acoustic properties are good. It is of moderate proportions.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1889

MR. NIKISCH CAPTURES WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20.—[SPECIAL.]—The opening of the new Lincoln Music Hall in this city for the benefit of the children's hospital was socially and musically a most brilliant affair. Official, diplomatic and social circles were all well represented. The person chiefly concerned was Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, to whom the musical world in general and this hospital in particular already owe a great deal. The house itself is a rather cheaply constructed theatre, and it is not quite clear why it should be called a music hall. The Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch, was the chief attraction of the long and varied programme, and they never played better. The numbers assigned to the orchestra—Meistersinger vorspiel, Wagner; Sinte Norvegienne, Svendsen; Les Preludes, Liszt, and the invitation a la valse, Weber—were all grandly played. The audience was enthusiastic after each number. Joseffy gave a superb performance of the Liszt piano concerto in A major, and our old Boston favorite, Leopold Lichtenberg, played the last two movements of the Mendelssohn violin concerto with all his accustomed skill and lovely tone. The popular 'cellist, Mr. Victor Hubert, played delightfully. The two singers, Miss Marie Decca and M. Theophile Manowry, were not so successful as might have been wished, as Miss Decca's performance, although her voice is well trained and flexible, was marred by her uncertain intonation, and the new French baritone is wholly given over to the vibrato school. The hearty applause proved conclusively that our new conductor has also added Washington to his list of musical conquests. The whole trip has been an unbroken success, and musicians hereabouts are all only too willing to cry out, "Long live Nikisch!" ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala"
Litolff, Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, op. 45.
Wagner.....Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"
Schumann.....Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52

The third concerto of Henry Litolff was written at Amsterdam in 1846. At the beginning of this year Litolff went to England to arrange family matters; i. e., to procure a separation from his wife, who for several years had not lived with him. The parents of the young woman lured him to London; an action-at-law was brought against him, and he was condemned to pay a large sum to this family. Litolff did not have the money and he was imprisoned for debt. After a few months he escaped and went to Holland, where as pianist and composer he was most successful. This third concerto, played by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeigler, the soloist of last Saturday, is a curious work. It is pompous, it is fantastic, it is irritating to the nerves; the commonplace and the extraordinary are tangled together. It is plainly our old friend, the Litolff of the "Robespierre" overture, who this time takes the Dutch national hymn for the subject of his finale and the starting point of strange digressions. Although the concerto is not of real musical worth, and although it may have seemed unworthy of the attention of Mrs. Zeigler, to the student of musical history it was an interesting number. It showed the taste of the concert goers of forty years ago, for Litolff, wherever he went, whether he played his concertos in France, Belgium, Poland, Germany, or Holland, was frantically applauded. It is well to remember the inevitable changes in taste. It is not at all impossible that in the year 1932 the lovers of music will look at the concertos of Johannes Brahms and say "Did audiences forty or fifty years ago really enjoy this music? It would be well if some of our pianists would give us the opportunity of hearing it."

Mrs. Zeigler played it with clearness, equality and brilliancy. It is an open question whether our enormous halls and our grand pianofortes have not injuriously affected the art of piano playing. The piano is an instrument of limited resources, far better fitted for chamber music and for recitals in small halls than for a life-and-death struggle with a modern orchestra in an "auditorium." And without the slightest disrespect to either Mrs. Zeigler, whom under any circumstances it is a delight to hear, or to charming Adele Aus der Ohe, who plays next week, the inevitable pianoforte concerto incites too often merely popular wonder at physical endurance, and it suggests a gymnastic suit as a more appropriate costume than the conventional evening dress.

The "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, with its glowing color and Eastern sensuousness, was exceedingly well played, in fact, better played than the "Tristan" prelude with its one theme of chromatic groaning, to borrow an expression of Berlioz. Some of Wagner's most exquisite progressions were roughly treated; for noise is not an equivalent of sound, and the moment an instrument is "overblown" it ceases to be a musical instrument. Any one who has had the pleasure of hearing an orchestra under Wagner's direction knows how careful he was that the "tone" should be pure, however extraordinary or difficult the passage played.

It is perhaps useless to speak of the extreme narrowness of these symphony programs. Vials of wrath were poured upon the head of Mr. Gericke for his alleged lack of catholicity. But in comparison with Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Gericke would seem to be a dangerous man; a musical Marat.

The next rehearsal and concert take place Dec. 27 and 28.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, Dec 18th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH. Managers of Philadelphia Concerts.

LYCEUM THEATRE, - BALTIMORE.

Thursday Evening, Dec 19th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH. Managers of Baltimore Concerts.

[illegible]

[illegible] MAISCH AS LEADER. [46]

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theatre.

A SKETCH OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

Magnificent Organization—Assisted by Mr. Carl Faelten—The Audience Unusually Enthusiastic—Other Musical Matters—"Carmen" by Amateurs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, has come and gone, and musical Baltimore is weighing the conductor in the balance with his predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke. It is an unthankful office for a musician to feel that he is to be judged principally by comparison, and particularly when that comparison is made with one who enjoyed an immense popularity and whose departure was spoken of with unconcealed regret. Such was the case with the audience at the Lyceum Theatre last night, as the predominant feeling was one of curiosity. That it was a thoroughly friendly curiosity, however, mingled with a feeling of interest in, and desire for the success of the new conductor, was manifest at the outset, as Herr Nikisch was greeted with hearty applause, which showed at once that the audience was disposed to do him full justice for his work.

The first number was Mendelssohn's beautiful overture, "Fingal's Cave," which was performed in splendid style. Herr Nikisch led the orchestra in this number entirely without the score, as he does with everything but accompaniments to concertos. In his directing he shows warmth and enthusiasm, but is quiet and graceful withal. He is earnest and energetic, and seems to be an embodiment of each instrument, and not merely a "beater of time." His baton seems to express the whole spirit of the music and to indicate the phrasing, intensity and emotion of each passage.

During the first part of the programme the audience was not aroused to any great degree of enthusiasm, and it was not until the second orchestral selection, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, that the efforts of the musicians were fully appreciated. After that number there could be no doubt of the unanimous approval of the audience, which listened to the wonderful performance with a breathless interest amounting to nervous tension, and at the close broke out into round after round of applause.

The "symphonic poem" was performed in superb style, and was aglow with life and feeling. It seemed to grasp the powers of the orchestra, and carried its hearers along gradually from the delicate strains at the beginning to the magnificent climax at the end, in which the strength of the strings was wonderfully effective.

The third orchestral number was the C minor symphony of Beethoven, which was most eagerly anticipated, being familiar to every one present. The performance of no piece in the repertoire of the Boston Orchestra has raised such a fire of criticism as that of the great fifth symphony. It has been said that it was unlike any other interpretation that had been heard before, that it was consequently not Beethoven, and was neither artistic nor musically interesting; while others have declared that never before has the great work been so nobly performed. The performance of the work last night was thoroughly interesting, and if the interpretation differed from the established ideas, it had at any rate the merit of power and originality. The opening passage was in itself a surprise, being much more strongly marked and accentuated than usual. This was the striking characteristic throughout the work, which was filled with emotional dramatic energy, and the dynamic contrasts of forte and piano, in which Beethoven is so powerful, were strongly brought out. The leader seemed to feel deeply every note that was played, and it was no wonder that the orchestra felt inspired to do its best with the influence and spirit of the earnest and enthusiastic figure before it. The very fact of the director leading without the score seemed to enable him to give his whole attention to the players and to enter heart and soul into his work. There is no doubt that Herr Nikisch has succeeded in infusing into the orchestra more tone and warmth of coloring than it formerly had. The orchestra had been trained up to a standard of remarkable finish and precision by Director Gericke, and it needed just the elements of life and vigor which Herr Nikisch has brought to it. The material, as Herr Nikisch said, after leading the orchestra in Boston, is magnificent and compares favorably with the finest orchestras in Europe, thus paying his predecessor a high compliment, as there are but few changes in membership under the new regime.

The leadership of the Boston Orchestra is unquestionably the most prominent musical position in America, as it is the only permanent organization of its kind, and it is fortunate in securing the services of a director like Nikisch, who has been classed as one of the great quartette of German conductors—Richter, Levy, Motte and Nikisch. Herr Nikisch has had ample experience in conducting, as from his earliest childhood he has been associated with orchestras and leaders in practical work. Born of musical parents, and with every advantage of artistic surroundings and thorough instruction, he early evinced decided musical talent, and at the age of eight appeared in public as a performer upon the violin and met with remarkable success. His principal studies were carried on at the Royal Conservatory in Vienna, and included organ and violin playing, harmony and technical branches of composition, graduating with high honors in all, but showing particular talent for conducting. He then obtained a position in the Royal Opera Orchestra among the first violinists, and received there invaluable experience in orchestral work under celebrated conductors, among whom was Hans Richter, the famous Bayreuth director. He afterward conducted a celebrated orchestra in Leipzig, where he remained until his American engagement.

Professor Carl Faelton was the soloist and performed Rubinstein's piano-concerto in G. Mr. Faelton was formerly instructor in piano at the Peabody Conservatory, and is now connected with the New England Conservatory. He was given a cordial reception by his many admirers and was enthusiastically applauded. He played in his usual excellent and finished style and interpreted the concerto with brilliancy and vigor. He was twice recalled at the close.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1889

MR. NIKISCH CAPTURES WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20.—[SPECIAL.]—The opening of the new Lincoln Music Hall in this city for the benefit of the children's hospital was socially and musically a most brilliant affair. Official, diplomatic and social circles were all well represented. The person chiefly concerned was Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, to whom the musical world in general and this hospital in particular already owe a great deal. The house itself is a rather cheaply constructed theatre, and it is not quite clear why it should be called a music hall. The Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch, was the chief attraction of the long and varied programme, and they never played better. The numbers assigned to the orchestra—Meistersinger vorspiel, Wagner; Sinte Norvegienne, Svendsen; Les Preludes, Liszt, and the invitation a la valse, Weber—were all grandly played. The audience was enthusiastic after each number. Joseffy gave a superb performance of the Liszt piano concerto in A major, and our old Boston favorite, Leopold Lichtenberg, played the last two movements of the Mendelssohn violin concerto with all his accustomed skill and lovely tone. The popular 'cellist, Mr. Victor Hubert, played delightfully. The two singers, Miss Marie Decca and M. Theophile Manowry, were not so successful as might have been wished, as Miss Decca's performance, although her voice is well trained and flexible, was marred by her uncertain intonation, and the new French baritone is wholly given over to the vibrato school. The hearty applause proved conclusively that our new conductor has also added Washington to his list of musical conquests. The whole trip has been an unbroken success, and musicians hereabouts are all only too willing to cry out, "Long live Nikisch!" ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala"
Litolff, Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, op. 45.
Wagner.....Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"
Schumann.....Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52

The third concerto of Henry Litolff was written at Amsterdam in 1846. At the beginning of this year Litolff went to England to arrange family matters; i. e., to procure a separation from his wife, who for several years had not lived with him. The parents of the young woman lured him to London; an action-at-law was brought against him, and he was condemned to pay a large sum to this family. Litolff did not have the money and he was imprisoned for debt. After a few months he escaped and went to Holland, where as pianist and composer he was most successful. This third concerto, played by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeigler, the soloist of last Saturday, is a curious work. It is pompous, it is fantastic, it is irritating to the nerves; the commonplace and the extraordinary are tangled together. It is plainly our old friend, the Litolff of the "Robespierre" overture, who this time takes the Dutch national hymn for the subject of his finale and the starting point of strange digressions. Although the concerto is not of real musical worth, and although it may have seemed unworthy of the attention of Mrs. Zeigler, to the student of musical history it was an interesting number. It showed the taste of the concert goers of forty years ago, for Litolff, wherever he went, whether he played his concertos in France, Belgium, Poland, Germany, or Holland, was frantically applauded. It is well to remember the inevitable changes in taste. It is not at all impossible that in the year 1932 the lovers of music will look at the concertos of Johannes Brahms and say "Did audiences forty or fifty years ago really enjoy this music? It would be well if some of our pianists would give us the opportunity of hearing it."

Mrs. Zeigler played it with clearness, equality and brilliancy. It is an open question whether our enormous halls and our grand pianofortes have not injuriously affected the art of piano playing. The piano is an instrument of limited resources, far better fitted for chamber music and for recitals in small halls than for a life-and-death struggle with a modern orchestra in an "auditorium." And without the slightest disrespect to either Mrs. Zeigler, whom under any circumstances it is a delight to hear, or to charming Adele Aus der Ohe, who plays next week, the inevitable pianoforte concerto incites too often merely popular wonder at physical endurance, and it suggests a gymnastic suit as a more appropriate costume than the conventional evening dress.

The "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, with its glowing color and Eastern sensuousness, was exceedingly well played, in fact, better played than the "Tristan" prelude with its one theme of chromatic groaning, to borrow an expression of Berlioz. Some of Wagner's most exquisite progressions were roughly treated; for noise is not an equivalent of sound, and the moment an instrument is "overblown" it ceases to be a musical instrument. Any one who has had the pleasure of hearing an orchestra under Wagner's direction knows how careful he was that the "tone" should be pure, however extraordinary or difficult the passage played.

It is perhaps useless to speak of the extreme narrowness of these symphony programs. Vials of wrath were poured upon the head of Mr. Gericke for his alleged lack of catholicity. But in comparison with Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Gericke would seem to be a dangerous man; a musical Marat.

The next rehearsal and concert take place Dec. 27 and 28.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, Dec 18th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH. Managers of Philadelphia Concerts,

LYCEUM THEATRE, - BALTIMORE.

Thursday Evening, Dec 19th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH. Managers of Baltimore Concerts,

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, FRIDAY, DEC. 20, 1889.

46

NIKISCH AS LEADER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theatre.

A SKETCH OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

Magnificent Organization—Assisted by Mr. Carl Faelten—The Audience Unusually Enthusiastic—Other Musical Matters—"Carmen" by Amateurs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, has come and gone, and musical Baltimore is weighing the conductor in the balance with his predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke. It is an unthankful office for a musician to feel that he is to be judged principally by comparison, and particularly when that comparison is made with one who enjoyed an immense popularity and whose departure was spoken of with unconcealed regret. Such was the case with the audience at the Lyceum Theatre last night, as the predominant feeling was one of curiosity. That it was a thoroughly friendly curiosity, however, mingled with a feeling of interest in, and desire for the success of the new conductor, was manifest at the outset, as Herr Nikisch was greeted with hearty applause, which showed at once that the audience was disposed to do him full justice for his work.

The first number was Mendelssohn's beautiful overture, "Fingal's Cave," which was performed in splendid style. Herr Nikisch led the orchestra in this number entirely without the score, as he does with everything but accompaniments to concertos. In his directing he shows warmth and enthusiasm, but is quiet and graceful withal. He is earnest and energetic, and seems to be an embodiment of each instrument, and not merely a "beater of time." His baton seems to express the whole spirit of the music and to indicate the phrasing, intensity and emotion of each passage.

During the first part of the programme the audience was not aroused to any great degree of enthusiasm, and it was not until the second orchestral selection, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, that the efforts of the musicians were fully appreciated. After that number there could be no doubt of the unanimous approval of the audience, which listened to the wonderful performance with a breathless interest amounting to nervous tension, and at the close broke out into round after round of applause.

The "symphonic poem" was performed in superb style, and was aglow with life and feeling. It seemed to grasp the powers of the orchestra, and carried its hearers along gradually from the delicate strains at the beginning to the magnificent climax at the end, in which the strength of the strings was wonderfully effective.

The third orchestral number was the C minor symphony of Beethoven, which was most eagerly anticipated, being familiar to every one present. The performance of no piece in the repertoire of the Boston Orchestra has raised such a fire of criticism as that of the great fifth symphony. It has been said that it was unlike any other interpretation that had been heard before, that it was consequently not Beethoven, and was neither artistic nor musically interesting; while others have declared that never before has the great work been so nobly performed. The performance of the work last night was thoroughly interesting, and if the interpretation differed from the established ideas, it had at any rate the merit of power and originality. The opening passage was in itself a surprise, being much more strongly marked and accentuated than usual. This was the striking characteristic throughout the work, which was filled with emotional dramatic energy, and the dynamic contrasts of forte and piano, in which Beethoven is so powerful, were strongly brought out. The leader seemed to feel deeply every note that was played, and it was no wonder that the orchestra felt inspired to do its best with the influence and spirit of the earnest and enthusiastic figure before it. The very fact of the director leading without the score seemed to enable him to give his whole attention to the players and to enter heart and soul into his work. There is no doubt that Herr Nikisch has succeeded in infusing into the orchestra more tone and warmth of coloring than it formerly had. The orchestra had been trained up to a standard of remarkable finish and precision by Director Gericke, and it needed just the elements of life and vigor which Herr Nikisch has brought to it. The material, as Herr Nikisch said, after leading the orchestra in Boston, is magnificent and compares favorably with the finest orchestras in Europe, thus paying his predecessor a high compliment, as there are but few changes in membership under the new regime.

The leadership of the Boston Orchestra is unquestionably the most prominent musical position in America, as it is the only permanent organization of its kind, and it is fortunate in securing the services of a director like Nikisch, who has been classed as one of the great quartette of German conductors—Richter, Levy, Motte and Nikisch. Herr Nikisch has had ample experience in conducting, as from his earliest childhood he has been associated with orchestras and leaders in practical work. Born of musical parents, and with every advantage of artistic surroundings and thorough instruction, he early evinced decided musical talent, and at the age of eight appeared in public as a performer upon the violin and met with remarkable success. His principal studies were carried on at the Royal Conservatory in Vienna, and included organ and violin playing, harmony and technical branches of composition, graduating with high honors in all, but showing particular talent for conducting. He then obtained a position in the Royal Opera Orchestra among the first violinists, and received there invaluable experience in orchestral work under celebrated conductors, among whom was Hans Richter, the famous Bayreuth director. He afterward conducted a celebrated orchestra in Leipzig, where he remained until his American engagement.

Professor Carl Faelton was the soloist and performed Rubinstein's piano-concerto in G. Mr. Faelton was formerly instructor in piano at the Peabody Conservatory, and is now connected with the New England Conservatory. He was given a cordial reception by his many admirers and was enthusiastically applauded. He played in his usual excellent and finished style and interpreted the concerto with brilliancy and vigor. He was twice recalled at the close.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[47]

GRAND ✦ INAUGURAL ✦ CONCERT,

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL,

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL,

Friday Evening, December 20th, 1889,

AT 8.30 O'CLOCK.

UNDER THE SPECIAL PATRONAGE OF

MRS. LEVI P. MORTON. MRS. LUCIUS TUCKERMAN.

MRS. JAMES G. BLAINE. MRS. JOHN CHANDLER BANCROFT.

MRS. MELVILLE W. FULLER. MRS. JEANETTE M. THURBER.

The Philadelphia [illegible]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1889.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert this season at the Academy last night. The orchestra has justly come to be regarded as the most important organization of its kind in the country. No other body of musicians is fortunate enough to play so constantly together, and under the same conductor. The individual players are artists of unquestioned skill, and from the beginning their work has been performed under the most favorable auspices. For this, Boston in particular, as well as the country at large, is indebted to the liberality of Mr. Higginson, the founder of the organization.

Arthur Nikisch.

Added to the intrinsic merits of this splendid body of musicians, last night's concert was rendered specially notable because of the first appearance here of the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who this year succeeds to Mr. Gericke's position. Mr. Nikisch is small in stature, with pleasant features, graceful in gesture and exceedingly quiet and unobtrusive in his manner of conducting.

He has been assailed by certain Boston critics because of the license he permits himself in the matter of tempo. He has even been accused of relaxing the discipline of the orchestra to such an extent as to undo much that his predecessor has done. For all this the public cares but little. But few know whether a conductor is following the designs of the composer whose work he is interpreting. Good music and good playing are demanded, but for technicalities the people do not care a jot.

It is far from easy to define exactly the level such a man as Mr. Nikisch should occupy after hearing him conduct a single concert. It is possible to say, however, that his readings are delightfully poetic, that he controls his band with absolute power, and that power probably is sympathy rather than the force exerted by a drill master. It is true that he uses the tempo rubato in a manner to which we are unaccustomed, but the innovation was decidedly effective on several occasions last night. He uses the brasses much more than his predecessor, but the culmination of his effects were marvelously fine. Altogether, the impression Mr. Nikisch has made is beyond all doubt favorable, and the welcome he received as a stranger was redoubled as the concert proceeded.

The first number on the programme was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and the beautiful work was charmingly rendered, the individuality of the conductor being especially apparent in the pianissimo passage, exquisitely rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 8, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, if, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

[illegible] LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 19, 1889.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual), which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concert, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established here.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 19, 1889.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phil Pa

Date 12/19

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

GRAND ✦ INAUGURAL ✦ CONCERT,

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL,

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL,

Friday Evening, December 20th, 1889,

AT 8.30 O'CLOCK.

UNDER THE SPECIAL PATRONAGE OF

MRS. LEVI P. MORTON. MRS. LUCIUS TUCKERMAN.

MRS. JAMES G. BLAINE. MRS. JOHN CHANDLER BANCROFT.

MRS. MELVILLE W. FULLER. MRS. JEANETTE M. THURBER.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1889.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert this season at the Academy last night. The orchestra has justly come to be regarded as the most important organization of its kind in the country. No other body of musicians is fortunate enough to play so constantly together, and under the same conductor. The individual players are artists of unquestioned skill, and from the beginning their work has been performed under the most favorable auspices. For this, Boston in particular, as well as the country at large, is indebted to the liberality of Mr. Higginson, the founder of the organization.

Arthur Nikisch.

Added to the intrinsic merits of this splendid body of musicians, last night's concert was rendered specially notable because of the first appearance here of the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who this year succeeds to Mr. Gericke's position. Mr. Nikisch is small in stature, with pleasant features, graceful in gesture and exceedingly quiet and unobtrusive in his manner of conducting.

He has been assailed by certain Boston critics because of the license he permits himself in the matter of tempo. He has even been accused of relaxing the discipline of the orchestra to such an extent as to undo much that his predecessor has done. For all this the public cares but little. But few know whether a conductor is following the designs of the composer whose work he is interpreting. Good music and good playing are demanded, but for technicalities the people do not care a jot.

It is far from easy to define exactly the level such a man as Mr. Nikisch should occupy after hearing him conduct a single concert. It is possible to say, however, that his readings are delightfully poetic, that he controls his band with absolute power, and that power probably is sympathy rather than the force exerted by a drill master. It is true that he uses the tempo rubato in a manner to which we are unaccustomed, but the innovation was decidedly effective on several occasions last night. He uses the brasses much more than his predecessor, but the culmination of his effects were marvelously fine. Altogether, the impression Mr. Nikisch has made is beyond all doubt favorable, and the welcome he received as a stranger was redoubled as the concert proceeded.

The first number on the programme was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and the beautiful work was charmingly rendered, the individuality of the conductor being especially apparent in the pianissimo passage, exquisitely rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 5, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, if, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 19, 1889.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 8 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual), which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concert, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established here.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 19, 1889.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony, in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phil Pa

Date 12/19

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

M. THEOPHILE MANOURY,
Director of the Vocal Department,

Miss ADELE MARGULIES, Piano,

Mr. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG, Violin,

Mr. VICTOR HERBERT, Cello,

AND

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY, Piano,

Of the Faculty of the National Conservatory of Music, New York.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANO USED ON THIS OCCASION.

The following distinguished artists will assist:

Miss MARIE DECCA

AND

Mr. THEOPHILE MANOURY.

Miss ADELE MARGULIES

AND

Mr. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG

Mr. VICTOR HERBERT

AND

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

AND

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

WITH THE CELEBRATED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Concert Master.

parent in the pianissimo passage, exquisitely rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 8, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, if, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phil Pa
Date 12/9

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

PROGRAMME

PART I.

1. VORSPIEL, "Die Meistersinger," - - WAGNER
   ORCHESTRA

2. ARIA, "Magic Flute," - - - MOZART
   MISS MARIE DECCA

3. CONCERTO No. 2—A Major, - - - LISZT
   MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

4. ARIA, Herodiade, - - - - MASSENET
   MONSIEUR THEOPHILE MANOURY

5. CONCERTO, - - - - MENDELSSOHN
   E Minor, Andante and Finale.
   MR. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG

6. SUITE NORVEGIENNE, - - - SVENDSEN
   ORCHESTRA

PROGRAMME

PART II.

7. INVITATION A LA VALSE, - - WEBER
   ORCHESTRA

8. DUO FOR TWO PIANOS, - - SAINT SAËNS
   Variations on a theme by Beethoven.
   MISS ADELE MARGULIES AND MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

9. ARIA. "Henry VIII," - - - SAINT SAËNS
   M. THEOPHILE MANOURY

10. ANDANTE & TARANTELLA from Suite Op. 3, HERBERT
    MR. VICTOR HERBERT

11. DUO from "Hamlet," - - - A. THOMAS
    MISS DECCA AND M. MANOURY

12. "LES PRELUDES," - - - LISZT
    ORCHESTRA

parent in the pianissimo passage, exquisitely rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 8, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, if, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phil Pa

Date 12/29

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

[47]

The Childrens' Hospital of the District of Columbia.

W Street between 12th and 13th Streets N. W.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Previous to the year 1870 there was no hospital for children in Washington. Prior to that time the children of the sick poor, when they could not be cared for at home, were sent to the general hospitals or to the poor-house. Recognizing the importance of providing special nursing, medical and surgical aid for poor children from infancy until the age of twelve, (especially for those diseases requiring surgical aid, such as hip-joint, spinal and affections of the joints and bones,) certain of our people, both men and women, determined to organize an hospital exclusively for the sick children of the poor. It is open to all creeds and races. The sole title to admission is that the child be sick and need care. On this basis the Hospital was founded. Its beginnings were of the smallest—one room furnished with several second-hand beds. Year by year it was extended. First a free dispensary was added, where hundreds of poor children annually were brought to receive medical attention and medicines free. Then a move was made into a larger building. On a spacious lot of ground the Central and East wings of the present structure were erected. Then a branch dispensary was established, and is still in successful operation in South Washington. Finally this year the West wing with an important addition to the central building has been added. The Hospital will soon have 127 beds in the main wards, and a number in isolated and special wards. It will have also a new operating room, a large play room for convalescing children, and other comforts for its little patients. Its training school for nurses provides skilled and sympathetic women who make of this nursing a labor of love. In addition, the children who are well enough to receive the teaching have a kindergarten where the instruction is given in such a way as to interest and amuse them.

Such is a brief history of this Children's Hospital. Last year it received 247 children in its wards and in its two dispensaries 2197. Can there be any better work than this?

Eighteen months ago a group of children who were well and happy formed themselves into a society called the Guild of the Daisy Chain, for the object of making articles to be sold at a bazaar for the benefit of the sick children in the hospital.

Their first bazaar was held at the house of Vice-President Morton last spring, a sum of over $600 was realized. In addition to many luxuries given to the patients during the summer from the funds of the Daisy Chain, it has supplied money for the purchase of five hundred garments for the children in the hospital.

The Guild is anxious to add to its membership in order to be able to do more for the sick children, and information in regard to the rules for admission can be had from EDITH MORTON, President, Scott Circle, or ELIZABETH WARDER, Secretary, 1515 K Street.

...parent in the pianissimo passage, exquisitely rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 8, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, it, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phila Pa

Date 12/19

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

The Chi

w

Previous to t
Washington.
when they coul hospitals or to providing specia from infancy u requiring surgic the joints and b determined to o of the poor. It to admission is basis the Hospi smallest—one ro by year it was e hundreds of poo cal attention and larger building.
wings of the pres
pensary was establ
Washington. Fi addition to the c will soon have 12

PATRONS.

Mme. Ida de Hurtado.
Countess de Sponneck.
Baroness de Rosen.
Mrs. Levi P. Morton.
Mrs. James G. Blaine.
Mrs. Melville Weston Fuller.
Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman.
Mrs. John Chandler Bancroft.
Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber.
Mrs. Eugene Hale.
Mrs. Robert R. Hitt.
Mrs. F. A. Ashford.
Mrs. A. Graham Bell.
Mrs. George L. Bradley.
Miss Breckenridge.
Mrs. Archibald Hopkins.
Mrs. T. W. Palmer.
Mrs. Charles Payson.
Mrs. Justice Gray.
Mrs. Robert K. Stone.
Mrs. Elizabeth Hobson.
Mrs. M. A. B. Kennedy.
Miss Virginia Miller.
Mrs. L. N. Anderson.
Mrs. J. C. Audenreid.
Miss Florence Bayard.
Miss Lena Beckwith.
Miss Kate Burgess.
Mrs. Calderon Carlisle.
Mrs. H. A. P. Carter.
Miss Dahlgren.
Mrs. Charles H. Davis.
Miss Rebecca Dodge,
Mrs. Admiral Franklin.
Mrs. Thomas Gale.
Mrs. M. W. Galt.
Mrs. Charles C. Glover.
Mrs. Goodloe.
Mrs. Hains.
Mrs. Kate K. Henry.
Miss Caroline Henry.
Mrs. W. H. Hoeke.
Mrs. Ralph Johnson.
Mrs. S. H. Kauffmann.
Mrs. J. F. Leech.
Mrs. L. Z. Leiter.
Mrs. Cabot Lodge.
Mrs. Edward McCauley.
Mrs. F. B. McGuire.
Mrs. J. W. Maury.
Mrs. Mason.
Miss J. M. Matthews.
Miss Merrick.
Mrs. Neill.
Mrs. V. O. Niles.
Mrs. M. L. Norton.
Mrs. S. F. Phillips.
Mrs. John Rodgers.
Mrs. L. C. Robbins.
Miss Schenck.
Mrs. T. O. Selfridge.
Mrs. Philip Sheridan.
Mrs. Charles Sherrill.
Mrs. S. H. Shields.
Miss Sicard.
Mrs. J. T. Swann.
Mrs. Tuckerman.
Mrs. B. H. Warder.
Mrs. H. A. Willard.
M. W. Galt.
F. B. McGuire.
F. L. Moore.
W. S. Thompson.
Lewis J. Davis.
Reginald Fendall.
Robert C. Fox.
Charles C. Glover.
W. W. Johnston, M. D.
S. H. Kauffman.
N. S. Lincoln, M. D.
J. W. H. Lovejoy, M. D.
R. Ross Perry.
A. Pollok.
Henry Semken.
Edward Temple.
J. Ford Thompson, M. D.
Nathaniel Wilson.

rendered by the strings. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," followed, and it is notwithin the writer's knowledge that any of this composer's work has been so delightfully rendered in this city. Usually these musical reproductions of abstract ideas are a weariness to the flesh. Last night not only showed that this one at least contains wonderfully melodious themes, but that it has clearly defined ideas, which Mr. Nikisch is able to interpret with felicitous expression.

The symphony chosen was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor. The romance (adagio), whose lovely melody is well known to every music lover, was superbly played. In fact, the whole symphony was given in a romantic and profoundly poetic manner. The rhythms were beautifully accentuated, the tone colors defined with perfect skill, and the effectiveness of the brasses in conservative hands was pleasantly emphasized.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not, probably, been heard here before. Her selection of Litolff's piano concerto, No. 5, was unfortunate. When there is so much good music to choose from it seems strange that an artist should insist upon resurrecting a concerto that the world has apparently decided should be relegated to oblivion. Herr Litolff rendered such good service to his art by publishing cheap music that he should have been content. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler should not be judged on her performance of such a work. She is evidently technically a clever pianist, but as she had no opportunity to display other qualities no more can be said of her playing.

The concert was pleasantly brief and was most undoubtedly enjoyable. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch's next programme will include a Beethoven symphony and, if, during his too infrequent visits, he will ring the changes on Haydn, Mozart and the great masters he will find few grumblers in this city. Mr. Higginson, accompanied by several Boston journalists, was present at the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a triumphal tour during the week just ended and has carried all criticism before it in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The New York critics, generally, showed a disposition to give Mr. Nikisch the benefit of any and all doubts existing as to his ability as an orchestral leader, and the good taste of his readings of standard works. He, however, got some quite as sharp criticisms in New York as he has had here, and his second visit to that city will be another interesting event for all who have watched the current of events in Symphony matters since the season opened.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season, Saturday evening, Dec. 14, had for its programme the following works:

Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala"; Litolff, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 45 (First time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52; soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school; anything more virile and sensuous than the composer's treatment of the orchestra will seldom be found outside the orchestral writings of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner. Mr. Nikisch plainly indicated his intense admiration of the work in one of the most spirited and effective leads that he has offered this season, and its effect upon the orchestra was magnetic, so that the performance was both impressive and exciting.

Litolff's work entitled, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," will not rank on a par with the best pianoforte concertos. It is a clear and melodious work and reasonably well made as regards form, but is overcrowded with commonplace piano-passages, and other roulades of no artistic interest. About the only attempt at thematic treatment is with a trivial two-note motive with which the concerto opens; the second movement, a presto, is both vulgar and uninteresting and the remaining movements are no better. It was charmingly and wondrously played, however, by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was warmly applauded for her masterly effort.

The Wagner and Schumann selections were both finely rendered.

Clipping from Call Phil Pa
Date 12/19

MR. NIKISCH'S ORIGINALITY.

Immense Effectiveness Given by Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, gained additional interest from the fact that it was the first appearance here of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor who succeeds Mr. Gericke.

The orchestral selections included Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. There may be differences of opinion about Mr. Nikisch's reading of these well known works, but it cannot be denied that the innovations were highly effective.

Mr. Nikisch is evidently a dramatic conductor. He is addicted to the tempo rubato and he believes in the maxim that sometimes there is as much effect in a long pause as there is in the music itself. He also allows the brass instruments the full sway that was denied them by his predecessor. At the same time he does not by any means detract from the delicacy of the orchestra. Liszt's Preludes has probably never had as magnificent an interpretation in this city as that of last night.

It was in this number that the individuality of the conductor was more apparent than in any other work performed during the evening, though the playing of the orchestra was superb during the entire program.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist of considerable technique, but somewhat deficient in power, was the soloist. She played Litolff's E flat concerto, and at its conclusion she was recalled several times.

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1889.

A NOTABLE MUSICAL EVENT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Baltimore for the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening, under the new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch. The program was one of the best this orchestra has ever presented, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Rubinstein piano-concerto No. 3, in G; Liszt symphonic poem "The Preludes," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

All these works have been frequently performed in Baltimore; and they were therefore all the more highly enjoyed by the very musical audience present. The overture, although one of Mendelssohn's earlier works, is one of his best. It is full of the imagination and fire of youth, and, like Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," is the result of an effort to give musical embodiment to the grandeur of one of Nature's great works.

Professor Carl Faelten was given a hearty welcome by his many Baltimore friends when he came forward to play the Rubinstein concerto. He seated himself in his easy, old-fashioned way, threw his head a little to one side, and was soon at home in his wore of rolling off the allegro moderato of the first movements. Among all the pianists in America there is no one more at home in the rendition of a concerto than he is.

In addition to his wonderful memory and technique as a virtuoso, he is a thorough orchestral musician, and as well acquainted with the parts of all the other instruments as he is with the noble pet Knabe grand piano on which he plays. He is an easy master of all the forms of pianism, and this concerto gives him a splendid opportunity for the fullest display of his very marvelous art. He was heartily recalled, as he thoroughly deserved to be.

The new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, was put to the greatest test in the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, No. 5. The Boston critics have been quite divided over the comparative merits of the former and the present director of the Symphony Orchestra, and it was quite evident that there was room for two parties in Baltimore on the same question. Mr. Nikisch is, to begin with, a more graceful conductor than Mr. Gericke; but both are the subjects of most decided mannerisms, which those who dislike them will persist in regarding as affectations. Mr. Gericke was quite addicted to the flying motion with his arms under the excitement of orchestral leading. He also had a particular wiggle, which he gave at the end of certain beats, and which had no meaning except to indicate the particular spot in Europe from which he came. Mr. Nikisch continues this little peculiarity, which attracts more attention from the audience than it does from the orchestra. He directs without notes, as Mr. Hamerik was in the habit of doing when he came to America. It is justifiable only when both conductor and orchestra are not only absolutely familiar with the work, but have just had it in rehearsal, and when the understanding between conductor and orchestra is simply perfect. Frequently, during the symphony last evening, the orchestra was fully an eighth of a beat behind the conductor, giving to the listener, who tried to follow both eye and ear, the inevitable effect of lack of precision and dragging, which is inexcusable in so fine an organization as the Boston Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch differs widely from his predecessors in the reading of the symphony, as well as from the majority of directors in America. The first movement was taken much slower than usual, and the scherzo undoubtedly suffered in the same way. The andante was well rendered, and in the finale some of the spirit lost in the previous movements was recovered.

But the performance of the work as a whole was not up to former renditions of the symphony in Baltimore, or to the high standard of the orchestra last year. However, it goes for the saying that the material of the Boston orchestra is the best in the country, and it is not to be expected that this organization will give a concert that is not very enjoyable. The fine performance of the strings and of the double basses, particularly in the scherzo and finale of the symphony, was a treat that only the most musical could fully appreciate. As a whole, the concert was a rare occasion for the lovers of the best music, and which should have been heard by a much larger audience.

Clipping from Star
Washington D C.
Date 12/20

The Lincoln Music Hall Concert.

The Boston symphony orchestra, consisting of sixty-six pieces, will give the opening concert in the new Lincoln music hall, corner of 9th and D streets, tonight, for the benefit of the children's hospital. A few changes have been made since this company appeared here lastseason, Mr. Anton Hikking as first 'cellist, Mr. Goldschmidt as first clarionet, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, as conductor, being the most important acquisitions. Miss Marie Decca has consented to appear in solo and duet and her numbers will be among the chief attractions of the evening. A letter just received from a London artist says: "I am glad you have Decca with you. We cannot forget how grandly her voice floated through Covent Garden, that enormous place, and how the people yelled and stamped and clapped for minutes after, and how the orchestra joined clapping and striking their instruments." The concert will be patronized by leading society people interested in the work of charity, and the new hall will present a brilliant appearance.

The Witherbee Divorce Case.

Clipping from Post
New York N Y
Date 12/15

MUSIC.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Under the leadership of Mr. Gericke the Boston Symphony Orchestra won an extremely high place in the regard of amateur and professional musicians in New York, and the keenest interest was shown at Steinway Hall last evening to see Mr. Gericke's successor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and to note what changes he had made in the personnel of the band and in the style of its playing. The band numbers about eighty performers, as before. Mr. Kneisel, the young Roumanian whom Mr. Gericke imported to take the place of Bernhard Listemann, remains at the head of the first violins.

Fritz Giese, the famous leader of the violoncellos, has retired in favor of Anton Hekking, and Mr. Nikisch brought over with him an accomplished first clarionetist, a Mr. Goldschmidt, and J. Adamowski (a brother of Timothee Adamowski, who is among the first violins,) is added to the 'cello players, and one or two minor additions have also been made. Of Mr. Nikisch himself it may perhaps be added that he comes from Leipsic, where he has been conductor of the opera for many years, taking the place at times of Kapellmeister Reinecke, the leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, one of the best known bands in Europe.

Mr. Gericke was extremely conservative in his readings. His successor follows what is called tradition less closely and gives more emotional readings to his programmes. This was shown last night when this programme was performed:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
2. Concerto for violin, op. 77 ..... Brahms
3. Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
4. Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

It may be said at the outset that the playing of the band has lost something in refinement and finish. The tone is not quite so pure, the phrasing not wholly so perfect as it was. On the other hand, there is a gain—a decided gain—in virility, power, abandon. Under Mr. Nikisch's predecessor the brass choir, for example, was relegated to a subordinate place even in the Wagner music, the climaxes of which often called for the strong quality of tone which only the brass could give. Mr. Nikisch, however, allows the brass full play, and often with superb effect. His readings are full of emotional fervor, and every phrase is counted upon to produce its effect.

The danger at times seems to be that in the over-elaboration of details the large lines along which the development of the work proceeds will be in part lost sight of, and that the composition, let it be a concerto or a symphony, will lose something of the coherency and dignity which ought to mark it. But on the whole the playing of the band is fine, the tone being full and rich, with less prominence than has heretofore been given to the strings and with a correspondingly better balance of the different choirs.

The Schumann symphony showed the band and its conductor at their best, the romance and the finale being especially noteworthy. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with intelligence and feeling, and aroused much enthusiasm by his interpolated cadenza. In the prelude to "Tristan" one missed something that would have lifted it into the first rank. The working up of the crescendo to the climax seemed a trifle too studied. The overture was played brilliantly. The audience was large and the applause was abundant, but at no time did the enthusiasm equal that which has been shown at some of the concerts of this orchestra in former years.

WASHINGTON POST.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

ST THE W. C. T. U.

n-Partisan Branch ion.

ec. 20.—A call has c by the provisional -Partisan W. C. T. grievances against Christian Temper- ancing the deter- w organization for litical policy of the Temperance Union ntrary to the letter stitution. Illogical in in its conclusions, tal to the cause of he work of Christian d beyond the lines not follow the lead our influence to any ge number of women ney, influence and abor to build up the el that their use- their consistency al policy by the allegiance to, and of a political party, les its partisanship. he National Union ty, to adopt a non- onstitution makes it rtisan women to let hey will no longer ition.

wing for a national lex in its aims and nt, which will work such objects only on the temperance eatment accorded to o year who dare to ional assemblies not n policy emphasies tion.

possibility of work- National Woman's without sacrifice of espect, or the alter- altogether, which their commission han the National ion through which will not be compro- de of the National ands who have not eir efforts, and, in bonds of peace," e drink traffic. basis so broad that all churches with-

Let all who are in- ment respond with- to enlist under a ay so at once.

FOILED.

nite Girl and a oman.

ere cheated of

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

A Distinguished Audience Attends the Inaugural Concert.

MR. NIKISCH AS THE CONDUCTOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Rafael Joseffy, Miss Decca, and Many Other Artists Participate in the Programme—Some Well-Known People Present.

The new Lincoln Music Hall was inaugurated last night by a concert, which was noticeable for the number of artists who participated in it and for the brilliancy of the audience. While it is a misnomer to speak of the new structure as a music hall, for it is simply a cosy little theater, it presents, nevertheless, a very invitiug and pleasing interior. The decorations are in excellent taste, artistic effects being secured without sacrifice to gaudy show, and the prevailing colors, terra cotta and sage green, are combined with good effect. The hall was so thoroughly described in THE POST yesterday as to make any extended reference to its arrangements now unnecessary. Whether its acoustic properties are all that are claimed for it remains to be seen. There were some indications last night that everything in this regard is not wholly satisfactory.

As a matter of interest and of record, the programme of the evening is given in full, as follows:

PART I.

1. Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
   Orchestra.
2. Aria, "Magic Flute" ..... Mozart
   Miss Marie Decca.
3. Concerto No. 2—A Major ..... Liszt
   Mr. Rafael Joseffy.
4. Aria, Herodiade ..... Massenet
   Monsieur Theophile Manoury.
5. Concerto ..... Mendelssohn
   (E. Minor, Andante and Finale.)
   Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg.
6. Suite Norvegienne ..... Svendsen
   Orchestra.

PART II.

7. "Les Preludes," ..... Liszt
   Orchestra.
8. Duo for two pianos ..... Saint Saens
   Variations on a theme by Beethoven.
   Miss Adele Margulies and Mr. Rafael Joseffy.
9. Aria, "Henry VIII." ..... Saint Saens
   M. Theophile Manoury.
10. Tarantella, from Suite Op. 3 ..... Herbert
    Mr. Victor Herbert.
11. Duo from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
    Miss Decca and M. Manoury.
12. Invitation a la Valse ..... m ..... Weber
    Orchestra.

to sing the duo with M. Manoury showed that she had made a favorable impression. Mr. Lichtenberg's violin solo was a disappointment. He played the andante in a semi-sleepy, over-serious way, and even in the final e his tone was thin and cold.

While any occurrence is interesting which has for its object the benefit of a local charity, and the programme announced that the concert was for the aid of the Children's Hospital, the event last night was far more important in many respects. First of all, it gave music-lovers in Washington an opportunity to judge for themselves of the capabilities of Mr. Nikisch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, and secondly, it presented the National Conservatory of Music, of which Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber is the founder and main-stay, in a most satisfactory light. For, with the exception of Miss Decca, all the artists who participated in the generous and entertaining programme were members of the faculty of that institution. It is worth while for the people of Washington and of the whole country to know that the musically-inclined young men and women of the United States are entrusting the development of their voices and their talents to those who are so capable in every respect.

The appearance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for prolonged applause. He is small in stature, dark haired and dark bearded, and his face bears the cast of study and intelligence. So much has been written about him since his first appearance in Boston, at which time THE POST presented the various opinions to which his methods then gave rise, that it is hardly necessary at this late day to even say that he does not use a score when directing. This is more than a mere feat of memory, for so thoroughly does he study the music that he has every note photographed on his brain, with the score-sheet literally before his mental vision. It is very easy to see that the orchestra profits by his industry and application in this regard. At no time is he hampered by the music before him, his whole attention being upon the players. His very confidence inspires a feeling of repose in his audience and is certainly reflected in the band which he so ably conducts. His direction is all the more agreeable, also, because it is unobtrusive and graceful.

It would have been more gratifying to have measured Mr. Nikisch by the standard of more important numbers than were assigned to the orchestra last night. In the four familiar selections which were presented there was very little to call for original interpretation, for a free introduction of the tempo rubato which Mr. Nikisch has been more or less criticised for using, or for the employment of any novel or startling innovations. But even within the narrow limits thus laid down by the programme, it was easy to detect the influence of the new director. Particularly was this true of the Liszt "Prelude," in which the orchestra reached the climax of its evening's work. Never before has this symphonic poem received such a broad and impressive presentation. Hitherto it has been a meaningless, not to say, contradictory, composition. Last night, from the first note to the last, it was given with a majestic stateliness. Its musical ideas were clearly defined and intelligibly expressed. It was as if Mr. Nikisch had translated a book which had hitherto been unreadable in a foreign tongue. More than this, it was as if a great lake had been suddenly made transparent, and one could plainly see through its crystal waters the pearls which had hitherto been hidden hundreds of feet below.

Apart from this Liszt Prelude, which revealed by the way with wonderful fidelity the link between the great pianist and Wagner, the work of the orchestra need not be dwelt upon. It is noticeable that while the brasses are allowed more prominence than when Mr. Gericke had control, the finish, precision, and brilliancy of the strings has not been lost.

All of the soloists had previously been heard in Washington except M. Manoury, who made his American debut last night, Mr. Herbert and Miss Margulies. M. Manoury fully justified in the Saint-Saens number, if he did not in the Herodiade solo, the expectations aroused by the friendly letters of eminent composers abroad. He has a baritone voice of great smoothness, which he uses with care, beautiful method, and considerable dramatic feeling. It is not a robust baritone, or at least it did not leave this impression in the hall in which he sang, but it is flexible enough to be exquisitely modulated, and has a sympathetic quality that gives expression to his artistic work. Mr. Herbert created quite a furore by his delightful playing of his tarantelle for the 'cello, a composition which fully demonstrated his technical abilities, and Miss Margulies won hearty applause after her duo with Joseffy. It is no small thing to say of her that in this interesting work of Saint-Saens' she preserved an even balance with the great pianist with whom she played.

Mr. Joseffy has been heard here so frequently that it is but necessary to say that he gave a vigorous rendition of the Liszt concerto. This composition is brilliant without depth, and it is questionable whether it should be classed as a concerto at all. Its themes, which are strongly reminiscent of Liszt's Hungarian fantasy, give it some warmth and color, two qualities which Mr. Joseffy's playing made delightfully prominent. Miss Decca's solos were heartily applauded, and it is due to her to say that she acquitted herself on the concert stage far better than was to have been expected from her operatic experience. She carried off several baskets of flowers and the applause which greeted her return to the stage

TH His

[48]

h precinct, was Seventeenth a of the jail, be-saw a carriage
rd the city. It an could only arriage dimly.
st a fence and
arriage to pass.
en or twenty e a man was n carefully as another man.

a word, but ons that they closely. As it
hton sprang rse by the ver in his e and behind
els. The car-
ite man, who force him out
d, failing in k to his heels,
w his whistle
Stohl, who on some col-case, ran to ce.
female bodies. front part of at and dash-
t had rested.
the carriage
d to the East
From there rgue, on New dies were left.
me one, drawn such a turn-would have.
young white ars old, and of en years old.
re still at the alls for them
ple explaining.

an Accident.

. 20.—Thomas
the Soldiers'
ory window at neck, and died
s witnessed by who was just an Post, made
Bradley was or, and when to Alger was the third floor, balance and night was the
G. A. R. and era House.

Murder.

20.—The grand found an in-ber for mure was released custody of the
F. E. Hughes,
npting to bribe
rs in Thrash-
ered under ar-
Finley, of the the testimony nd Tench, but fund is being f the murdered ion of the case

k "Star."

s stated that a
or the purchase option on the
rom Collis P.
the paper will he name may
t. Two mem
o Washington-
gressman A. J.
0,000 per year
fits to manage inistration.

Chicago.

young men living at 216 along Clark rning, when a ted them with struck at him out a dagger groin. He then t his left eye and there is a Suspended.

s from Shang-ojects in China
ng to political position to the ng Well.

Reichsanzeiger
, who is suffered a good night
er. He left his r.

.—For the District
d, and Virginia, le.

nts. Libbey, 310

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
FRIDAY. DECEMBER 20, 1889.

A NOTABLE MUSICAL EVENT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Baltimore for the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening, under the new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch. The program was one of the best this orchestra has ever presented, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Rubinstein piano-concerto No. 3, in G; Liszt symphonic poem "The Preludes," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

All these works have been frequently performed in Baltimore; and they were therefore all the more highly enjoyed by the very musical audience present. The overture, although one of Mendelssohn's earlier works, is one of his best. It is full of the imagination and fire of youth, and, like Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," is the result of an effort to give musical embodiment to the grandeur of one of Nature's great works.

Professor Carl Faelten was given a hearty welcome by his many Baltimore friends when he came forward to play the Rubinstein concerto. He seated himself in his easy, old-fashioned way, threw his head a little to one side, and was soon at home in his wore of rolling off the allegro moderato of the first movements. Among all the pianists in America there is no one more at home in the rendition of a concerto than he is.

In addition to his wonderful memory and technique as a virtuoso, he is a thorough orchestral musician, and as well acquainted with the parts of all the other instruments as he is with the noble pet Knabe grand piano on which he plays. He is an easy master of all the forms of pianism, and this concerto gives him a splendid opportunity for the fullest display of his very marvelous art. He was heartily recalled, as he thoroughly deserved to be.

The new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, was put to the greatest test in the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, No. 5. The Boston critics have been quite divided over the comparative merits of the former and the present director of the Symphony Orchestra, and it was quite evident that there was room for two parties in Baltimore on the same question. Mr. Nikisch is, to begin with, a more graceful conductor than Mr. Gericke; but both are the subjects of most decided mannerisms, which those who dislike them will persist in regarding as affectations. Mr. Gericke was quite addicted to the flying motion with his arms under the excitement of orchestral leading. He also had a particular wiggle, which he gave at the end of certain beats, and which had no meaning except to indicate the particular spot in Europe from which he came. Mr. Nikisch continues this little peculiarity, which attracts more attention from the audience than it does from the orchestra. He directs without notes, as Mr. Hamerik was in the habit of doing when he came to America. It is justifiable only when both conductor and orchestra are not only absolutely familiar with the work, but have just had it in rehearsal, and when the understanding between conductor and orchestra is simply perfect. Frequently, during the symphony last evening, the orchestra was fully an eighth of a beat behind the conductor, giving to the listener, who tried to follow both eye and ear, the inevitable effect of lack of precision and dragging, which is inexcusable in so fine an organization as the Boston Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch differs widely from his predecessors in the reading of the symphony, as well as from the majority of directors in America. The first movement was taken much slower than usual, and the scherzo undoubtedly suffered in the same way. The andante was well rendered, and in the finale some of the spirit lost in the previous movements was recovered.

But the performance of the work as a whole was not up to former renditions of the symphony in Baltimore, or to the high standard of the orchestra last year. However, it goes for the saying that the material of the Boston orchestra is the best in the country, and it is not to be expected that this organization will give a concert that is not very enjoyable. The fine performance of the strings and of the double basses, particularly in the scherzo and finale of the symphony, was a treat that only the most musical could fully appreciate. As a whole, the concert was a rare occasion for the lovers of the best music, and which should have been heard by a much larger audience.

Clipping from Star Washington D. C.
Date 12/20

The Lincoln Music Hall Concert.

The Boston symphony orchestra, consisting of sixty-six pieces, will give the opening concert in the new Lincoln music hall, corner of 9th and D streets, tonight, for the benefit of the children's hospital. A few changes have been made since this company appeared here lastseason, Mr. Anton Hikking as first 'cellist, Mr. Goldschmidt as first clarionet, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, as conductor, being the most important acquisitions. Miss Marie Decca has consented to appear in solo and duet and her numbers will be among the chief attractions of the evening. A letter just received from a London artist says: "I am glad you have Decca with you. We cannot forget how grandly her voice floated through Covent Garden, that enormous place, and how the people yelled and stamped and clapped for minutes after, and how the orchestra joined clapping and striking their instruments." The concert will be patronized by leading society people interested in the work of charity, and the new hall will present a brilliant appearance.

The Witherbee Divorce Case.

Clipping from New York World 12/15
Date

MUSIC.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Under the leadership of Mr. Gericke the Boston Symphony Orchestra won an extremely high place in the regard of amateur and professional musicians in New York, and the keenest interest was shown at Steinway Hall last evening to see Mr. Gericke's successor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and to note what changes he had made in the personnel of the band and in the style of its playing. The band numbers about eighty performers, as before. Mr. Kneisel, the young Roumanian whom Mr. Gericke imported to take the place of Bernhard Listemann, remains at the head of the first violins.

Fritz Giese, the famous leader of the violoncellos, has retired in favor of Anton Hekking, and Mr. Nikisch brought over with him an accomplished first clarionetist, a Mr. Goldschmidt, and J. Adamowski (a brother of Timothee Adamowski, who is among the first violins,) is added to the 'cello players, and one or two minor additions have also been made. Of Mr. Nikisch himself it may perhaps be added that he comes from Leipsic, where he has been conductor of the opera for many years, taking the place at times of Kapellmeister Reinecke, the leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, one of the best known bands in Europe.

Mr. Gericke was extremely conservative in his readings. His successor follows what is called tradition less closely and gives more emotional readings to his programmes. This was shown last night when this programme was performed:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
2. Concerto for violin, op. 77 ..... Brahms
3. Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
4. Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

It may be said at the outset that the playing of the band has lost something in refinement and finish. The tone is not quite so pure, the phrasing not wholly so perfect as it was. On the other hand, there is a gain—a decided gain—in virility, power, abandon. Under Mr. Nikisch's predecessor the brass choir, for example, was relegated to a subordinate place even in the Wagner music, the climaxes of which often called for the strong quality of tone which only the brass could give. Mr. Nikisch, however, allows the brass full play, and often with superb effect. His readings are full of emotional fervor, and every phrase is counted upon to produce its effect.

The danger at times seems to be that in the over-elaboration of details the large lines along which the development of the work proceeds will be in part lost sight of, and that the composition, let it be a concerto or a symphony, will lose something of the coherency and dignity which ought to mark it. But on the whole the playing of the band is fine, the tone being full and rich, with less prominence than has heretofore been given to the strings and with a correspondingly better balance of the different choirs.

The Schumann symphony showed the band and its conductor at their best, the romance and the finale being especially noteworthy. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with intelligence and feeling, and aroused much enthusiasm by his interpolated cadenza. In the prelude to "Tristan" one missed something that would have lifted it into the first rank. The working up of the crescendo to the climax seemed a trifle too studied. The overture was played brilliantly. The audience was large and the applause was abundant, but at no time did the enthusiasm equal that which has been shown at some of the concerts of this orchestra in former years.

WASHINGTON POST.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

ST THE W. C. T. U.

n-Partisan Branch
ion.

ec. 20.—A call has e by the provisional
-Partisan W. C. T. grievances against Christian Temper-
ancing the deter-
v organization for litical policy of the Temperance Union

ntrary to the letter nstitution, illogical in in its conclusions, tal to the cause of

he work of Christian d beyond the lines not follow the lead our influence to any ge number of women

ney, influence and abor to build up the eel that their use-their consistency cal policy by the allegiance to, and of a political party, ies its partisanship.
he National Union
ity, to adopt a non-onstitution makes it rtisan women to let hey will no longer lition.
owing for a national plex in its aims and nt, which will work such objects only on the temperance eatment accorded to o year who dare to ional assemblies not en policy emphasies

tion.
possibility of work-National Woman's without sacrifice of espect, or the alteraltogether, which their commission han the National ion through which will not be compro-de of the National ands who have not eir efforts, and, in bonds of peace," e drink traffic.
basis so broad that all churches with-

Let all who are inment respond with-to enlist under a say so at once.

FOILED.

hite Girl and a oman.

were cheated of Academy Hall

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

A Distinguished Audience Attends the Inaugural Concert.

MR. NIKISCH AS THE CONDUCTOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Rafael Joseffy, Miss Decca, and Many Other Artists Participate in the Programme—Some Well-Known People Present.

The new Lincoln Music Hall was inaugurated last night by a concert, which was noticeable for the number of artists who participated in it and for the brilliancy of the audience. While it is a misnomer to speak of the new structure as a music hall, for it is simply a cosy little theater, it presents, nevertheless, a very inviting and pleasing interior. The decorations are in excellent taste, artistic effects being secured without sacrifice to gaudy show, and the prevailing colors, terra cotta and sage green, are combined with good effect. The hall was so thoroughly described in THE POST yesterday as to make any extended reference to its arrangements now unnecessary. Whether its acoustic properties are all that are claimed for it remains to be seen. There were some indications last night that everything in this regard is not wholly satisfactory.

As a matter of interest and of record, the programme of the evening is given in full, as follows:

PART I.

1. Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
   Orchestra.
2. Aria, "Magic Flute" ..... Mozart
   Miss Marie Decca.
3. Concerto No. 2—A Major ..... Liszt
   Mr. Rafael Joseffy.
4. Aria, Herodiade ..... Massenet
   Monsieur Theophile Manoury.
5. Concerto ..... Mendelssohn
   (E. Minor, Andante and Finale.)
   Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg.
6. Suite Norvegienne ..... Svendsen
   Orchestra.

PART II.

7. "Les Preludes," ..... Liszt
   Orchestra.
8. Duo for two pianos ..... Saint Saens
   Variations on a theme by Beethoven.
   Miss Adele Margulies and Mr. Rafael Joseffy.
9. Aria, "Henry VIII." ..... Saint Saens
   M. Theophile Manoury.
10. Tarantella, from Suite Op. 3 ..... Herbert
    Mr. Victor Herbert.
11. Duo from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
    Miss Decca and M. Manoury.
12. Invitation a la Valse ..... m ..... Weber
    Orchestra.

to sing the duo with M. Manoury showed that she had made a favorable impression. Mr. Lichtenberg's violin solo was a disappointment. He played the andante in a semi-sleepy, over-serious way, and even in the final e his tone was thin and cold.

TH His

[48]

h precinct, was Seventeenth, a of the jail, be-saw a carriage
rd the city. It an could only arriage dimly.
st a fence and
arriage to pass.
en or twenty e a man was n carefully as another man.

a word, but ons that they closely. As it
hton sprang rse by the ver in his e and behind
els. The car-
ite man, who force him out
d, failing in to his heels,
w his whistle
Stohl, who on some col-
case, ran to ce.
female bodies.
front part of
at and dash-
t had rested.
the carriage
d to the East
From there rgue, on New
dies were left.
me one, drawn such a turn-vould have.
young white
ars old, and of en years old.
re still at the alls for them
ole explaining.

an Accident.

. 20.—Thomas
the Soldiers'
ory window at neck, and died
s witnessed by who was just an Post, made
Bradley was tor, and when to Alger was the third floor, s balance and night was the
G. A. R. and era House.

Murder.

20.—The grand found an insher for mur-
e was released custody of the
F. E. Hughes,
npting to bribe
rs in Thrash-
ered under ar-
Finley, of the
the testimony
nd Tench, but fund is being f the murdered ion of the case

k "Star."

s stated that a
or the purchase option on the
rom Collis P.
the paper will he name may
t. Two mem
o Washington-
gressman A. J.
0,000 per year
fits to manage inistration.

Chicago.

young men living at 216
along Clark
rning, when a ted them with struck at him out a dagger
groin. He then t his left eye
and there is a Suspended.

s from Shang-
ojects in China
ng to political position to the ng Well.

Reichsanzeiger
, who is suffered a good night
er. He left his

r.
.—For the District
nd, and Virginia, ls.

nts. Libbey, 310

While any occurrence is interesting which has for its object the benefit of a local charity, and the programme announced that the concert was for the aid of the Children's Hospital, the event last night was far more important in many respects. First of all, it gave music-lovers in Washington an opportunity to judge for themselves of the capabilities of Mr. Nikisch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, and secondly, it presented the National Conservatory of Music, of which Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber is the founder and main-stay, in a most satisfactory light. For, with the exception of Miss Decca, all the artists who participated in the generous and entertaining programme were members of the faculty of that institution. It is worth while for the people of Washington and of the whole country to know that the musically-inclined young men and women of the United States are entrusting the development of their voices and their talents to those who are so capable in every respect.

The appearance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for prolonged applause. He is small in stature, dark haired and dark bearded, and his face bears the cast of study and intelligence. So much has been written about him since his first appearance in Boston, at which time THE POST presented the various opinions to which his methods then gave rise, that it is hardly necessary at this late day to even say that he does not use a score when directing. This is more than a mere feat of memory, for so thoroughly does he study the music that he has every note photographed on his brain, with the score-sheet literally before his mental vision. It is very easy to see that the orchestra profits by his industry and application in this regard. At no time is he hampered by the music before him, his whole attention being upon the players. His very confidence inspires a feeling of repose in his audience and is certainly reflected in the band which he so ably conducts. His direction is all the more agreeable, also, because it is unobtrusive and graceful.

It would have been more gratifying to have measured Mr. Nikisch by the standard of more important numbers than were assigned to the orchestra last night. In the four familiar selections which were presented there was very little to call for original interpretation, for a free introduction of the tempo rubato which Mr. Nikisch has been more or less criticised for using, or for the employment of any novel or startling innovations. But even within the narrow limits thus laid down by the programme, it was easy to detect the influence of the new director. Particularly was this true of the Liszt "Prelude," in which the orchestra reached the climax of its evening's work. Never before has this symphonic poem received such a broad and impressive presentation. Hitherto it has been a meaningless, not to say contradictory, composition. Last night, from the first note to the last, it was given with a majestic stateliness. Its musical ideas were clearly defined and intelligibly expressed. It was as if Mr. Nikisch had translated a book which had hitherto been unreadable in a foreign tongue. More than this, it was as if a great lake had been suddenly made transparent, and one could plainly see through its crystal waters the pearls which had hitherto been hidden hundreds of feet below.

Apart from this Liszt Prelude, which revealed by the way with wonderful fidelity the link between the great pianist and Wagner, the work of the orchestra need not be dwelt upon. It is noticeable that while the brasses are allowed more prominence than when Mr. Gericke had control, the finish, precision, and brilliancy of the strings has not been lost.

All of the soloists had previously been heard in Washington except M. Manoury, who made his American debut last night, Mr. Herbert and Miss Margulies. M. Manoury fully justified in the Saint-Saens number, if he did not in the Herodiade solo, the expectations aroused by the friendly letters of eminent composers abroad. He has a baritone voice of great smoothness, which he uses with care, beautiful method, and considerable dramatic feeling. It is not a robust baritone, or at least it did not leave this impression in the hall in which he sang, but it is flexible enough to be exquisitely modulated, and has a sympathetic quality that gives expression to his artistic work. Mr. Herbert created quite a furore by his delightful playing of his tarantelle for the 'cello, a composition which fully demonstrated his technical abilities, and Miss Margulies won hearty applause after her duo with Joseffy. It is no small thing to say of her that in this interesting work of Saint-Saens' she preserved an even balance with the great pianist with whom she played.

Mr. Joseffy has been heard here so frequently that it is but necessary to say that he gave a vigorous rendition of the Liszt concerto. This composition is brilliant without depth, and it is questionable whether it should be classed as a concerto at all. Its themes, which are strongly reminiscent of Liszt's Hungarian fantasy, give it some warmth and color, two qualities which Mr. Joseffy's playing made delightfully prominent. Miss Decca's solos were heartily applauded, and it is due to her to say that she acquitted herself on the concert stage far better than was to have been expected from her operatic experience. She carried off several baskets of flowers and the applause which greeted her return to the stage

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1889.

A NOTABLE MUSICAL EVENT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Baltimore for the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening, under the new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch. The program was one of the best this orchestra has ever presented, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Rubinstein piano-concerto No. 3, in G; Liszt symphonic poem "The Preludes," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

All these works have been frequently performed in Baltimore; and they were therefore all the more highly enjoyed by the very musical audience present. The overture, although one of Mendelssohn's earlier works, is one of his best. It is full of the imagination and fire of youth, and, like Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," is the result of an effort to give musical embodiment to the grandeur of one of Nature's great works.

Professor Carl Baelten was given a hearty welcome by his many Baltimore friends when he came forward to play the Rubinstein concerto. He seated himself in his easy, old-fashioned way, threw his head a little to one side, and was soon at home in his wore of rolling off the allegro moderato of the first movements. Among all the pianists in America there is no one more at home in the rendition of a concerto than he is.

In addition to his wonderful memory and technique as a virtuoso, he is a thorough orchestral musician, and as well acquainted with the parts of all the other instruments as he is with the noble pet Knabe grand piano on which he plays. He is an easy master of all the forms of pianism, and this concerto gives him a splendid opportunity for the fullest display of his very marvelous art. He was heartily recalled, as he thoroughly deserved to be.

The new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, was put to the greatest test in the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, No. 5. The Boston critics have been quite divided over the comparative merits of the former and the present director of the Symphony Orchestra, and it was quite evident that there was room for two parties in Baltimore on the same question. Mr. Nikisch is, to begin with, a more graceful conductor than Mr. Gericke; but both are the subjects of most decided mannerisms, which those who dislike them will persist in regarding as affectations. Mr. Gericke was quite addicted to the flying motion with his arms under the excitement of orchestral leading. He also had a particular wiggle, which he gave at the end of certain beats, and which had no meaning except to indicate the particular spot in Europe from which he came. Mr. Nikisch continues this little peculiarity, which attracts more attention from the audience than it does from the orchestra. He directs without notes, as Mr. Hamerik was in the habit of doing when he came to America. It is justifiable only when both conductor and orchestra are not only absolutely familiar with the work, but have just had it in rehearsal, and when the understanding between conductor and orchestra is simply perfect. Frequently, during the symphony last evening, the orchestra was fully an eighth of a beat behind the conductor, giving to the listener, who tried to follow both eye and ear, the inevitable effect of lack of precision and dragging, which is inexcusable in so fine an organization as the Boston Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch differs widely from his predecessors in the reading of the symphony, as well as from the majority of directors in America. The first movement was taken much slower than usual, and the scherzo undoubtedly suffered in the same way. The andante was well rendered, and in the finale some of the spirit lost in the previous [illegible] recovered.

MUSIC.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHO[illegible]

Under the leadership of Mr. G[illegible] ton Symphony Orchestra won an place in the regard of amateur [illegible] musicians in New York, and the[illegible] was shown at Steinway Hall [illegible] Mr. Gericke's successor, Mr. [illegible] and to note what changes [illegible] personnel of the band and in playing. The band numbers al[illegible] formers, as before. Mr. Knei[illegible] Roumanian whom Mr. Gericke in the place of Bernhard Listema[illegible] the head of the first violins.

Fritz Giese, the famous lead[illegible] celios, has retired in favor of [illegible] and Mr. Nikisch brought over [illegible] complished first clarionetist, a M[illegible] and J. Adamowski (a brothe[illegible] Adamowski, who is among the [illegible] added to the 'celio players, a[illegible] minor additions have also been [illegible] Nikisch himself it may perhap[illegible] he comes from Leipsic, where he [illegible] ductor of the opera for many ye[illegible] place at times of Kapellmeiste[illegible] leader of the Gewandhaus Orches[illegible] best known bands in Europe.

Mr. Gericke was extremely c[illegible] his readings. His successor fo[illegible] called tradition less closely and g[illegible] tional readings to his programs[illegible] shown last night when this p[illegible] performed:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe" ...[illegible]
2. Concerto for violin, op. 77.....
3. Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde".....
4. Symphony in D minor.....

Soloist, Mr. F. Kn[illegible]

It may be said at the outset that the band has lost something in re[illegible] finish. The tone is not quite so pu[illegible] ing not wholly so perfect as it was[illegible] hand, there is a gain—a decided ga[illegible] power, abandon. Under Mr. [illegible] cessor the brass choir, for exam[illegible] gated to a subordinate place even i[illegible] music, the climaxes of which often[illegible] strong quality of tone which only th[illegible] give. Mr. Nikisch, however, allo[illegible] full play, and often with superb[illegible] readings are full of emotional fer[illegible] phrase is counted upon to produce[illegible]

The danger at times seems to[illegible] over-elaboration of details the la[illegible] which the development of the w[illegible] will be in part lost sight of, and [illegible] position, let it be a concerto or a sy[illegible] lose something of the coherency[illegible] which ought to mark it. But on[illegible] playing of the band is fine, the to[illegible] and rich, with less prominence tha[illegible] fore been given to the strings an[illegible] respondingly better balance of [illegible] choirs.

The Schumann symphony sho[illegible] and its conductor at their best, th[illegible] the finale being especially not[illegible] Kneisel played the Brahms con[illegible] telligence and feeling, and ecst[illegible] thusiasm by his interpolated ca[illegible] prelude to "Tristan" one missed [illegible] would have lifted it into the [illegible] working up of the crescendo [illegible] seemed a trifle too studied. The[illegible] played brilliantly. The audience [illegible] the applause was abundant, but s[illegible] the enthusiasm equal that wh[illegible] shown at some of the concerts o[illegible] in former years.

Baroness de Rosen, Mrs. Levi P. Morton, Mrs. James G. Blaine, Mrs. Melville Weston Fuller, Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman, Mrs. John Chandler Bancroft, Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Robert R. Hitt, Mrs. F. A. Ashford, Mrs. A. Graham Bell, Mrs. George L. Bradley, Miss Breckenridge, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. T. W. Palmer, Mrs. Charles Payson, Mrs. Justice Gray, Mrs. Robert K. Stone, Mrs. Elizabeth Hobson, Mrs. M. A. B. Kennedy, Miss Virginia Miller, Mrs. L. N. Anderson, Mrs. J. C. Audenreid, Miss Florence Bayard, Miss Lena Beckwith, Miss Kate Burgess, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. H. A. P. Carter, Miss Dahlgren, Mrs. Charles H. Davis, Miss Rebecca Dodge, Mrs. Admiral Franklin, Mrs. Thomas Gale, Mrs. M. W. Galt, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mrs. Goodloe, Mrs. Hains, Mrs. Kate K. Henry, Miss Caroline Henry, Mrs. W. H. Hoeke, Mrs. Ralph Johnson, Mrs. S. H. Kauffmann, Mrs. J. F. Leech, Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, Mrs. Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Edward McCauley, Mrs. F. B. McGuire, Mrs. J. W. Maury, Mrs. Mason, Miss J. M. Matthews, Miss Merrick, Mrs. Neill, Mrs. V. O. Niles, Mrs. M. L. Norton, Mrs. S. F. Phillips, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. L. C. Robins, Miss Schenck, Mrs. T. O. Selfridge, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Charles Sherrill, Mrs. S. H. Shields, Miss Sicard, Mrs. J. T. Swann, Mrs. Tuckerman, Mrs. B. H. Warder, Mrs. H. A. Willard, M. W. Galt, F. B. McGuire, F. L. Moore, W. S. Thompson, Lewis J. Davis, Reginald Fendall, Robert C. Fox, Charles C. Glover, W. W. Johnston, M. D.; S. H. Kauffman, N. S. Lincoln, M. D.; J. W. H. Lovejoy, M. D.; R. Ross Perry, A. Pollok, Henry Semken, Edward Temple, J. Ford Thompson, M. D.; Nathaniel Wilcox.

The drop-curtain represents the Devil's Lake Canon, Colorado, and is a good piece of landscape work. The setting of the stage last night was also satisfactory from a scenic point of view, and Small, the florist, had generously contributed a large number of palms and potted plants, which made a graceful and decorative appearance.

SCHOOL CHILDREN BURNED.

Terrible Accident at a Christmas Rehearsal at Detroit.

DETROIT, Dec. 20.—Thirty children in the Tilden public school were rehearsing yesterday afternoon for a Christmas cantata which was to have been presented this afternoon for their mates and friends, costumed in gauzy stuff and cotton batting. About twenty of them remained until 5 o'clock, when they were making the final rehearsal of a chorus. One of them held a candle close to the accompanyist that she might the more easily read her notes in the growing darkness, when one of the children, who was swinging a wand, accidentally knocked the candle out of its holder's hand against the dress of the children nearest, and into a pile of inflammable stuff near by.

The costumes of the children took fire instantly, and before the teachers could put out the flames sixteen of them were badly burned, two fatally, three others so badly that they will die, and eleven others seriously. An alarm brought police and hospital ambulances to the scene. The building did not catch fire else the entire party might have been burned to death As it was, Jennie Lankshear, aged 15, was burned about the body horribly, dying a midnight.

Bertha Moody, aged twelve, was burne[illegible] about the hips, head, arms, and face, an[illegible] died this morning. Bessie Bamford, ag[illegible] fourteen, was burned about the body, from the waist up, and will die. Nellie Westgate, aged thirteen, had her hair burned off, inhaled flame, and is given up by the doctors. Lucy Renshaw, aged fifteen, was burned in a similar manner. The physicians have little hope of the recovery of these children. Several others were seriously burned.

Increased Taxable Property South.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Dec. 20.—The Tradesman has reports from the various State auditors and governors throughout the South relative to the increase in taxable wealth and other material interests in the past decade. The reports are from the best sources procurable, and the offic[illegible] inform the Tradesman that they will vary but slightly from the official reports of the United States census. The reports show the following: The assessed valuation from the auditors' books in the twelve Southern States to-day is $3,706,906,168 against $2,164,792,585 in 1880, an increase in the ten years of 71 7-10 per cent. The actual wealth of the South to-day is estimated by the officials at $10,158,700,000 against $5,844,000,000 in 1880.

The Woburn Leather Workers' Strike.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 20.—Although the State board of arbitration will meet a committee of Woburn leather manufacturers to-day, in secret session, to try and effect a settlement of the labor difficulties at Woburn, it is said to be doubtful if any steps of a conciliatory nature will be taken. One of the manufacturers' committee said to a reporter that they agreed to meet the State board as a matter of courtesy, and while they would listen to any suggestions they were not prepared to make any concessions. The committee will issue an address to the public to-day stating their position in the matter.

Ran Into an Open Switch.

MOBILE, Ala., Dec. 20.—The second section of the north-bound freight train, on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, due here at 4 o'clock, ran into an open switch at Orange Grove, thirty-three miles south of this city, and was wrecked. The locomotive turned over, burying Engineer Pierce and killing him instantly, and fatally injuring the fireman, name unknown. Six cars were wrecked.

[illegible] 21, 1889---TWELVE P[illegible]

ST[illegible] BE[illegible]

GORDINEER'S [illegible]

daughter of Senator Sawyer, was one of the most prominent women in the boxes. She wore a decollete gown of brocaded olive velvet, with point lace garniture. A handsome diamond necklace encircled her throat, and big diamonds glistened in her ears. There was a bevy of pretty girls with her, prominent among whom was Miss Wilson, who wore a stylish gown of pale blue India silk.

Mrs. Ruth occupied one of the lower boxes. In one of the upper boxes Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Williams entertained a party of friends. Mrs. Williams was in black velvet, Miss Williams in white faille. Mrs. Senator McPherson was with them, and wore a handsome evening dress of black silk and lace.

Another box was occupied by Professor Emmons and party, Mrs. Emmons looking very charming in a decollette toilet of black silk and lace. Mrs. Markoe occupied another box with a party, noticeable among whom was Mrs. Seth Ackley in a striking costume of black satin and a corsage bouquet of yellow roses. Miss Markoe was in crimson-brocaded velvet with point lace and diamonds. Mrs. Macalister Loughton was with a party in another box.

The orchestra seats were filled with prominent society people in evening dress. There was Mrs. Senator Stewart in an elaborate toilet of white moire and gold. Miss Lay wore a pretty gown of blue silk and silver trimming. Mr. and Mrs. John Bancroft and Miss Bancroft were there, the latter very charming in white silk and olive velvet. Miss Johnston was in black lace, and Miss Key in a costume of white silk covered with black net. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Glover were present, the latter in black velvet with an opera bonnet of white and heliotrope. Mrs. Willard Warner looked charming in ruby velvet.

Others who were present were Baron and Baroness Rosen, Dr. and Mrs. Lewis Bell, Mrs. John C. Fremont, jr., Miss Anderson, Mrs. Fremont's sister; Doctor and Mrs. Ritchie, Miss Sitgrave, Mrs. A. L. Powell, Doctor and Mrs. Hammond, Lieutenant and Mrs. Glover, Lieutenant and Mrs. Richardson, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gordon, Mr. Von Mumm Schwartzenstine, Count Speck, Mrs. Palmer, Mrs. Gray, Mr. R. Ross Perry, Mrs. J. F. Leech, Dr. M. S. Lincoln, Miss Dahlgren, Senor and Madame Hurtado, Mrs. Lucius Tuckerman, Mrs. Willard, Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle, Senator and Mrs. Jones, with a party of six; Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone, Mr. Huntington Jackson, of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Davis, Miss Bertha Lincoln, Mr. and Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Galt, Mr. and Mrs. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. McConley and Mrs. S. Philips.

The patrons of the concert were:

Mme. Ida de Hurtado, Countess de [illegible]

The [illegible] vestigat[illegible] ward Si[illegible] Sergeant[illegible] Represen[illegible] $72,000 o[illegible] that offic[illegible] bers, yes[illegible] court a [illegible] proved t[illegible] containi[illegible] There[illegible] set out [illegible] is charg[illegible] the Nati[illegible] with utt[illegible] riment o[illegible] Third, v[illegible] pretende[illegible] fourth, [illegible] the det[illegible] The firs[illegible] will giv[illegible] paper, t[illegible] ing 108 [illegible] other n[illegible] suffere[illegible] the for[illegible] The n[illegible] used a[illegible] Silcott [illegible] were th[illegible]

Wm. H. [illegible]
Chis F. [illegible]
W. J. St[illegible]
W. H. G[illegible]
M. M. B[illegible]
J. A. An[illegible]
L. W. M[illegible]
C. P. W[illegible]
J. E. W[illegible]
W. J. S[illegible]
H. H. C[illegible]
F. H. P[illegible]
C. L. A[illegible]
R. H. M[illegible]
A. B. M[illegible]
E. H. C[illegible]
W. H. [illegible]
A. G. C[illegible]
W. J. E[illegible]
H. A. [illegible]
F. Law[illegible]
R. A. I[illegible]
R. Bull[illegible]
J. H. [illegible]
J. A. [illegible]
A. C. T[illegible]
J. H. [illegible]

The [illegible] men w[illegible] forwa[illegible]

[48]

Clipping from Press
New York N Y
Date 12/15

MUSIC.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Under the leadership of Mr. Gericke the Boston Symphony Orchestra won an extremely high place in the regard of amateur and professional musicians in New York, and the keenest interest was shown at Steinway Hall last evening to see Mr. Gericke's successor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and to note what changes he had made in the personnel of the band and in the style of its playing. The band numbers about eighty performers, as before. Mr. Kneisel, the young Roumanian whom Mr. Gericke imported to take the place of Bernhard Listemann, remains at the head of the first violins.

Fritz Giese, the famous leader of the violoncellos, has retired in favor of Anton Hekking, and Mr. Nikisch brought over with him an accomplished first clarionetist, a Mr. Goldschmidt. And J. Adamowski (a brother of Timothee Adamowski, who is among the first violins,) is added to the 'cello players, and one or two minor additions have also been made. Of Mr. Nikisch himself it may perhaps be added that he comes from Leipsic, where he has been conductor of the opera for many years, taking the place at times of Kapellmeister Reinecke, the leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, one of the best known bands in Europe.

Mr. Gericke was extremely conservative in his readings. His successor follows what is called tradition less closely and gives more emotional readings to his programmes. This was shown last night when this programme was performed:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
2. Concerto for violin, op. 77 ..... Brahms
3. Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
4. Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

It may be said at the outset that the playing of the band has lost something in refinement and finish. The tone is not quite so pure, the phrasing not wholly so perfect as it was. On the other hand, there is a gain—a decided gain—in virility, power, abandon. Under Mr. Nikisch's predecessor the brass choir, for example, was relegated to a subordinate place even in the Wagner music, the climaxes of which often called for the strong quality of tone which only the brass could give. Mr. Nikisch, however, allows the brass full play, and often with superb effect. His readings are full of emotional fervor, and every phrase is counted upon to produce its effect.

The danger at times seems to be that in the over-elaboration of details the large lines along which the development of the work proceeds will be in part lost sight of, and that the composition, let it be a concerto or a symphony, will lose something of the coherency and dignity which ought to mark it. But on the whole the playing of the band is fine, the tone being full and rich, with less prominence than has heretofore been given to the strings and with a correspondingly better balance of the different choirs.

The Schumann symphony showed the band and its conductor at their best, the romance and the finale being especially noteworthy. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with intelligence and feeling, and aroused much enthusiasm by his interpolated cadenza. In the prelude to "Tristan" one missed something that would have lifted it into the first rank. The working up of the crescendo to the climax seemed a trifle too studied. The overture was played brilliantly. The audience was large and the applause was abundant, but at no time did the enthusiasm equal that which has been shown at some of the concerts of this orchestra in former years.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 12/20

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Both Interesting and Classical—It Proves a Decided Success.

The concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the first of this season's series, was on a whole a very successful one. The programme presented was of an extremely classical character, but at the same time interesting alike to musicians and the general public. Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist, and contributed no small share to the success of the concert.

The opening work performed was Mendelssohn's beautiful overture to "The Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave." This received a very appropriate rendering, the sombre and melancholy sentiment which pervades the whole number being very carefully regarded.

The orchestra, which may be considered a fine one, is very well balanced, with the exception that the brass seems a trifle weak, but this defect, or effect, may be owing to the building, for the Lyceum is not by any means the best place in the world for sound. The string part of the orchestra strikes the hearer as being particularly good; indeed, the whole body play with a most refreshing nerve and beautiful attack.

The Rubinstein concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 3, G. major with Mr. Carl Faelten at the piano, formed one of the greatest successes of the evening. Both pianist and orchestra seemed a trifle cold in the opening movement, but before the allegro risoluto was reached they both warmed to their work, and the very elaborate piece was finished in excellent style. Mr. Faelten has a beautiful, clear, brilliant touch and plenty of fire, but seems a little wanting in sympathy. He was repeatedly recalled after his performance.

"Les Preludes," one of the Abbe Liszt's symphonic poems, was given a most magnificent rendition. In this the orchestra and conductor seemed thoroughly en rapport, and played most artistically. Liszt's claims may be disputed as an original orchestral writer, but hardly with success while such lovely poems as "Les Preludes" and others of the same type exist.

Beethoven's great symphony in C minor formed the piece de resistance of the evening, and in this the rendering was hardly as happy as the preceding numbers. The work was a little below what is looked for by a first-class orchestra, still taken altogether it was well played. Mr. Nikisch was the recipient of much [illegible] well deserved the honors he won

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia Penn
Date 12/18

ARTHUR NIKISCH, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who makes his first Philadelphia appearance at the Academy to-night, is said to have be[illegible]

Clipping from Inquirer
Phila Pa
Date 12/19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been warmly received here during the past four seasons that the fact of its coming last evening with a new conductor would not, at a first concert, be likely to augment or lessen the heartiness of its reception. With artists like Kneisel and Adamowski among the violins; Mole, flute; Sautet, oboe; Reiter, the specially capable first horn, and the rest of the eighty men all artists accustomed to playing at their best when playing together, it is not to be apprehended that they would give anything short of a worthy performance. At the same time the advent of the new leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, added greatly to the interest of last night's concert. His choice of a programme introduced some compositions which were already familiar to many, and his interpretation of them engaged the attention of the audience to an unusual degree.

The largest selection was Schumann's D minor symphony. It is termed the fourth, although chiefly written shortly after the first symphony in 1841. He originally entitled it a symphonic fantasie. It comprises the conventional four movements, but, as Schumann was at this period striving by various experiments to be unconventional, he took the fancy to have no pauses, so that as performed it appears like a single large work. Its romantic spirit is strongly akin to that of the first symphony. As for the interpretation, it may be said that Mr. Nikisch did not select a symphony, even among the four of this composer, in which it would be most easy for the audience to decide upon its merits or methods. This composition has not been very frequently performed here, the two chief favorites of most orchestral conductors having been the "Spring" symphony (No. 1) and the "Rhenish" (No. 3). But its whole spirit is so entirely Schumannesque that the lovers of the composer find themselves in a happy frame of mind from beginning to end. The first impression of Mr. Nikisch as a leader is that he exaggerates the expression. Of small stature, and mounted on an unusually lofty truncated pyramid, he attracts much attention. As the musical ideas of the composition begin to fasten the attention more firmly the hearer is only reminded of the extraordinary precision and unmistakable intention of the conductor. Every motion of the baton has a meaning so clear that a deaf man might follow the work by watching him. The Romanza and Scherzo, with the lovely trio of the latter, were delightfully given. The splendid volume of tone in the strings which attracted attention to the orchestra at its first appearance here, is still maintained, and the fine passages for the leading wind instruments, both wood and brass, were given with a purer and more musical quality of tone than heretofore.

The concert opened with a performance of Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," the only one of his operas which never became popular. Certainly the fine overture was not the cause of its failure. It has been for very many years a favorite number on orchestral programmes. The tendency to exaggerate effects, above hinted at, seemed more obvious in the directing of this composition than in the subsequent music. The "Preludes" of Liszt, so long ago introduced here by the Thomas Orchestra, has never been heard to greater advantage than last evening. Lamartine's "Meditations," on which the music is founded, belong to that early sentimental period of life which is so prettily illustrated in Longfellow's "Hyperion." But Liszt's nature was far more virile than Lamartine's, and he infuses into this production a vehemence and strength that are at times almost overwhelming. The first horn was magnificently played in this work of Liszt's and added much to the solemn beauty of the passages in which it takes a leading part.

Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, formerly of Chicago, a pupil of Leschitiszky, and already heard here as a pianist of much force and intelligence, was the only soloist of the concert. She played, with orchestral accompaniment, Litolff's pianoforte concerto in D minor. This composer has been prolific in his writings, yet comparatively few of them are known here. The one most frequently heard is the "Robespierre" overture. Of last night's concerto we are told by the programme that it was dedicated to the King of Belgium, and the last movement comprises a good deal of the folk-song element. The andanta is graceful and tuneful, but the work as a whole is rather behind the age. It gives brilliant finger exercises for the pianist, with a feeble orchestral background, and seems to savor more of the period of Pleyel and Dussek than of the present time. Knowing how ably Miss Bloomfield can interpret much severer and nobler music, it is somewhat to be regretted that some other selection had not been chosen. Both she and the director were greeted with abundant applause from a large and attentive audience.

Clipping from Times
Springfield O.
Date 12/15

many times hand-fulness.

All the talk about Cincinnati being a great music center is pure newspaper gush. They are giving a series of symphony concerts there, and finding it impossible to fill the great music hall, the concerts are given in the Odeon, a little hall on one side of music hall. Even this is not always filled. Compare this appreciation of high grade classic music with that of Boston, where symphony concerts are given every Saturday in the great music hall, which is invariably crowded. The great Cincinnati opera festivals were successful because they were a novelty. The western storm center of opera has shifted from Cincinnati to Chicago, where the great Abbey Italian Opera organization is now filling an engagement in the Chicago Auditorium building to crowded houses.

Clipping from Transcript
Boston Mass
Date 12/21

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

BOSTON MUSEUM.—"Hands Across the Sea."
BOSTON THEATRE.—"A Midnight Bell."
GLOBE THEATRE.—The Hanlons in "New Fantasma."
TREMONT THEATRE.—"Bluebeard, Jr."
HOLLIS STREET THEATRE.—E. H. Sothern in "Lord Chumley."
PARK THEATRE.—Hallen and Hart in "Later On."
THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL, new cyclorama, 401 Tremont street. 9 A. M. to 10 P. M.
THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, 541 Tremont street. 9 A. M. to 10 P. M. daily. New features.

The symphony concert of last week began with Goldmark's richly-colored overture to "Sakuntala," a work of thoroughly oriental gorgeousness and magnificence. The performance of it was effective, on the whole, but there were times when a more precise and decided marking of the rhythm would have been desirable. Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler played Sitolff's third pianoforte concerto in an absolutely faultless manner. It is a pity, though, that so great technical abilities should be virtually wasted upon a composition which has in it so little that is musically valuable. Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" followed the concerto. "Tristan" is the work in which Wagner said that he tried the hardest to be "his own unbridled self," and it is the work which the Wagner enthusiasts rank highest among the master's music-dramas. Whatever may be said of the opera itself, the prelude in many ways is inferior to either the overture to "Tannhaeuser" or the prelude to "The Mastersingers." The "Tristan" prelude shows a great advance upon earlier works in the matter of harmony, the free use of dissonances and such technical points, and perhaps nothing from any other opera can be compared with it for emotional intensity, but in respect to form, the two overtures just mentioned are superior, inasmuch as each contains within itself strongly contrasting elements, while the unity of the composition is maintained as completely as in the "Tristan" prelude. In spite of the dictum of Wagner and his followers, form, considered broadly, is the essence of art. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, with which the concert concluded, is an exceedingly fresh and vigorous work. Belonging to the same general period as the symphony in B flat, it shows a close relationship to this work in spirit, and occasionally even a thematic resemblance. It received a very satisfactory rendering at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

B. C. H.

Clipping from American
Baltimore Md
Date 12/15

The Boston Symphony [illegible]

The first appearance for the season of this splendid body of artists at the Lyceum Theater to-morrow will be a brilliant and memorable occasion for all lovers of true music. Among the attractive features of the concert will be the performance of Mr. Carl Faelten, the pianist, whom his old friends will be glad to welcome under such favorable auspices. The program, which closes with the immortal Fifth Symphony, is a charming one and worthy of all praise. The main interest, however, centers in the first appearance of the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nitish. His picturesque appearance, his wonderful command of his orchestra and his romantic renderings assist in making him the most interesting figure to-day in the musical life of this country.

Clipping from Telegraph
Phil Pa.
Date 12/18

color.

PERSONAL NOTES.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived at the Lafayette Hotel this morning and will attend the concert at the Academy of Music to-night.

Clipping from Times
Philadelphia Pa
Date 12/15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music this evening, when Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, will make his bow before a Philadelphia audience. The principal numbers of the programme are Schumann's D minor symphony and the piano concerto of Litolff, with Mrs. Zeisler as soloist.

Clipping from Argus
Portland Me
Date 12/21

CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand Christmas festival concert at City Hall, Christmas night. Mr. Arthur Nickish will make his appearance as conductor. Mr. Leo Scholz, soloist. There will be sixty musicians in the orchestra. Good seats on sale at Stockbridge's. Half fare and late trains on the railroads.

Clipping from Bulletin
Phil Pa
Date 12/19

THE STAGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was great interest felt in the concert given last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The attendance was large, but many seats, which had been sold, were not occupied, partly on account of the weather and partly on account of the many entertainments now going on. The band was very full and well-arranged, and the leader's stand was nearly three feet high, so that he could see and be seen by every one of the musicians.

With the promptitude customary at these concerts, this one began very soon after eight, when the slight, delicate form of Mr. Nikisch appeared amid a storm of welcoming plaudits. The beautiful, romantic Euryanthe overture of von Weber was attacked with confidence, and we cannot remember ever hearing it so well played in Philadelphia. Mr. Nikisch's reading is not by any means metronomic. He sees a meaning in every passage, and he interprets it with clearness, elegance, grace and unusual regard to light and shade. In this way he revealed beauties in the composition not always observed.

The second number was a concerto by Litolff, in which the piano part was played by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeissler. There is no sign of divine inspiration in the composition, but it is scholarly and melodious. The pianist is endowed with great strength of arm and fingers, and she mastered the difficulties of the work with ease, if not with consummate grace. In the rapid passages, particularly in the tarantelle-like one of the allegro, her technic was faultless. Abundant applause followed this work, and the lady was called out several times.

Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Préludes, afforded another occasion for showing the perfection of the orchestra and the intelligence of the leader. The last work performed was Schumann's Symphony in D minor—a composition of real genius, which has not been heard here so often as some of his others. The novelty and the variety of its themes and their treatment entitle it to a place in the first rank of symphonies written after Beethoven's time. Mr. Nikisch has given to it the close study that he gives to all his productions. He knows by heart not only every note for every instrument, but every sentiment of the composer. He led, as he did in all the other pieces except the concerto, without the score before him. This enabled him to direct his whole attention to the players, and they faithfully followed his alert directions. As a leader of an orchestra Mr. Nikisch established his reputation by this one concert, showing that he is a worthy graduate of the most musical city of Germany, Leipsig. He will always be welcomed when he comes to Philadelphia with his orchestra.

Clipping from American
Philadelphia Pa.
Date 12/20

—The first of the five chamber concerts which Mr. Adamowski, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged to give at Haseltine's Galleries during the present season, will take place next Saturday afternoon at 3.30 precisely. Mr. Adamowski and his three associates are all brilliant musicians, and their concerts are sure to be [illegible]

Clipping from Press New York N Y
Date 12/21

MUSIC.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Under the leadership of Mr. Gericke the Boston Symphony Orchestra won an extremely high place in the regard of amateur and professional musicians in New York, and the keenest interest was shown at Steinway Hall last evening to see Mr. Gericke's successor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and to note what changes he had made in the personnel of the band and in the style of its playing. The band numbers about eighty performers, as before. Mr. Kneisel, the young Roumanian whom Mr. Gericke imported to take the place of Bernhard Listemann, remains at the head of the first violins.

Fritz Giese, the famous leader of the violoncellos, has retired in favor of Anton Hekking, and Mr. Nikisch brought over with him an accomplished first clarionetist, a Mr. Goldschmidt, and J. Adamowski (a brother of Timothee Adamowski, who is among the first violins,) is added to the 'cello players, and one or two minor additions have also been made. Of Mr. Nikisch himself it may perhaps be added that he comes from Leipsic, where he has been conductor of the opera for many years, taking the place at times of Kapellmeister Reinecke, the leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, one of the best known bands in Europe.

Mr. Gericke was extremely conservative in his readings. His successor follows what is called tradition less closely and gives more emotional readings to his programmes. This was shown last night when this programme was performed:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
2. Concerto for violin, op. 77 ..... Brahms
3. Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
4. Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

It may be said at the outset that the playing of the band has lost something in refinement and finish. The tone is not quite so pure, the phrasing not wholly so perfect as it was. On the other hand, there is a gain—a decided gain—in virility, power, abandon. Under Mr. Nikisch's predecessor the brass choir, for example, was relegated to a subordinate place even in the Wagner music, the climaxes of which often called for the strong quality of tone which only the brass could give. Mr. Nikisch, however, allows the brass full play, and often with superb effect. His readings are full of emotional fervor, and every phrase is counted upon to produce its effect.

The danger at times seems to be that in the over-elaboration of details the large lines along which the development of the work proceeds will be in part lost sight of, and that the composition, let it be a concerto or a symphony, will lose something of the coherency and dignity which ought to mark it. But on the whole the playing of the band is fine, the tone being full and rich, with less prominence than has heretofore been given to the strings and with a correspondingly better balance of the different choirs.

The Schumann symphony showed the band and its conductor at their best, the romance and the finale being especially noteworthy. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with intelligence and feeling, and aroused much enthusiasm by his interpolated cadenza. In the prelude to "Tristan" one missed something that would have lifted it into the first rank. The working up of the crescendo to the climax seemed a trifle too studied. The overture was played brilliantly. The audience was large and the applause was abundant, but at no time did the enthusiasm equal that which has been shown at some of the concerts of this orchestra in former years.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md
Date 12/20

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Both Interesting and Classical—It Proves a Decided Success.

The concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the first of this season's series, was on a whole a very successful one. The programme presented was of an extremely classical character, but at the same time interesting alike to musicians and the general public. Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist, and contributed no small share to the success of the concert.

The opening work performed was Mendelssohn's beautiful overture to "The Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave." This received a very appropriate rendering, the sombre and melancholy sentiment which pervades the whole number being very carefully regarded.

The orchestra, which may be considered a fine one, is very well balanced, with the exception that the brass seems a trifle weak, but this defect, or effect, may be owing to the building, for the Lyceum is not by any means the best place in the world for sound. The string part of the orchestra strikes the hearer as being particularly good; indeed, the whole body play with a most refreshing nerve and beautiful attack.

The Rubinstein concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 3, G. major with Mr. Carl Faelten at the piano, formed one of the greatest successes of the evening. Both pianist and orchestra seemed a trifle cold in the opening movement, but before the allegro risoluto was reached they both warmed to their work, and the very elaborate piece was finished in excellent style. Mr. Faelten has a beautiful, clear, brilliant touch and plenty of fire, but seems a little wanting in sympathy. He was repeatedly recalled after his performance.

"Les Preludes," one of the Abbe Liszt's symphonic poems, was given a most magnificent rendition. In this the orchestra and conductor seemed thoroughly en rapport, and played most delightfully. Liszt's claims may be disputed as an original orchestral writer, but hardly with success while such lovely poems as "Les Preludes" and others of the same type exist.

Beethoven's great symphony in C minor formed the piece de resistance of the evening, and in this the rendering was hardly as happy as the preceding numbers. The work was a little below what is looked for by a first-class orchestra, still taken altogether it was well played. Mr. Nikisch was the recipient of much well deserved the honors he won

Clipping from Call Philadelphia Penn
Date 12/18

ARTHUR NIKISCH, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who makes his first Philadelphia appearance at the Academy to-night, is said to have begun his career as an infant musical prodigy. Most of these precocious youngsters

Clipping from Press Springfield O
Date 12/18

many times hand-running.

All the talk about Cincinnati being a great music center is pure newspaper gush. They are giving a series of symphony concerts there, and finding it impossible to fill the great music hall, the concerts are given in the Odeon, a little hall on one side of music hall. Even this is not always filled. Compare this appreciation of high grade classic music with that of Boston, where symphony concerts are given every Saturday in the great music hall, which is invariably crowded. The great Cincinnati opera festivals were successful because they were a novelty. The western storm center of opera has shifted from Cincinnati to Chicago, where the great Abbey Italian Opera organization is now filling an engagement in the Chicago Auditorium building to crowded houses.

Clipping from Inquirer Phila Pa
Date 12/19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been so warmly received here during the past four seasons that the fact of its coming last evening with a new conductor would not, at a first concert, be likely to augment or lessen the heartiness of its reception. With artists like Kneisel and Adamowski among the violins; Mole, flute; Sautè, oboe; Reiter, the specially capable first horn, and the rest of the eighty men all artists accustomed to playing at their best when playing together, it is not to be apprehended that they would give anything short of a worthy performance. At the same time the advent of the new leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, added greatly to the interest of last night's concert. His choice of a programme introduced some compositions which were already familiar to many, and his interpretation of them engaged the attention of the audience to an unusual degree.

The largest selection was Schumann's D minor symphony. It is termed the fourth, although chiefly written shortly after the first symphony in 1841. He originally entitled it a symphonic fantasie. It comprises the conventional four movements, but, as Schumann was at this period striving by various experiments to be unconventional, he took the fancy to have no pauses, so that as performed it appears like a single large work. Its romantic spirit is strongly akin to that of the first symphony. As for the interpretation, it may be said that Mr. Nikisch did not select a symphony, even among the four of this composer, in which it would be most easy for the audience to decide upon his merits or methods. This composition has not been very frequently performed here, the two chief favorites of most orchestral conductors having been the "Spring" symphony (No. 1) and the "Rhenish" (No. 3). But its whole spirit is so entirely Schumannesque that the lovers of the composer find themselves in a happy frame of mind from beginning to end. The first impression of Mr. Nikisch as a leader is that he exaggerates the expression. Of small stature, and mounted on an unusually lofty truncated pyramid, he attracts much attention. As the musical ideas of the composition begin to fasten the attention more firmly the hearer is only reminded of the extraordinary precision and unmistakable intention of the conductor. Every motion of the baton has a meaning so clear that a deaf man might follow the work by watching him. The Romanza and Scherzo, with the lovely trio of the latter, were delightfully given. The splendid volume of tone in the strings which attracted attention to the orchestra at its first appearance here, is still maintained, and the fine passages for the leading wind instruments, both wood and brass, were given with a purer and more musical quality of tone than heretofore.

The concert opened with a performance of Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," the only one of his operas which never became popular. Certainly the fine overture was not the cause of its failure. It has been for very many years a favorite number on orchestral programmes. The tendency to exaggerate effects, above hinted at, seemed more obvious in the directing of this composition than in the subsequent music. The "Preludes" of Liszt, so long ago introduced here by the Thomas Orchestra, has never been heard to greater advantage than last evening. Lamartine's "Meditations," on which the music is founded, belong to that early sentimental period of life which is so prettily illustrated in Longfellow's "Hyperion." But Liszt's nature was far more virile than Lamartine's, and he infuses into this production a vehemence and strength that are at times almost overwhelming. The first horn was magnificently played in this work of Liszt's and added much to the solemn beauty of the passages in which it takes a leading part.

Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, formerly of Chicago, a pupil of Leschitiszky, and already heard here as a pianist of much force and intelligence, was the only soloist of the concert. She played, with orchestral accompaniment, Litolff's pianoforte concerto in D minor. This composer has been prolific in his writings, yet comparatively few of them are known here. The one most frequently heard is the "Robespierre" overture. Of last night's concerto we are told by the programme that it was dedicated to the King of Belgium, and the last movement comprises a good deal of the folk-song element. The andanta is graceful and tuneful, but the work as a whole is rather behind the age. It gives brilliant finger exercises for the pianist, with a feeble orchestral background, and seems to savor more of the period of Pleyel and Dussek than of the present time. Knowing how ably Miss Bloomfield can interpret much severer and nobler music, it is somewhat to be regretted that some other selection had not been chosen. Both she and the director were greeted with abundant applause from a large and attentive audience.

Clipping from Transcript Boston
Date 12/21

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

BOSTON MUSEUM.—"Hands Across the Sea."
BOSTON THEATRE.—"A Midnight Bell."
GLOBE THEATRE.—The Hanlons in "New Fantasma."
TREMONT THEATRE.—"Bluebeard, Jr."
HOLLIS STREET THEATRE.—E. H. Sothern in "Lord Chumley."
PARK THEATRE.—Hallen and Hart in "Later On."
THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL, new cyclorama 401 Tremont street. 9 A. M. to 10 P. M.
THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, 541 Tremont street. 9 A. M. to 10 P. M. daily. New features.

The symphony concert of last week began with Goldmark's richly-colored overture to "Sakuntala," a work of thoroughly oriental gorgeousness and magnificence. The performance of it was effective, on the whole, but there were times when a more precise and decided marking of the rhythm would have been desirable. Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler played Sitolff's third pianoforte concerto in an absolutely faultless manner. It is a pity, though, that so great technical abilities should be virtually wasted upon a composition which has in it so little that is musically valuable. Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" followed the concerto. "Tristan" is the work in which Wagner said that he tried the hardest to be "his own unbridled self," and it is the work which the Wagner enthusiasts rank highest among the master's music-dramas. Whatever may be said of the opera itself, the prelude in many ways is inferior to either the overture to "Tannhaeuser" or the prelude to "The Mastersingers." The "Tristan" prelude shows a great advance upon earlier works in the matter of harmony, the free use of dissonances and such technical points, and perhaps nothing from any other opera can be compared with it for emotional intensity, but in respect to form, the two overtures just mentioned are superior, inasmuch as each contains within itself strongly contrasting elements, while the unity of the composition is maintained as completely as in the "Tristan" prelude. In spite of the dictum of Wagner and his followers, form, considered broadly, is the essence of art. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, with which the concert concluded, is an exceedingly fresh and vigorous work. Belonging to the same general period as the symphony in B flat, it shows a close relationship to this work in spirit, and occasionally even a thematic resemblance. It received a very satisfactory rendering at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

B. C. H.

Clipping from American Baltimore Md
Date 12/15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance for the season of this splendid body of artists at the Lyceum Theater to-morrow will be a brilliant and memorable occasion for all lovers of true music. Among the attractive features of the concert will be the performance of Mr. Carl Faelten, the pianist, whom his old friends will be glad to welcome under such favorable auspices. The program, which closes with the immortal Fifth Symphony, is a charming one and worthy of all praise. The main interest, however, centers in the first appearance of the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nitish. His picturesque appearance, his wonderful command of his orchestra and his romantic renderings assist in making him the most interesting figure to-day in the musical life of this country.

Clipping from Telegraph Phil Pa.
Date 12/18

color.

PERSONAL NOTES.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived at the Lafayette Hotel this morning and will attend the concert at the Academy of Music to-night.

Clipping from Times Philadelphia Pa
Date 12/18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music this evening, when Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor, will make his bow before a Philadelphia audience. The principal numbers of the programme are Schumann's D minor symphony and the piano concerto of Litolff, with Mrs. Zeisler as soloist.

Clipping from Argus Portland Me
Date 12/21

CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand Christmas festival concert at City Hall, Christmas night. Mr. Arthur Nickish will make his appearance as conductor. Mr. Leo Scholz, soloist. There will be sixty musicians in the orchestra. Good seats on sale at Stockbridge's. Half fare and late trains on the railroads.

Clipping from Bulletin Phil Pa
Date 12/19

THE STAGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was great interest felt in the concert given last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The attendance was large, but many seats, which had been sold, were not occupied, partly on account of the weather and partly on account of the many entertainments now going on. The band was very full and well-arranged, and the leader's stand was nearly three feet high, so that he could see and be seen by every one of the musicians.

With the promptitude customary at these concerts, this one began very soon after eight, when the slight, delicate form of Mr. Nikisch appeared amid a storm of welcoming plaudits. The beautiful, romantic Euryanthe overture of von Weber was attacked with confidence, and we cannot remember ever hearing it so well played in Philadelphia. Mr. Nikisch's reading is not by any means metronomic. He sees a meaning in every passage, and he interprets it with clearness, elegance, grace and unusual regard to light and shade. In this way he revealed beauties in the composition not always observed.

The second number was a concerto by Litolff, in which the piano part was played by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeissler. There is no sign of divine inspiration in the composition, but it is scholarly and melodious. The pianist is endowed with great strength of arm and fingers, and she mastered the difficulties of the work with ease, if not with consummate grace. In the rapid passages, particularly in the tarantelle-like one of the allegro, her technic was faultless. Abundant applause followed this work, and the lady was called out several times.

Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Préludes, afforded another occasion for showing the perfection of the orchestra and the intelligence of the leader. The last work performed was Schumann's Symphony in D minor—a composition of real genius, which has not been heard here so often as some of his others. The novelty and the variety of its themes and their treatment entitle it to a place in the first rank of symphonies written after Beethoven's time. Mr. Nikisch has given to it the close study that he gives to all his productions. He knows by heart not only every note for every instrument, but every sentiment of the composer. He led, as he did in all the other pieces except the concerto, without the score before him. This enabled him to direct his whole attention to the players, and they faithfully followed his alert directions. As a leader of an orchestra Mr. Nikisch established his reputation by this one concert, showing that he is a worthy graduate of the most musical city of Germany, Leipsig. He will always be welcomed when he comes to Philadelphia with his orchestra.

Clipping from American Philadelphia Pa.
Date 12/20

—The first of the five chamber concerts which Mr. Adamowski, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged to give at Haseltine's Galleries during the present season, will take place next Saturday afternoon at 3.30 precisely. Mr. Adamowski and his three associates are all brilliant musicians, and their concerts are sure to be enjoyable.

Clipping from Gazette Newton Mass

Date Dec 28

MUSICAL MATTERS.

MR. NIKISCH AND BOSTON CRITICS.

"Nemo," writing in a recent Saturday Evening Gazette, has at last put into print the subject upon which so much comment and universal denunciation have been heard from musicians of standing ever since Mr. Nikisch's arrival in Boston. "Nemo" says:

"Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke were each obliged to undergo more or less abuse before gaining the suffrage of the public; but neither of these gentlemen suffered worse than has Mr. Nikisch. Boston will soon win the most unenviable reputation of a carping, ill-bred city, unless some limit be set to the personalities that underbred writers are allowed to use. A large and influential paper has no right to employ as musical critic a man who neither understands music nor can appreciate good taste. Some papers carry weight with the masses, who are not in a position to realize the crass ignorance of the writer, and who believe the editor has given his musical department to a man fitted to teach and instruct the public. When personal and ignorant abuse is used instead of criticism, the judicious grieve while the ordinary run of readers are deceived and imposed upon. There is hardly a musician in Boston who does not realize this fact; and yet, for some unexplained reason, such writers are still allowed to occupy their positions. This fact is all the more glaring from the very reason that so many of the Boston papers have employed competent and trained musicians."

It is really an outrage upon a musical public, upon the Symphony orchestra, upon Mr. Nikisch, and upon the generour benefactor who has made possible for Boston to enjoy what it does every Friday and Saturday; for a paper having so widespread an influence over the very class who, being themselves unable to disciminate between the good and the bad in criticism, should by all means be guided by competent and unbiased criticism, it is an outrage for such a paper to employ a man as the teacher of these thousands of readers who not only knows nothing about music beyond a love for that sort of noise which a combination of P. S. Gilmore's band and the Anvil Chorus can alone produce, but, notwithstanding his utter ignorance, always manages to get on the wrong side of everything.

Mr. Higginson, by his generosity, made the Sympnony orchestra what it is; his aim has been to educate the people of Boston; but what could any man do with such obstructions to progress as are constantly offered by this ignorant, malicious sort of work. Mr. Nikisch probably has suffered more than any one else by the attacks of this man; his attacks have been constant and abusive to an extreme; but it is to be hoped that before long a change will be made which will make musical criticism upon all papers what it should be—criticism, and not personal abuse.

Eastern Argus.

JOHN M. ADAMS..... Editor

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1889.

In the evening the eighth Stockbridge, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, called out a large attendance. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, their conducter made his first appearance before a Portland audience, and was very cordially received upon his entrance, and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man of slight build with the alert manner of a French man. He stands upon a high platform to direct without a desk or a book.

Every motion of his baton has a meaning so clear that a deaf man might follow his work by watching him.

Never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. There is nothing lost in technical policy, and at the same time time he is not afraid of his orchestra being heard. He believes in climaxes and under his able leadership the brasses stand out in their proper expressiveness, displaying a splendid sonority and power that it has hitherto lacked. The splendid volume of tone in the strings which always attracts attention, was maintained, and the fine passages for the leading wood instruments were given with a purity and musical quality of tone that placed them within the plane of their former excellence.

Mr. Leo Schulz cellist, is an artist in every sense of the word. He shows a complete understanding of his instrument, and in his selections, which were magnificently rendered with a master's hand, demonstrated his ability beyond question; his interpretation of them engaging the attention of the audience to an unusual degree.

Clipping from American Phil Pa.

Date 12/19

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy of Music.

There was a large but, no doubt owing to the wretched weather, not a crowded audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert here for the present season, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, its new conductor, made his Philadelphia debut. Mr. Nikisch, a handsome man of dark complexion, who has the look of an artist, received a cordial welcome, which having acknowledged, he climbed on the stand, an unusually lofty one, called the orchestra to order, and then with outstretched arm waited for what seemed a long time until every sound had ceased. When perfect stillness had been secured, the baton was waved in a quick, nervous manner, and the performance of Weber's overture "Euryanthe" was begun. At its conclusion the audience had been enabled to form a clear and a favorable idea of Mr. Nikisch's manner and merit as a conductor. With more freedom and breadth of style than his predecessor, he does not fall behind him in refinement and finish. Not the least notable and praiseworthy feature of his work is the extraordinary degree of lucidity to which he attains. The parts given to the different instruments are brought out with so much nicety of expression and justness of proportion that it is easy to follow the various threads of melody and harmony which make up the symphonic whole. The first violins are not allowed to have everything their own way, as is too often the case. That despised and disparaged instrument, the second fiddle, is allowed and encouraged to give its part a proper prominence, and each of the instruments is allowed to make as much of itself as the composer intended that it should. The result is to give the symphony its full meaning and value, and greatly to increase the enjoyment of the intelligent and attentive listener. It had been reputed that Mr, Nikisch makes use of the tempo rabato, and so he does, but not to excess. He does not conduct the orchestra as though he were a human metronome. He understands the expressiveness of a judicious "rallentando," and knows what fine effects can be obtained from the accellerando properly employed. But he does not use either out of place or beyond reason. He gives to the music he interprets both its intellectual and emotional significance, neither awakening it with an undue measure of sentiment nor stiffening it into a lifeless rigidity by a too mechanical adherence to rule and method. As to the playing of the orchestra itself it approached perfection. Never, surely, was a finer body of strings brought together, and both wood and brass are equally irreproachable. Liszt's romantic and poetic composition, "Les Preludes," as rendered by this great organization, was a new revelation, while Schumann's D minor Symphony was played in a way that brought to light all the hidden beauties of that intricate and not very familiar work. The Litolff concerto proved to be a bright interesting composition of no great musical value, and if Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler has not the power and breadth of method which make a pianist entirely great, she has a command of the key-board which secured for her last evening a great deal of well-deserved applause.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 29, 1889.

Echoes of the Symphony and Aus Der Ohe's Playing.

The Stoddard Matinees and Their Manifold Attractions.

"An Evening in Nova Scotia"—Casino Artists Coming—Preludes.

A gentle clapping of hands welcomed Mr. Nikisch back to Boston Friday afternoon. After the triumphal tour of the orchestra, a more generous demonstration might have been expected, even from an unemotional rehearsal audience. However, the concert assemblage last evening made some amends in the manner of greeting the conductor, and, on both occasions, the programme and the manner of its interpretation found a good deal of appreciation—for Boston. A symphonic poem by Liszt, "Festival Echoes," heard for the first time at these concerts, gave Mr. Nikisch's musicians opportunity to present some unique and striking orchestral effects. The work is characteristic of the composer, and while scarcely two in the audience may have found precisely the same meaning in this musical poem it is certain that they were very few who did not listen with pleasure. There was appropriateness in the selection of the pastorale from Bach's "Christmas oratorio," but Mr. Nikisch's reading was less happy than usual—something of the spirit and soul of the master seemed to be wanting. The symphony was Beethoven's second. It came last upon the programme, and on this account the charm of the work itself, and the delightfully sympathetic performance it received did not, perhaps, gain their full value. The larghetto in particular was given with the utmost delicacy, skill and appreciation. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, who is extremely popular here, and most deservedly so, was the soloist yesterday. Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in G gave new and vivid illustration of her wonderful power, skill and artistic feeling. The orchestra, too, seemed to catch the spirit of the concerto. Nothing could well be more delicately subordinated, and yet effective, than the accompaniments, and the musicians, as well as the soloist, may well share in the honors of the remarkable performance.

A new symphony by Borodin, new to America, will begin the programme next Saturday. Mr. Adamowski is to perform a concerto for violin by Saint-Saens for the first time in Boston, and Volkmann's festival overture (new to these concerts) is to round out Mr. Nikisch's novel offerings for his New Year's week concert.

THE PRESS.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 26.

PORTLAND, MAINE.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

While the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at City hall, furnished an evening of unalloyed enjoyment to the great audience, perhaps one feature that aided as much as anything to produce that enjoyment, was the conducting by Herr Nickisch, who made his debut in Portland on that occasion. Apparently a little under medium height, of a slight, well proportioned figure, with a countenance beaming with intelligence, yet, while all these go far to create a pleasing impression, it is the graceful gestures with which he directs, and his wonderful ability to dispense with the music score, that makes him exceptional and remarkable among the great musicians that have preceded him in the position. It is this very ability to conduct without notes that enables him to watch every man in the orchestra and see that he is getting from him a proper reading of the score. Mr. Nickish was not only well received, but he was most warmly applauded at the end of every number.

The concert opened with Goldmark's "Sakuntala," one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school, abounding in beautiful effects, strong contrasts and excellent shading. The orchestra is treated by the composer in a most virile and sensuous way, on a par with Berlioz and Wagner, and Mr. Nickish worked up the band, in its interpretation, in a most spirited and effective manner, showing his magnetic power over his men, and exciting his audience to a high pitch at the climax.

Eckert's "concerto for 'cello in A minor," is the only one of his larger works that holds a place in the concert repertory today. It is free in form. The customary four movements are present, but, as regards the two middle ones, run together in a manner which tends to lessen their individuality. The work is written to be played without a break up to the final allegro. The second subject, which follows after some slight development of the first, is made attractive by charming tonal changes. There is no stated repetition of either theme, the composer giving the solo instument related matter of an agreeable character. Without break, and after a modulation into the key of B flat, there follows a short andante of twenty-four bars that leads into a scherzo vivace of a lively character. The andante theme comes back in a lower position, again the echo of the subject of the scherzo is heard in the accompaniment, while the solo instrument concludes the movement to slow tempo. The dance melodies of the Rondo a la Cosaque are deftly stated and interestingly developed by the solo instrument, while the orchestra affords a vivacious and patriotic accompaniment. Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist, made a highly agreeable impression in his solo work on the 'cello. His tone was rich and full, his style masterly. His admirable technique was particularly shown in the last movement.

The "Norwegian Rhapsodie, No. 2 in A," op. 19, by Svendsen, introduced the composition of a Norwegian whose works are all of very high character, remarkable for strong individuality, conciseness and elaborate finish. The rhapsody presented is a work grotesque in conception, thoroughly characteristic, and while Grove's Dictionary states it does not possess national characteristics, is of a natural character if other standard authorities are to be believed. It was dedicated to Ole Bull. The rhapsody was given by the orchestra in a brilliant manner with all the odd effects pertaining to it.

The "Kol Nidrei" of Bruch's, for 'cello and orchestra, is founded upon a Jewish hymn, always played on the "Day of the Atonement" in the prominent synagogues. It is very solemn in character and beautiful in its melody. In this number Mr. Schulz was apparently perfectly at home, and not only displayed clearly the fine tone of his instrument, but played with great delicacy and tenderness. The orchestral accompaniment, introduced by the harp, rose to grandeur of treatment.

The concert closed with Schumann's op. 52, overture, scherzo and finale. It is a cheerful work, the third written by Schumann in the symphonic form, and was first performed at Leipzig December 6th, 1841. These three movements are wholly symphonic in character although irregular. The work is really a symphony without a slow movement. The number was a fitting termination to this admirable concert, and it was executed by the orchestra in a masterly manner, the climax of the finale being particularly praiseworthy. A more enjoyable ending to the Christmas festivities than the concert of last evening it would be difficult to select.

STOCKBRIDGE

PORTLAND, DEC. 25.

[50]

PROGRAMME.

EIGHTH ENTERTAINMENT.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 25th.

GRAND CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NICKISH, - Conductor.

Soloist: MR. LEO SCHULZ, Cellist.

1. Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala."
2. Eckert, Concerto for Violincello, in A minor, Op. 26.
   Allegro moderato.
   Andante; Scherzo vivace; Andante.
   Allegro non troppo (Rondo à la Cosaque.)
3. Svendsen, Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2, in A, Op. 19.
4. Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for Violincello and Orchestra, Op. 47.
5. Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.

JEWISH MESSENGER.

DECEMBER 27, 1889.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND ARTHUR NIKISCH.

In the art of conducting, the musical public of this town has received within the last three years some decidedly interesting and instructive object lessons. Anton Seidl's reading of a Beethoven symphony affected many of us almost like a shock, for it differed so radically from the placid and often metronomical interpretations to which we had become accustomed. It was not until the greatest living authority on such matters, Hans von Buelow, came over last spring that the controversy provoked by Mr. Seidl was finally allayed, and then only because it was apparent that the readings of the Beethoven interpreter par excellence were quite similar to those adopted by the younger artist.

On the programme of the concert with which Arthur Nikisch recently introduced himself to New York, there was no Beethoven number, but his interpretation of Schumann's fourth symphony and the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" easily enabled us to estimate the extent of his ability and to fix the place which he is destined to occupy in our musical life. It is doing injustice to no one when it is asserted that both selections have never been listened to by local audiences with greater pleasure. The performance of the vorspiel was, indeed, a revelation, so clearly, so eloquently, and with such profound impressiveness was its surging passion and its inexpressible, overwhelming pathos made manifest. Nothing that Wagner has written is better adapted for the concert-room, and the silence of the audience for almost a minute after the orchestra had ceased playing suggested the solemnity of a religious function.

In a concert where lighter pieces predominated I had recently seen Mr. Nikisch in Boston. His efforts then and on the occasion under notice convinced me that in his own sphere the present generation has seen no greater conductor. With a memory, apparently, as phenomenal as Von Buelow's, he exerts the same magnetic influence upon his players, and, moreover, there are no personal eccentricities to detract the listener's attention. Thanks to his able predecessor, Mr. Gericke, the Boston orchestra is a superb instrument, kept in perfect tune by constant use. Upon this instrument Nikisch plays with elegance, fervor, and contagious ardor.

The only novelty at this first concert was Brahms' violin concerto, which Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the strings, performed with admirable technical facility and intelligence. It is a classically severe composition, very learned, very elaborate, and very dry. I enjoyed most the part which Brahm did not write, namely, the cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.

JACQUES MAYER.

Clipping from Chapelus Newton Mass

Date 1/20

MUSICAL MATTERS.

MR. NIKISCH AND BOSTON CRITICS.

"Nemo," writing in a recent Saturday Evening Gazette, has at last put into print the subject upon which so much comment and universal denunciation have been heard from musicians of standing ever since Mr. Nikisch's arrival in Boston. "Nemo" says:

"Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke were each obliged to undergo more or less abuse before gaining the suffrage of the public; but neither of these gentlemen suffered worse than has Mr. Nikisch. Boston will soon win the most unenviable reputation of a carping, ill-bred city, unless some limit be set to the personalities that underbred writers are allowed to use. A large and influential paper has no right to employ as musical critic a man who neither understands music nor can appreciate good taste. Some papers carry weight with the masses, who are not in a position to realize the crass ignorance of the writer, and who believe the editor has given his musical department to a man fitted to teach and instruct the public. When personal and ignorant abuse is used instead of criticism, the judicious grieve while the ordinary run of readers are deceived and imposed upon. There is hardly a musician in Boston who does not realize this fact; and yet, for some unexplained reason, such writers are still allowed to occupy their positions. This fact is all the more glaring from the very reason that so many of the Boston papers have employed competent and trained musicians."

It is really an outrage upon a musical public, upon the Symphony orchestra, upon Mr. Nikisch, and upon the generour benefactor who has made it possible for Boston to enjoy what it does every Friday and Saturday; for a paper having so widespread an influence over the very class who, being themselves unable to disciminate between the good and the bad in criticism, should by all means be guided by competent and unbiased criticism, it is an outrage for such a paper to employ a man as the teacher of these thousands of readers who not only knows nothing about music beyond a love for that sort of noise which a combination of P. S. Gilmore's band and the Anvil Chorus can alone produce, but, notwithstanding his utter ignorance, always manages to get on the wrong side of everything.

Mr. Higginson, by his generosity, made the Sympnony orchestra what it is; his aim has been to educate the people of Boston; but what could any man do with such obstructions to progress as are constantly offered by this ignorant, malicious sort of work. Mr. Nikisch probably has suffered more than any one else by the attacks of this man; his attacks have been constant and abusive to an extreme; but it is to be hoped that before long a change will be made which will make musical criticism upon all papers what it should be—criticism, and not personal abuse.

Eastern Argus.

JOHN M. ADAMS.....Editor.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1889.

In the evening the eighth Stockbridge, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, called out a large attendance. Mr. Arthur Nickisch, their conductor made his first appearance before a Portland audience, and was very cordially received upon his entrance, and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man of slight build with the alert manner of a Frenchman. He stands upon a high platform to direct without a desk or a book.

Every motion of his baton has a meaning so clear that a deaf man might follow his work by watching him.

Never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. There is nothing lost in technical policy, and at the same time time he is not afraid of his orchestra being heard. He believes in climaxes and under his able leadership the brasses stand out in their proper expressiveness, displaying a splendid sonority and power that it has hitherto lacked. The splendid volume of tone in the strings which always attracts attention, was maintained, and the fine passages for the leading wood instruments were given with a purity and musical quality of tone that placed them within the plane of their former excellence.

Mr. Leo Schulz cellist, is an artist in every sense of the word. He shows a complete understanding of his instrument, and in his selections, which were magnificently rendered with a master's hand, demonstrated his ability beyond question, his interpretation of them engaging the attention of the audience to an unusual degree.

Clipping from Commercial Phil Pa.

Date 12/19

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy of Music.

There was a large but, no doubt owing to the wretched weather, not a crowded audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert here for the present season, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, its new conductor, made his Philadelphia debut. Mr. Nikisch, a handsome man of dark complexion, who has the look of an artist, received a cordial welcome, which having acknowledged, he climbed on the stand, an unusually lofty one, called the orchestra to order, and then with outstretched arm waited for what seemed a long time until every sound had ceased. When perfect stillness had been secured, the baton was waved in a quick, nervous manner, and the performance of Weber's overture "Euryanthe" was begun. At its conclusion the audience had been enabled to form a clear and a favorable idea of Mr. Nikisch's manner and merit as a conductor. With more freedom and breadth of style than his predecessor, he does not fall behind him in refinement and finish. Not the least notable and praiseworthy feature of his work is the extraordinary degree of lucidity to which he attains. The parts given to the different instruments are brought out with so much nicety of expression and justness of proportion that it is easy to follow the various threads of melody and harmony which make up the symphonic whole. The first violins are not allowed to have everything their own way, as is too often the case. That despised and disparaged instrument, the second fiddle, is allowed and encouraged to give its part a proper prominence, and each of the instruments is allowed to make as much of itself as the composer intended that it should. The result is to give the symphony its full meaning and value, and greatly to increase the enjoyment of the intelligent and attentive listener. It had been reputed that Mr. Nikisch makes use of the tempo rabato, and so he does, but not to excess. He does not conduct the orchestra as though he were a human metronome. He understands the expressiveness of a judicious "rallentando," and knows what fine effects can be obtained from the accellerando properly employed. But he does not use either out of place or beyond reason. He gives to the music he interprets both its intellectual and emotional significance, neither awakening it with an undue measure of sentiment nor stiffening it into a lifeless rigidity by a too mechanical adherence to rule and method. As to the playing of the orchestra itself it approached perfection. Never, surely, was a finer body of strings brought together, and both wood and brass are equally irreproachable. Liszt's romantic and poetic composition, "Les Preludes," as rendered by this great organization, was a new revelation, while Schumann's D minor Symphony was played in a way that brought to light all the hidden beauties of that intricate and not very familiar work. The Litolff concerto proved to be a bright interesting composition of no great musical value, and if Mrs. Bloomfield-Ziesler has not the power and breadth of method which make a pianist entirely great, she has a command of the key-board which secured for her last evening a great deal of well-deserved applause.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 29, 1889.

Echoes of the Symphony and Aus Der Ohe's Playing.

The Stoddard Matinees and Their Manifold Attractions.

"An Evening in Nova Scotia"—Casino Artists Coming—Preludes.

A gentle clapping of hands welcomed Mr. Nikisch back to Boston Friday afternoon. After the triumphal tour of the orchestra, a more generous demonstration might have been expected, even from an unemotional rehearsal audience. However, the concert assemblage last evening made some amends in the manner of greeting the conductor, and, on both occasions, the programme and the manner of its interpretation found a good deal of appreciation—for Boston. A symphonic poem by Liszt, "Festival Echoes," heard for the first time at these concerts, gave Mr. Nikisch's musicians opportunity to present some unique and striking orchestral effects. The work is characteristic of the composer, and while scarcely two in the audience may have found precisely the same meaning in this musical poem it is certain that they were very few who did not listen with pleasure. There was appropriateness in the selection of the pastorale from Bach's "Christmas oratorio," but Mr. Nikisch's reading was less happy than usual—something of the spirit and soul of the master seemed to be wanting. The symphony was Beethoven's second. It came last upon the programme, and on this account the charm of the work itself, and the delightfully sympathetic performance it received did not, perhaps, gain their full value. The larghetto in particular was given with the utmost delicacy, skill and appreciation. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, who is extremely popular here, and most deservedly so, was the soloist yesterday. Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in G gave new and vivid illustration of her wonderful power, skill and artistic feeling. The orchestra, too, seemed to catch the spirit of the concerto. Nothing could well be more delicately subordinated, and yet effective, than the accompaniments, and the musicians, as well as the soloist, may well share in the honors of the remarkable performance.

A new symphony by Borodin, new to America, will begin the programme next Saturday. Mr. Adamowski is to perform a concerto for violin by Saint-Saens for the first time in Boston, and Volkmann's festival overture (new to these concerts) is to round out Mr. Nikisch's novel offerings for his New Year's week concert.

THE PRESS.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 26.

PORTLAND, MAINE.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

While the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at City hall, furnished an evening of unalloyed enjoyment to the great audience, perhaps one feature that aided as much as anything to produce that enjoyment, was the conducting by Herr Nickisch, who made his debut in Portland on that occasion. Apparently a little under medium height, of a slight, well proportioned figure, with a countenance beaming with intelligence, yet, while all these go far to create a pleasing impression, it is the graceful gestures with which he directs, and his wonderful ability to dispense with the music score, that makes him exceptional and remarkable among the great musicians that have preceded him in the position. It is this very ability to conduct without notes that enables him to watch every man in the orchestra and see that he is getting from him a proper reading of the score. Mr. Nickish was not only well received, but he was most warmly applauded at the end of every number.

The concert opened with Goldmark's "Sakuntala," one of the most impassioned, sterling and masterly overtures of the modern school, abounding in beautiful effects, strong contrasts and excellent shading. The orchestra is treated by the composer in a most virile and sensuous way, on a par with Berlioz and Wagner, and Mr. Nickish worked up the band, in its interpretation, in a most spirited and effective manner, showing his magnetic power over his men, and exciting his audience to a high pitch at the climax.

Eckert's "concerto for 'cello in A minor," is the only one of his larger works that holds a place in the concert repertory today. It is free in form. The customary four movements are present, but, as regards the two middle ones, run together in a manner which tends to lessen their individuality. The work is written to be played without a break up to the final allegro. The second subject, which follows after some slight development of the first, is made attractive by charming tonal changes. There is no stated repetition of either theme, the composer giving the solo instument related matter of an agreeable character. Without break, and after a modulation into the key of B flat, there follows a short andante of twenty-four bars that leads into a scherzo vivace of a lively character. The andante theme comes back in a lower position, again the echo of the subject of the scherzo is heard in the accompaniment, while the solo instrument concludes the movement to slow tempo. The dance melodies of the Rondo a la Cosaque are deftly stated and interestingly developed by the solo instrument, while the orchestra affords a vivacious and patriotic accompaniment. Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist, made a highly agreeable impression in his solo work on the 'cello. His tone was rich and full, his style masterly. His admirable technique was particularly shown in the last movement.

The "Norwegian Rhapsodie, No. 2 in A," op. 19, by Svendsen, introduced the composition of a Norwegian whose works are all of very high character, remarkable for strong individuality, conciseness and elaborate finish. The rhapsody presented is a work grotesque in conception, thoroughly characteristic, and while Grove's Dictionary states it does not possess national characteristics, is of a natural character if other standard authorities are to be believed. It was dedicated to Ole Bull. The rhapsody was given by the orchestra in a brilliant manner with all the odd effects pertaining to it.

The "Kol Nidrei" of Bruch's, for 'cello and orchestra, is founded upon a Jewish hymn, always played on the "Day of the Atonement" in the prominent synagogues. It is very solemn in character and beautiful in its melody. In this number Mr. Schulz was apparently perfectly at home, and not only displayed clearly the fine tone of his instrument, but played with great delicacy and tenderness. The orchestral accompaniment, introduced by the harp, rose to grandeur of treatment.

The concert closed with Schumann's op. 52, overture, scherzo and finale. It is a cheerful work, the third written by Schumann in the symphonic form, and was first performed at Leipzig December 6th, 1841. These three movements are wholly symphonic in character although irregular. The work is really a symphony without a slow movement. The number was a fitting termination to this admirable concert, and it was executed by the orchestra in a masterly manner, the climax of the finale being particularly praiseworthy. A more enjoyable ending to the Christmas festivities than the concert of last evening it would be difficult to select.

STOCKBRIDGE

PORTLAND, DEC. 25.

[50]

PROGRAMME.

EIGHTH ENTERTAINMENT.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 25th.

GRAND CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NICKISH, - Conductor.

Soloist: MR. LEO SCHULZ, Cellist.

1. Goldmark, Overture, "Sakuntala."
2. Eckert, Concerto for Violincello, in A minor, Op. 26.
   Allegro moderato.
   Andante; Scherzo vivace; Andante.
   Allegro non troppo (Rondo à la Cosaque.)
3. Svendsen, Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2, in A, Op. 19.
4. Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for Violincello and Orchestra, Op. 47.
5. Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.

JEWISH MESSENGER.

DECEMBER 27, 1889.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND ARTHUR NIKISCH.

In the art of conducting, the musical public of this town has received within the last three years some decidedly interesting and instructive object lessons. Anton Seidl's reading of a Beethoven symphony affected many of us almost like a shock, for it differed so radically from the placid and often metronomical interpretations to which we had become accustomed. It was not until the greatest living authority on such matters, Hans von Buelow, came over last spring that the controversy provoked by Mr. Seidl was finally allayed, and then only because it was apparent that the readings of the Beethoven interpreter par excellence were quite similar to those adopted by the younger artist.

On the programme of the concert with which Arthur Nikisch recently introduced himself to New York, there was no Beethoven number, but his interpretation of Schumann's fourth symphony and the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" easily enabled us to estimate the extent of his ability and to fix the place which he is destined to occupy in our musical life. It is doing injustice to no one when it is asserted that both selections have never been listened to by local audiences with greater pleasure. The performance of the vorspiel was, indeed, a revelation, so clearly, so eloquently, and with such profound impressiveness was its surging passion and its inexpressible, overwhelming pathos made manifest. Nothing that Wagner has written is better adapted for the concert-room, and the silence of the audience for almost a minute after the orchestra had ceased playing suggested the solemnity of a religious function.

In a concert where lighter pieces predominated I had recently seen Mr. Nikisch in Boston. His efforts then and on the occasion under notice convinced me that in his own sphere the present generation has seen no greater conductor. With a memory, apparently, as phenomenal as Von Buelow's, he exerts the same magnetic influence upon his players, and, moreover, there are no personal eccentricities to detract the listener's attention. Thanks to his able predecessor, Mr. Gericke, the Boston orchestra is a superb instrument, kept in perfect tune by constant use. Upon this instrument Nikisch plays with elegance, fervor, and contagious ardor.

The only novelty at this first concert was Brahms' violin concerto, which Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the strings, performed with admirable technical facility and intelligence. It is a classically severe composition, very learned, very elaborate, and very dry. I enjoyed most the part which Brahm did not write, namely, the cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.

JACQUES MAYER.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 21, 1889.

Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening. This, together with the fact that it was the first appearance here of the new conductor, Herr Nikisch, attracted a large audience, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a splendid body of musicians, trained so perfectly that its members play as one man. But this we knew before, and it only remained for us to see what the new conductor would do with the fine material under his charge. As far as the observations went upon this occasion the opinion was quite satisfactory, but it was not a programme to fully judge his powers on, for outside of Weber's Euryanthe overture, with which the concert opened, the music all partook of the modern romantic period, in which Herr Nikisch would naturally be supposed to be at home. Even Von Weber's Euryanthe overture is quite as romantic in its sensuous play of melody as the compositions of the present day.

Wagner's Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isolde" was certainly given with thrilling intensity, after which Schumann's delightful Symphony in D-minor came as a delicious relief. How freely Schumann handled the orchestra, and how well he understood its capacity and capabilities. The richness of the themes of this symphony and their masterly development are hardly surpassed by anything of their kind. The orchestra and their leader were plainly at home in Schumann's beautiful measures and the intepretation was a masterly one.

Herr Nikisch weighs his points well, and is upon the whole rather conservative, but when his arm strikes out a little sharply the orchestra responds with a power and brilliancy that is superb. The man is not a demonstrative conductor, and his motions are very small, but emphatic, but when he departs from the conventional beat it means something beyond the ordinary. His further programmes will be awaited with interest.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Kneisel has been heard here before and his playing has been critically praised, but he earned added laurels by a magnificent interpretation of Brahms' violin concerto, Opus. 77. This concerto is full of technical difficulties, but Mr. Kneisel's bow is a skillful one and he played with delightful ease and abandon. His pure tone, correct intonation, and artistic touch were greatly appreciated in the intricate measures. In addition to his exceptionally fine performance Mr. Kneisel surprised his hearers with a cadenza in the first movement of his own composition. It was not a mere cadenza for exploiting a facile bow and nimble fingers, but a dignified cadenza whose solid worth was an ornament to the composition. Mr. Kneisel took some of the themes from the concerto and wove them most ingeniously, which made it a legitimate finale. Mr. Kneisel was warmly applauded and several times recalled.

New-Yorker Handels-Zeitung, 21. December

"Boston Symphony Orchestra", zu welchem sich, trotz des wahrhaften Hundewetters, an das man allerdings in New York gewöhnt wird, ein die grosse Halle sammt allem Nebengelass vollständig füllendes Publikum erwartungsvollst eingefunden hatte. Die sehr hohen Erwartungen, die man an das erste Erscheinen des Herrn Nik sch vor einem New Yorker Publikum geknüpft, haben sich vollständig realisirt, und kann das Bostoner Orchester, das — offen gestanden — uns das beste der Ver. Staaten zu sein scheint, sich gratuliren, einen derartigen Nachfolger des Herrn Gericke, welcher seinen Truppen so oft zum Siege verholfen, gefunden zu haben. Herr Nikisch, nebenbei bemerkt eine auffallend schöne Künstler-Erscheinung, dessen Kopf uns lebhaft an den Paul Heyse's in jüngeren Jahren und an den des leider so früh verstorbenen Moritz Hartmann erinnerte, dirigirt mit einer vornehmen Ruhe; man fühlt sich, obgleich Herr Nikisch meistens auswendig dirigirt, sofort vollkommen sicher; an ein "Umschmeissen" des Orchesters ist unter seiner Hand nicht zu denken. Die einzelnen Programm-Nummern, darunter die Euryanthe-Ouverture von C. M. v. Weber, das geradezu unübertrefflich gespielte Vorspiel zu Tristan und Isolde von Wagner sowie die D-moll Symphonie von Schumann wurden mit lautem Jubel seitens des Publikums aufgenommen; ebenso erntete der Concertmeister des Bostoner Orchesters, Herr Franz Kneisel, der Brahm's Violin-Concert in D. mit Orchester-Begleitung spielte, mit Recht reichen Beifall für seine Leistung. Alles in Allem war es ein höchst genussreicher Abend, der allen Anwesenden in angenehmster Erinnerung bleiben wird. Dem "Manager" dieser Concerte, Herrn C. A. Ellis, gebührt der besondere Dank für die jedem Zuhörer mit dem Programm eingehändigten historischen und analytischen Noten, welche — in Pamphlet-Form gebunden — werthvolle Aufschlüsse und Angaben über die einzelnen zur Aufführung gelangten Tonstücke enthalten.

Am Mittwoch Abend gab die Pianistin Frl. Anna Schulte, eine Schülerin des Herrn S. B. Mills, unter Mitwirkung diverser Künstler und Künstlerinnen, ein Concert in Steinway Hall und wurde von dem Publikum für ihr mit bravuröser Technik verbundenes Spiel, das allerdings, wohl eine Folge ihrer Jugend, noch an manchen Unebenheiten leidet, vielfach ausgezeichnet.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVER welcome as the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been in the last few years, the first one of the present season, which took place on Tuesday evening of last week, was doubly so, for, first of all, New York does not this winter suffer from the last seasons' overdose of good orchestral concerts, and, secondly, everybody who is anybody was curious to hear the excellent organization under their famous new conductor, Arthur Nikisch.

The reports from Boston that had preceded him to this city were of the most glowing description, and let it be said at the outset that they were not exaggerated. Nikisch is a conductor to the manner born and a musician of powerful and original mind. You may be startled by what he does, you may even not always agree with his conception and carrying out of an idea, yet you will be forced to admit that it is musical and that the effect produced seems to justify the means employed. The orchestra under him has retained all the brilliancy in the strings, the rhythmic precision and the general finish of its performances for which it was noted under Gericke, but it has now added to these fine qualities a brio, a dash, a verve, an ease and abandon, and above all a sonority in the brasses and a general virility of tone and freedom in expression which formerly were more or less absent. It is "Prometheus Unbound" against the former "Prometheus Bound."

Nikisch knows every note of what he conducts from memory, he indicates every entrance by look and gesture, he phrases with each solo instrument, his beat is firm and decisive, and as he is magnetic and convincing to a degree it is no wonder that he carries the entire orchestra with him on the wings of his own imagination and inspiration, and the performances therefore become real interpretations and not mere mechanical reproductions. His readings moreover are always interesting and original, sometimes, as we said before, startling, but ever musical. The "Euryanthe" overture sounded new and fresh, the episode for muted violins absolutely heavenly and the working up of the final climax noble and grand. The familiar "Tristan" Vorspiel was taken at an unusually slow tempo, but worked out to a degree of finish and clearness of detail, as well as warmth of color that seemed to warrant the slower tempo. And the same may be said with regard to the scherzo of the Schumann D minor symphony, in the reading of which work Mr. Nikisch fairly outdid himself and the original interpretation of which invested the well-known and oft-heard work with a charm of novelty it never before seemed to possess. Note the beautiful working up of the coda of the scherzo, the exquisite little ritardando in the second theme of the last movement and a number of effects too numerous to mention.

It makes one smile to see in an alleged musical paper, which even before Nikisch's arrival vented its hostility upon him, the puerile attempts at belittling his powers. After abusing him for his readings of the two shorter works and yet not being able to deny the success of the symphony, the critic (?) in question tries to crawl out of it as follows:

> The Schumann symphony was given in a more satisfactory manner, owing, perhaps, to the artistic merit of the superb work and to the richness and variety of the instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius and to the sublime creative power of Schumann.

Imagine anybody talking about "the richness and variety of Schumann's instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius of Schumann," while every musician knows and acknowledges that the instrumentation is the weakest spot in Schumann's orchestral works, and a man like Raff even was possessed with the idea to re-orchestrate all four of Schumann's symphonies. Only a musical, or rather unmusical, rhinoceros could have written such a sentence, which in itself is on a par with his utterance on Schubert's immortal C major symphony, a work admired by Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn, and about which the same rhinoceros says:

> Thomas is still our greatest director, and even the monotonous and interminable Schubert symphony in C can be listened to, under his baton, with interest if not with pleasure.

And yet such rhinoceroses are allowed to vent their spleen on composers, conductors and their fellow critics!

The soloist of this concert was Franz Kneisel, the efficient concertmeister of the Boston orchestra, and he played the difficult and not over grateful D major violin concerto by Brahms in a manner worthy of the highest praise. His intonation was always pure, even in the most difficult passages; his tone, if not very big, is sweet and agreeable: his conception and phrasing intelligent and musicianly, and his bowing good. A most difficult cadenza of his own composition was played by Mr. Kneisel with such abundant technic and surety that it alone would have sufficed to convince anybody of the concertmeister's skill on his chosen instrument. He was generously applauded by a large sized and fashionable audience; which made Steinway Hall resound with enthusiastic applause also after each of the efforts of the Boston orchestra and its genial conductor.

WE had a very enjoyable visit last Monday morning from Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. Mr. Nikisch is more than pleased with his reception in the metropolis, Boston and Washington. He was particularly amused at a recent New Haven criticism of his conducting, in which the critic enthusiastically stated that Mr. Nikisch not only conducted without note but even without a music stand.

I fancy everybody that is or claims to be musical was at the Nikisch concert last week. One familiar face after another followed fast and faster, and it seemed as if Mr. Nikisch was about to have an audience composed entirely of musicians and critics.

When Nikisch appeared an interested lady back of me exclaimed, "Aren't his legs thin?"

The new conductor is agile, that is, to judge by the way he jumped up on the lofty structure which served as his standing place. He certainly overlooked matters in general, and the next thing I suppose will be baby prodigy conductors, directing their forces from a stepladder.

The most noticeable thing after Nikisch's rubato beat are his small white and well kept hands.

They are digital poems.

BALTIMORE, December 21, 1889.

SINCE my last we have heard that splendid organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new, interesting and highly accomplished leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch. You are aware that I never attempt to criticise organizations from abroad whose work has already been reviewed in THE MUSICAL COURIER. The "Fingal's Cave" overture, Rubinstein's concerto in G, the No. 3 played by Carl Faelten, Les Preludes and Beethoven's fifth comprised the program, played gloriously.

The Kneisel Quartet, that company of thorough artists, appeared at the second Faelten Music School concert this evening. The D minor Schubert quartet was really an extraordinary performance, displaying deep musical intelligence and a high regard for the character of the work. The B flat major Rubinstein piano trio was played with Mrs. Rheinhold Faelten at the piano. The lady distinguished herself and was also complimented by the members of the quartet. Mr. Melamet, a baritone, who came here lately, sang the Beethoven cyclus, "To the Distant Beloved."

Prof. Richard Burmeister gave a piano recital yesterday. The program, a performance worthy of the artist, was Beethoven's E major sonata, op. 90; Grieg's sonata in E minor, op. 7, and Liszt's B minor sonata—a rare program.

The Boston Ideals are announced for next week.

HANS SLICK.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 21, 1889.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

FOR a wonder the censors found no special fault with Nikisch's interpretations. Nay, they could not even mix their bitter brew with references to his standing sin, occasionally resting his hand on his hip,—a criticism which has as much to do with his reading of the Fifth Symphony, as might the fact that Beethoven wrote part of it in his nightshirt, en route between Kahlenberg and Heiligenstadt.

There were two novelties; first, Haydn's Symphony, called the Bear, one of the half-dozen composed for Paris, in 1786, which won him the lasting esteem of Cherubini. It is brimful of melody. The programme said: "It will doubtless puzzle the hearer of Haydn's gentle measures to find the Bear;" but Bruin comes on the rampage in the fourth movement. Indeed it is not hard to hear in this symphony a summer outing, with a juvenile picnic upset by a vagrant wildling, who sends the children scattering; only one in vain waits for the death-shot, possibly because the bear was suddenly tamed.

The second novelty at the concert was a Violin Concerto in D, op. 77, by Brahms, played with extraordinary fineness by Franz Kneisel, who himself wrote a long cadenza in the first movement, left open by Brahms for some such purpose,—the first thing of his own which Mr. Kneisel has given to us. The concerto was written a decade ago for Joachim, and naturally enough is a vehicle for virtuosity, or readily lends itself to that purpose. It is in three movements; in the older classic form: 1, Allegro; 2, Adagio, formerly called poco larghetto; 3, Rondo, allegro giocoso, to which the composer added ma non troppo, after a few performances.

The other two numbers were in no sense novelties; but Beethoven's Dedication Overture is always acceptable; and what can be sweeter than Schubert's Unfinished Symphony with its quiet hopefulness.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1889.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Both rehearsal and concert were very crowded, and the following programme was offered:

Symphonic poem No. 7, "Fest-Klänge"..Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte in G major..Rubinstein
Pastorale from Christmas oratorio.....Bach
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Beethoven

The Liszt symphonic poem was heard for the first time at these concerts, and there does not seem to be any adequate ground for wishing it to be heard again. It is one of the least interesting of the twelve compositions of this class from the great Hungarian master's pen. Its orchestration is ineffective, and its form disjointed and insufferably long drawn out. It was superbly played by the orchestra, and one cannot but wonder that Mr. Nikisch was able to memorize it, as there is so little for the mind to grasp. Reference must be made in this connection to the following passage in the analytical programme notes prepared by Mr. G. H. Wilson: "The portrayal of a series of scenes in illustration of some great national festival seems to have been Liszt's aim. In elucidation of this Mr. C. A. Barry notes that the entrada (introduction) which gives rise to strong feelings of expectation, due in each instance to the superposition of a tonic phrase upon the minor seventh of the key, may be regarded as a proclamation that the festival has begun, and at the same time as indicative of the reception of the festive guests in procession." This style of musical analysis is very popular in England; it passes for "learning" over there, and the aforesaid Mr. C. A. Barry is the high priest of the essentially mystic rites of this school; but that does not justify Mr. Wilson in quoting such hopeless twaddle and placing it before an intelligent Boston audience to read. If there is any definite purpose at all in analytical programmes it is that they should explain the music as far as possible, and in a manner which will assist the layman to perceive and appreciate what would otherwise escape him. The stilted, pompous language of the English programmes—to say nothing of their absurd musical definitions and misstatements—has been for years a source of infinite amusement to Continental musicians, and it is certainly an affliction which the American concert-goer ought not to have put upon him.

The Rubinstein G major concerto is anything but a diverting work. No matter how well it may be played, it is certain to be a bore. It belongs to the class of exhibition composition for the pianoforte, and its first and last movements would make an excellent compendium which might be entitled "A complete collection of scales, trills and arpeggios for the modern pianoforte, for advanced pupils only." Miss Aus der Ohe played it superbly. This young lady's technical attainments are very great, but they are considerably in advance of her musical intelligence at present, although she is certainly improving in this direction. For this reason she did wisely to select a work of a showy and brilliant nature as more conducive to success than a more serious and intellectual composition would have been under her fingers. At both rehearsal and concert a number of people, especially those of the large crowd standing up, left after the concerto. This is difficult to explain, and it certainly justifies one in having grave doubts as to the musical knowledge and intelligence of such people. They undoubtedly came chiefly to hear Miss Aus der Ohe play: probably many of them were students, and, if so, they did wisely, for they could all learn a great deal from her. Still, although she is a fine player, she is not a great player; and on this particular occasion she did not play a great work, while the rest of the programme, which these "students" neglected, offered two very great works, from which they might have learned much more. Let us hope that some time the present craze for piano playing will die out, and this useful instrument be relegated to its proper subordinate functions; when this does happen, the cause of music proper will be advanced about a thousand per cent. The Bach pastorale was beautifully played and most expressively read, and the conception of the symphony was grand and noble. The eternally beautiful slow movement was played as nearly perfectly as the most cautious critic could wish, and the last movement was rendered with fire and brilliancy.

Such people as have complained of Mr. Nikisch's programmes and maintained that he was not keeping his promises as to novelties ought to be satisfied next week, as the whole programme consists of works never before played in this city. The soloist will be Mr. Adamowski.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 30, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The soloist at Saturday evening's concert was Miss Aus Der Ohe, always a favorite with a Boston audience, and she was given a royal welcome. She had chosen Rubinstein's Concerto in G, a selection abounding in difficulties of technique and requiring the interpretation of a master hand. To say that these difficulties were fully met is but to echo the feelings of the Music Hall audience Saturday night. Her rendition of the number was grand. Her playing is always to be remembered, but it seemed as if there was more breadth of style, a deeper feeling and a more exquisite refinement in it than at previous appearances. The entire concerto was given with precision of touch, and showed the interpretation of an artist in entire sympathy with the composer's spirit. Miss Aus Der Ohe was given an ovation at the close of the number.

The feature of the concert outside of the piano playing was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, in D, the last selection on the programme. This was given a very conservative interpretation, and was by far the most interesting selection on the programme by the orchestra. Particularly beautiful was the larghetto; not only the music in itself, but Mr. Nikisch's rendering of it. Bach's pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio was disappointing, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, with which the concert opened, although new to a symphony audience, was not received with special favor; not, however, from any fault in its delivery. There were fewer "standees" than usual, and Mr. Nikisch did not receive the cordial greeting on his entrance that ought to have been his, on his return from the most successful trip the orchestra has taken away from home. At the next concert Mr. Adamowski is to be the soloist. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto by Saint Saens, and the orchestra will give a symphony by Barodin and Volkmann's Festival Overture.

BOSTON, MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1889.

The Symphony Concert, Miss Aus der Ohe Soloist.

The Casino Company's Boston Engagement—"The Drum Major"—Boston Chorus Singers Wanted—The "Boston Singers'" Popular Concerts—News, Comment and Gossip.

At the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Conductor Nikesch' the soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, and the programme was:

Symphony poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klange".....Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte, in G.....Rubinstein
Pastorale from Christmas oratorio.....Bach
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

Miss Aus der Ohe has gained great favor with the patrons of these concerts in her earlier appearances here and she was welcomed most heartily by the great audience as she entered, unattended and alone, in accordance with the custom of the present season under the new director. Her choice of the Rubinstein concerto in G as her evening's number showed a confidence in her own abilities that she fully justified in her performance of this difficult composition, and her playing has never before given such genuine satisfaction as in this number. With the natural development of her abilities, this artist has gained a breadth of style and masterly control of the keyboard which puts her at the front of the pianists of today, and fully justifies all the high praise given her in former seasons. The composer has described the concerto as a struggle between the piano and orchestra for a recognition of the piano, and from this point of view the soloist is made the champion of the single instrument against the allied forces opposed to it. Miss Aus der Ohe proved well equipped at all points for the contest, and her victory was not only applauded most heartily by the audience, but conceded by the vanquished forces opposed to her as the orchestral players joined in the enthusiastic ovation which rewarded her performance. She was not supported as well as she might have been by Mr. Nikisch, who does not appear to be altogether at his ease in directing his orchestra in such compositions. The Liszt poem was heard for the first time here, and cannot be accepted as a very desirable addition to the season's repertoire. There is an abundance of thematic material supplied, but it is used with little idea of symmetrical effect, and the work demands more effort to comprehend its vagaries, that is repaid by the hearing. It was played for what it was worth by Mr. Nikisch, who, however, did not succeed in interesting his audience in the work. The Bach "Pastorale" has been heard to better advantage here under other conductors, but in his reading of the second symphony, Mr. Nikisch more nearly approached Beethoven than he did in either the fifth or seventh of the "immortal nine." The audience showed the same enthusiastic appreciation of the orchestral work that has come to be expected at these concerts, and gave the conductor ample evidence of the favor in which he is held by his patrons and patronesses. Next Saturday evening's programme will be: Symphony No. 1, in E flat, A. Borodin; concerto for violin, op. 61, Saint-Saens; festival overture, Volkmann; soloist, Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last evening's concert was by far too long, yet the programme, while somewhat incongruous in its make-up, was, at least instructive. Liszt, Rubinstein, Bach and Beethoven were the composers. This contrasting side by side the new with the old, the ambitious and plausible striving after would be originality with creations of real genius, was not altogether profitless in the effect it produced. Liszt's symphonic poem entitled "Fest-Klange," a morbid and lugubrious production of uneven merit, was splendidly played. As regards Rubinstein's G major concerto—which, despite the dreariness imposed by the first two movements, has a more effective and artistic last movement than any modern work of its class—it can be said for Mlle. Aus der Ohe that she carried its many difficulties through triumphantly, and with an abundance of ardor and command. As a conceptive effort her performance was brainy, emotional, and of brilliant interest, yet somewhat lacking in technical smoothness and artistic nicety. The Bach pastorale was coarsely played, and it would have given the composer a genuine heart-ache could he have been there to hear it. The orchestra simply scraped and scrambled through the work, with but the slightest possible regard for its devout pathos and religious sentiment. The second symphony of Beethoven was for the most part admirably played, the grave and stately adagio being well conceived by Mr. Nikisch; but with the allegro con brio there was a dearth of musical perception and artistic sympathy, and the performance was entirely inconsistent with the spirit of the movement. The larghetto, scherzo and finale were each as appropriately performed as the most fastidious could desire.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The remaining Concerts in the series by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in UNION HALL, No. 18 Boylston Street, on the dates originally appointed:

Monday Evening, December 30th, 1889.
Monday Evening, January 27th, 1890.
Monday Evening, February 24th, 1890.
Monday Evening, March 31st, 1890.

Holders of Season Tickets will be allotted seats corresponding as nearly as possible to those they hold for Chickering Hall.

SEATS MAY BE EXCHANGED NOW, AT THE BOX OFFICE, MUSIC HALL.

The change in halls is made necessary on account of the restrictions in the choice of pianos imposed on the Artists by the managers of Chickering Hall.

UNION HALL, 18 Boylston St., Monday Evening, December 30, at 8

KNEISEL QUARTET

and MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE.

Programme.

QUARTET in D minor, ... Haydn
QUINTET, "Forellen," . . . . . Schubert
Piano, Miss AUS DER OHE. Double Bass, Mr. GOLDSTEIN.
QUARTET in C major, op 59, No. 3. . . . Beethoven

JANUARY 27, MR. CARL BAERMANN.
FEBRUARY 24, MR. ERNST PERABO.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

3

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 1st, AT 8.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[52]

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1889.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Both rehearsal and concert were very crowded, and the following programme was offered:

Symphonic poem No. 7, "Fest-Klänge"..Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte in G major. Rubinstein
Pastorale from Christmas oratorio.....Bach
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Beethoven

The Liszt symphonic poem was heard for the first time at these concerts, and there does not seem to be any adequate ground for wishing it to be heard again. It is one of the least interesting of the twelve compositions of this class from the great Hungarian master's pen. Its orchestration is ineffective, and its form disjointed and insufferably long drawn out. It was superbly played by the orchestra, and one cannot but wonder that Mr. Nikisch was able to memorize it, as there is so little for the mind to grasp. Reference must be made in this connection to the following passage in the analytical programme notes prepared by Mr. G. H. Wilson: "The portrayal of a series of scenes in illustration of some great national festival seems to have been Liszt's aim. In elucidation of this Mr. C. A. Barry notes that the entrada (introduction) which gives rise to strong feelings of expectation, due in each instance to the superposition of a tonic phrase upon the minor seventh of the key, may be regarded as a proclamation that the festival has begun, and at the same time as indicative of the reception of the festive guests in procession." This style of musical analysis is very popular in England; it passes for "learning" over there, and the aforesaid Mr. C. A. Barry is the high priest of the essentially mystic rites of this school; but that does not justify Mr. Wilson in quoting such hopeless twaddle and placing it before an intelligent Boston audience to read. If there is any definite purpose at all in analytical programmes it is that they should explain the music as far as possible, and in a manner which will assist the layman to perceive and appreciate what would otherwise escape him. The stilted, pompous language of the English programmes—to say nothing of their absurd musical definitions and misstatements—has been for years a source of infinite amusement to Continental musicians, and it is certainly an affliction which the American concert-goer ought not to have put upon him.

The Rubinstein G major concerto is anything but a diverting work. No matter how well it may be played, it is certain to be a bore. It belongs to the class of exhibition composition for the pianoforte, and its first and last movements would make an excellent compendium which might be entitled "A complete collection of scales, trills and arpeggios for the modern pianoforte, for advanced pupils only." Miss Aus der Ohe played it superbly. This young lady's technical attainments are very great, but they are considerably in advance of her musical intelligence at present, although she is certainly improving in this direction. For this reason she did wisely to select a work of a showy and brilliant nature as more conducive to success than a more serious and intellectual composition would have been under her fingers. At both rehearsal and concert a number of people, especially those of the large crowd standing up, left after the concerto. This is difficult to explain, and it certainly justifies one in having grave doubts as to the musical knowledge and intelligence of such people. They undoubtedly came chiefly to hear Miss Aus der Ohe play; probably many of them were students, and, if so, they did wisely, for they could all learn a great deal from her. Still, although she is a fine player, she is not a great player; and on this particular occasion she did not play a great work, while the rest of the programme, which these "students" neglected, offered two very great works, from which they might have learned much more. Let us hope that some time the present craze for piano playing will die out, and this useful instrument be relegated to its proper subordinate functions; when this does happen, the cause of music proper will be advanced about a thousand per cent. The Bach pastorale was beautifully played and most expressively read, and the conception of the symphony was grand and noble. The eternally beautiful slow movement was played as nearly perfectly as the most captious critic could wish, and the last movement was rendered with fire and brilliancy.

Such people as have complained of Mr. Nikisch's programmes and maintained that he was not keeping his promises as to novelties ought to be satisfied next week, as the whole programme consists of works never before played in this city. The soloist will be Mr. Adamowski.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 30, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The soloist at Saturday evening's concert was Miss Aus Der Ohe, always a favorite with a Boston audience, and she was given a royal welcome. She had chosen Rubinstein's Concerto in G, a selection abounding in difficulties of technique and requiring the interpretation of a master hand. To say that these difficulties were fully met is but to echo the feelings of the Music Hall audience Saturday night. Her rendition of the number was grand. Her playing is always to be remembered, but it seemed as if there was more breadth of style, a deeper feeling and a more exquisite refinement in it than at previous appearances. The entire concerto was given with precision of touch, and showed the interpretation of an artist in entire sympathy with the composer's spirit. Miss Aus Der Ohe was given an ovation at the close of the number.

The feature of the concert outside of the piano playing was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, in D, the last selection on the programme. This was given a very conservative interpretation, and was by far the most interesting selection on the programme by the orchestra. Particularly beautiful was the larghetto; not only the music in itself, but Mr. Nikisch's rendering of it. Bach's pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio was disappointing, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, with which the concert opened, although new to a symphony audience, was not received with special favor; not, however, from any fault in its delivery. There were fewer "standees" than usual, and Mr. Nikisch did not receive the cordial greeting on his entrance that ought to have been his, on his return from the most successful trip the orchestra has taken away from home. At the next concert Mr. Adamowski is to be the soloist. He will play for the first time in this city a concerto by Saint Saens, and the orchestra will give a symphony by Barodin and Volkmann's Festival Overture.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 29, 1889.

The Symphony Concert, Miss Aus der Ohe Soloist.

The Casino Company's Boston Engagement—"The Drum Major"—Boston Chorus Singers Wanted—The "Boston Singers'" Popular Concerts—News, Comment and Gossip.

At the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Conductor Nikesch' the soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, and the programme was:

Symphony poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klange".....Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte, in G.....Rubinstein
Pastorale from Christmas oratorio.....Bach
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

Miss Aus der Ohe has gained great favor with the patrons of these concerts in her earlier appearances here and she was welcomed most heartily by the great audience as she entered, unattended and alone, in accordance with the custom of the present season under the new director. Her choice of the Rubinstein concerto in G as her evening's number showed a confidence in her own abilities that she fully justified in her performance of this difficult composition, and her playing has never before given such genuine satisfaction as in this number. With the natural development of her abilities, this artist has gained a breadth of style and masterly control of the keyboard which puts her at the front of the pianists of today, and fully justifies all the high praise given her in former seasons. The composer has described the concerto as a struggle between the piano and orchestra for a recognition of the piano, and from this point of view the soloist is made the champion of the single instrument against the allied forces opposed to it. Miss Aus der Ohe proved well equipped at all points for the contest, and her victory was not only applauded most heartily by the audience, but conceded by the vanquished forces opposed to her as the orchestral players joined in the enthusiastic ovation which rewarded her performance. She was not supported as well as she might have been by Mr. Nikisch, who does not appear to be altogether at his ease in directing his orchestra in such compositions. The Liszt poem was heard for the first time here, and cannot be accepted as a very desirable addition to the season's repertoire. There is an abundance of thematic material supplied, but it is used with little idea of symmetrical effect, and the work demands more effort to comprehend its vagaries, that is repaid by the hearing. It was played for what it was worth by Mr. Nikisch, who, however, did not succeed in interesting his audience in the work. The Bach "Pastorale" has been heard to better advantage here under other conductors, but in his reading of the second symphony, Mr. Nikisch more nearly approached Beethoven than he did in either the fifth or seventh of the "immortal nine." The audience showed the same enthusiastic appreciation of the orchestral work that has come to be expected at these concerts, and gave the conductor ample evidence of the favor in which he is held by his patrons and patronesses. Next Saturday evening's programme will be: Symphony No. 1, in E flat, A. Borodin; concerto for violin, op. 61, Saint-Saens; festival overture, Volkmann; soloist, Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last evening's concert was by far too long, yet the programme, while somewhat incongruous in its make-up, was, at least instructive. Liszt, Rubinstein, Bach and Beethoven were the composers. This contrasting side by side the new with the old, the ambitious and plausible striving after would be originality with creations of real genius, was not altogether profitless in the effect it produced. Liszt's symphonic poem entitled "Fest Klange," a morbid and lugubrious production of uneven merit, was splendidly played. As regards Rubinstein's G major concerto—which, despite the dreariness imposed by the first two movements, has a more effective and artistic last movement than any modern work of its class—it can be said for Mlle. Aus der Ohe that she carried its many difficulties through triumphantly, and with an abundance of ardor and command. As a conceptive effort her performance was brainy, emotional, and of brilliant interest, yet somewhat lacking in technical smoothness and artistic nicety. The Bach pastorale was coarsely played, and it would have given the composer a genuine heart-ache could he have been there to hear it. The orchestra simply scraped and scrambled through the work, with but the slightest possible regard for its devout pathos and religious sentiment. The second symphony of Beethoven was for the most part admirably played, the grave and stately adagio being well conceived by Mr. Nikisch; but with the allegro con brio there was a dearth of musical perception and artistic sympathy, and the performance was entirely inconsistent with the spirit of the movement. The larghetto, scherzo and finale were each as appropriately performed as the most fastidious could desire.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The remaining Concerts in the series by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in UNION HALL, No. 18 Boylston Street, on the dates subjoined, viz.:

Monday Evening, December 30th, 1889.
Monday Evening, January 27th, 1890.
Monday Evening, February 24th, 1890.
Monday Evening, March 31st, 1890.

Tickets for each Concert may be had at the usual prices, according as heretofore, at the Box Office in Chickering Hall.

Subscribers will please make early application for the reserved seats to which they are entitled, at the Box Office, by the managers of Chickering Hall.

UNION HALL, 18 Boylston St., Monday Evening, December 30, at 8

KNEISEL QUARTET

AND MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE.

Programme.

Haydn.
Rubinstein.

Piano, Miss AUS DER OHE. Double Bass, Mr. GOLDSTEIN.

Beethoven.

JANUARY 27. MR. CARL BAERMANN.
FEBRUARY 24. MR. ERNST PERABO.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

PROGRAMME

3

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 1st, AT 8.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night —Miss Aus Der Ohe as Soloist.

The programme of Saturday's concert began with one of Liszt's symphonic poems —"Fest Klaenge." The work is a very spasmodic one, even for Liszt. It might picture anything from a country dance to a revolution. Lofty hymn tunes jostle against trivial dance themes, and the usual ending, in which the chief subject is given with deafening power, is also present. Turkish music plays an important part in the finale, and the work begins with a kettle drum solo, as Litolff's concerto, given at the last concert, did. The breadth with which the work was given was thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of it, and the composition, although not appealing very strongly to a musician who does not like his tonal diet too strongly flavored, was yet a triumph of technical skill for the orchestra, and of leadership for the conductor.

Adele Aus der Ohe never appeared to better advantage than in Rubinstein's piano concerto in G major, which followed. Viewed strictly as a concerto the work has faults. The solo instrument is too continuously prominent, and there is no real intertwining of piano and orchestra, as in the three last Beethoven concertos. It is, like Chopin's concertos, a grand piano solo with an orchestral background. But taken from this latter standpoint the work is immensely successful, for it gives the soloist every possible opportunity to display bravura effects, and presents an array of difficulties sufficient to crush any ordinary pianist. But Miss Aus der Ohe is not an ordinary pianist, and all the technical points were surmounted without any undue exertion. The boldness of the pianist's playing was entirely in place, and at the end of the first movement, when the theme appeared in the orchestra embellished with every kind of fioriture on the piano, the latter instrument fairly balanced the forcible tutti. The second movement afforded opportunities for contrast that were well employed. A degree of sadness, a refined melancholy, were in the performance of this, that showed the pianist in a totally different mood from the fiery style of the first and last movements. Miss Aus der Ohe never degenerated from sentiment into sentimentality, and never allowed the pathos of the adagio to become bathos. The third movement is the most successful of the concerto. It is so full of difficulties that it may almost be characterized as one continuous cadenza. There is much antiphonal work between piano and orchestra in this, and a commendable balance characterized the responses. Such octave work, such chromatic passages and such chord work as the pianist gave in the finale, can scarcely be fully explained in type! Suffice it to say that even with the memory of D'Albert fresh in mind, the performance was a most effective one, and the recalls which greeted the fair young artist at the conclusion of the work were evidence that the large audience understood the worth of the performance.

It was interesting to listen to Bach's "Pastorale" so soon after hearing Handel's setting of the same subject, the journey of the shepherds to the Savior's cradle. Of the two works, that of Bach is much the finer. It received a properly conservative reading, and the beautiful contrasts between strings and wood wind were finely brought out. It was sensible too, to call the work "Pastorale" instead of "Pastoral Symphony," since the pre-Haydnite use of the word "symphony" cannot but be confusing to the auditor. I hope that the Handel and Haydn Society will follow this example.

With Beethoven's second symphony the concert ended. The performance of this last work was a worthy one; Mr. Nikisch did not attempt to astound the audience in any way, but gave to the work a dignified yet powerful reading as befitted it. As the symphony belongs to the so called "first period" of the master's style, it was pleasant to find the reading so direct and unexaggerated in character. That degree of individualization which some critics might condone in a fifth or a ninth symphony, would have been out of place in this work which so thoroughly reflects the school of Beethoven's teacher, Haydn. The first movement was finely read and played, but the second, the lovely Larghetto, was the gem of it all. The orchestra has seldom done better shading than was apparent in this. The fiery energy of the finale also was excellently caught up by conductor and men, and the entire concert was one on which the critic can dwell with satisfaction.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER.
TUESDAY JANUARY 7.

The next of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion, Monday evening. The program will consist of the overture "Genoveva," by Schumann; Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra; Rhapsodie Norwegienne; Fantasie for flute on themes from Oberon and Symphony in C minor. The soloists will be C. M. Loeffler and M. Ch. Mole, and the orchestra will be conducted by Arthur Nikisch. Seats are now on sale at Steinert's music store.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There is surely no pianist in this country who enjoys a greater general favor than Miss Adele aus der Ohe. And there is reason for this, because beside her unquestionably high achievements as a virtuosa, the brilliancy, power, endurance and dash of her playing as it comes to the ear, there is the appeal which she always makes to the eye through her agreeable personality, her becoming costumes and the various graceful, although often superflous, movements which she makes as she plays, now swaying to and fro like a reed bending before the breeze, now tossing her hands up with a flashing spurt, as of a jet from a fountain, and now emphasizing some special passage with a sharply down-dropping finger or a tap of her head. One must not perhaps find fault with these movements, too many and too often distracting though they be. Holmes somewhere says that a canary could not sing unless he went through all his little poses and pranks at the same time, and so perhaps if Miss Aus der Ohe were bound to the calm manner of some other artists, something of the life and freedom might go out of her playing. Be this as it may, there can be no doubt but that these things make what she does appear more difficult and more delightful than they really are, to a great many people, and help to swell the admiration to which she is always entitled. Her appearance in the Symphony programme of this week means a crowded audience tonight, as it drew a very large concourse yesterday afternoon. Her selection is Rubinstein's third concerto, that in G, not often attempted, because of its exceeding arduousness. Most compositions written for their own use by great performers have in them passages which can rarely be accomplished with ease and elegance by other players, because the training of the hand and the personal temperament for which they were meant are so seldom repeated in others. But Miss Ans der Ohe has many of the characteristics which this concerto —especially in the two allegro movements—requires, and her rendering of it yesterday was eminently bold, competent, and stirring. There is immense bravura in the more brilliant pages, but through it all must be kept in view the theme and the intention which Rubinstein has piquantly set out in a little synopsis which we have not space to cite, and the demand made upon the player for clearness and equality as well as for celerity and spirit are incessant and unpitying. Miss Aus der Ohe carried the concerto through unfalteringly, in spite of the fact that Mr. Nikisch's beat occasionally lagged a little behind her accent, and read the gentler second movement peacefully and smoothly, if not exactly with tenderness. A work new to these concerts, Liszt's "Fest-Klange," full of spectacular suggestion, splendor, clangor and excitement, begins the programme. It's author has attached to it no explanations, and the listener, after once the summoning drums and trumpets have ceased, must interpret all the rest into such scenes of festal commemoration and quiet contrast as he chooses. As played yesterday, it sounded not so well as we expected; there was too much noise, too constant a fatissimo, and at times a suggestion rather of a less peaceful festivity than Liszt must have had in view. Perhaps if the conductor had had the score before him and had from it controlled some of the minor details all of which no memory can be trusted to carry, the result might have been better. The concert, which will be a long one, will be completed by the addition of the Pastoral from Bach's Christmas oratorio and Beethoven's second sympathy. The programme for next Saturday is a thoroughly new one, being thus made up: the first symphony of Borodin, given for the first time in America, the violin coucerto of Saint Saëns, not before performed in Boston, to be given by Mr. Adamowski, and Valkmann's "Festival" overture, which has not been played in these concerts yet.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVER welcome as the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been in the last few years, the first one of the present season, which took place on Tuesday evening of last week, was doubly so, for, first of all, New York does not this winter suffer from the last seasons' overdose of good orchestral concerts, and, secondly, everybody who is anybody was curious to hear the excellent organization under their famous new conductor, Arthur Nikisch.

The reports from Boston that had preceded him to this city were of the most glowing description, and let it be said at the outset that they were not exaggerated. Nikisch is a conductor to the manner born and a musician of powerful and original mind. You may be startled by what he does, you may even not always agree with his conception and carrying out of an idea, yet you will be forced to admit that it is musical and that the effect produced seems to justify the means employed. The orchestra under him has retained all the brilliancy in the strings, the rhythmic precision and the general finish of its performances for which it was noted under Gericke, but it has now added to these fine qualities a brio, a dash, a verve, an ease and abandon, and above all a sonority in the brasses and a general virility of tone and freedom in expression which formerly were more or less absent. It is "Prometheus Unbound" against the former "Prometheus Bound."

Nikisch knows every note of what he conducts from memory, he indicates every entrance by look and gesture, he phrases with each solo instrument, his beat is firm and decisive, and as he is magnetic and convincing to a degree it is no wonder that he carries the entire orchestra with him on the wings of his own imagination and inspiration, and the performances therefore become real interpretations and not mere mechanical reproductions. His readings moreover are always interesting and original, sometimes, as we said before, startling, but ever musical. The "Euryanthe" overture sounded new and fresh, the episode for muted violins absolutely heavenly and the working up of the final climax noble and grand. The familiar "Tristan" Vorspiel was taken at an unusually slow tempo, but worked out to a degree of finish and clearness of detail, as well as warmth of color that seemed to warrant the slower tempo. And the same may be said with regard to the scherzo of the Schumann D minor symphony, in the reading of which work Mr. Nikisch fairly outdid himself and the original interpretation of which invested the well-known and oft-heard work with a charm of novelty it never before seemed to possess. Note the beautiful working up of the coda of the scherzo, the exquisite little ritardando in the second theme of the last movement and a number of effects too numerous to mention.

It makes one smile to see in an alleged musical paper, which even before Nikisch's arrival vented its hostility upon him, the puerile attempts at belittling his powers. After abusing him for his readings of the two shorter works and yet not being able to deny the success of the symphony, the critic (?) in question tries to crawl out of it as follows:

> The Schumann symphony was given in a more satisfactory manner, owing, perhaps, to the artistic merit of the superb work and to the richness and variety of the instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius and to the sublime creative power of Schumann.

Imagine anybody talking about "the richness and variety of Schumann's instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius of Schumann," while every musician knows and acknowledges that the instrumentation is the weakest spot in Schumann's orchestral works, and a man like Raff even was possessed with the idea to re-orchestrate all four of Schumann's symphonies. Only a musical, or rather unmusical, rhinoceros could have written such a sentence, which in itself is on a par with his utterance on Schubert's immortal C major symphony, a work admired by Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn, and about which the same rhinoceros says:

> Thomas is still our greatest director, and even the monotonous and interminable Schubert symphony in C can be listened to, under his baton, with interest if not with pleasure.

And yet such rhinoceroses are allowed to vent their spleen on composers, conductors and their fellow critics!

The soloist of this concert was Franz Kneisel, the efficient concertmeister of the Boston orchestra, and he played the difficult and not over grateful D major violin concerto by Brahms in a manner worthy of the highest praise. His intonation was always pure, even in the most difficult passages; his tone, if not very big, is sweet and agreeable: his conception and phrasing intelligent and musicianly, and his bowing good. A most difficult cadenza of his own composition was played by Mr. Kneisel with such abundant technic and surety that it alone would have sufficed to convince anybody of the concertmeister's skill on his chosen instrument. He was generously applauded by a large sized and fashionable audience, which made Steinway Hall resound with enthusiastic applause also after each of the efforts of the Boston orchestra and its genial conductor.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 18[illegible]

[53]

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of their series of concerts in Infantry Hall last evening. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist and the programme was as follows:

Prelude, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 3, in G...Rubenstein
MISS AUS DER OHE.
Norwegian Rhapsody No. 3, in A, Op. 19....
.....Svendsen
Tarantelle di Bravura.....Liszt
MISS AUS DER OHE.
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52....
.....Schumann

This programme seemed to shadow forth distinctly what the previous two had suggested—that Mr. Nikisch's intentions with regard to Providence have a certain historical direction. He has brought his Providence hearers through something of the classics and the earlier romantic masters, and now presents them with a programme wholly modern in its quality. The performance thus had an interest and an artistic significance wholly apart from what inhered in either of the former appearances of the orchestra here this season; for it showed Mr. Nikisch's tendencies as a conductor in a field that is evidently most absolutely congenial. With Wagner and Schumann especially he has elsewhere proven the intimate kinship of his artistic nature. Thus the two selections by these masters, though both of them are familiar to the concert halls of Providence, had nevertheless very much of that new and exceptional interest with which it is given to this gifted musician to invest almost everything he does.

If any single orchestral movement were wanted to exemplify those exceedingly individual points in Mr. Nikisch's conducting that previously have been pointed out at length in this journal as entitling him to a foremost rank among the world's conductors, the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel would best do it. It certainly furnished an epitome of all that is best and most characteristic in this new art of conducting which Mr. Nikisch is making known to us, so lucid was it in its exposition of every idea and shade of meaning, so eloquent with poetic beauty, with vigorous intellectual mastership. Especially must the observant have noted the exquisite pcesy and loveliness of the transitions between the several divisions of the work, how significantly and broadly treated they were, and the pregnant, passionate stress of utterance with which the right theme was sought out and everywhere given the due prominence at the right point. And yet, so nicely adjusted were the complex parts of this composition, that the whole was splendidly solid and sonorous, as beautiful and stately in its larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail. Such a performance shows more clearly than anything else the absolute sway that the conductor has over his orchestra in his ability to fill them so wholly with the letter and the spirit of a complex intention. This rendering of the "Meistersinger" prelude is worthy of far more than a passing note, for it is the most triumphant of all Mr. Nikisch's achievements, in every point so magnificently, so convincingly right; and, all in all, one of the most splendid publications of the composer's intent to be heard anywhere, not even excepting the inspired auditorium of the Bayreuth Theatre.

Of the Schumann "Overture, scherzo and finale"—a symphony in intent, and all but a symphony in its general assemblage of movements—there is less to be said only because there was, on the whole, less of absolutely penetrating vitality of idea in its treatment. Yet there was noticeable through it the same determined purpose to allow no hard and fast notion of time-beating to interfere with or obscure any motive or phrase, melodic or rhythmic, and to preserve, at the cost of any amount of reproach over undue "tempo rubato," the true intent of the musical idea. Warm and romantic the whole little symphony was, in color, its rhythmical niceties entrancingly expounded, its wide variety of sentiment and purport generously perceived and most sympathetically read, with nothing lacking in the fire of the overture, the exquisite freshness and grace of the scherzo, the pomp, the self-insistence of the finale.

Svendsen has put into the rhapsody which formed the lighter element of last evening's programme, apparently three or four "folk songs" of his native land. They are easily enough recognizable as such, if in no other way by piano students from what Grieg has made familiar. These he has assembled and adorned with all the resources of a most consummate master of counterpoint and of orchestration,—the latter element being indeed the chief interest of the composition and a constant study in new and, to tell the truth, sometimes rather experimental effects.

Miss Aus der Ohe never before in her several Providence appearances had things quite so wholly her own way, nor ever quite so well deserved to. To begin with, she was doubtless in better technical form than she has been before, and she played a composition that was practically a complete novelty to nearly everybody present—and such a one! In it the greatest of living pianists, the one best acquainted with the power and the resources, and the possibilities of piano technique, apparently sat down to stretch them to their limit. Rubinstein has here given the concerto form to a splendid summing up of the difficulties and the effects of piano bravura; and more, he has put much of his gift of lovely, spontaneous melody into it, which makes it something better. With what magnificent impetuosity and dazzling verve Miss Aus der Ohe sounded to the very bottom the technical difficulties of the work, can scarcely be described. Her physical power, her dexterity of finger, wrist and arm seemed limitless. Yet there was to her playing, too, another side, on which the true poetic spirit met the deeper and better aspect which Rubenstein had imparted to the work. She gave both to herself and her composer something more than virtuosity, but it cannot be denied that on this score her work was chiefly and worthily notable. Less worthily so was it in the tiresome tarantelle of Liszt's, as near to sound and fury as that most versatile composer ever came, which was sometimes very near. Miss Aus der Ohe was repeatedly recalled, and the excellence of her performance was evidently highly appreciated.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night —Miss Aus Der Ohe as Soloist.

The programme of Saturday's concert began with one of Liszt's symphonic poems —"Fest Klaenge." The work is a very spasmodic one, even for Liszt. It might picture anything from a country dance to a revolution. Lofty hymn tunes jostle against trivial dance themes, and the usual ending, in which the chief subject is given with deafening power, is also present. Turkish music plays an important part in the finale, and the work begins with a kettle drum solo, as Litolff's concerto, given at the last concert, did. The breadth with which the work was given was thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of it, and the composition, although not appealing very strongly to a musician who does not like his tonal diet too strongly flavored, was yet a triumph of technical skill for the orchestra, and of leadership for the conductor.

Adele Aus der Ohe never appeared to better advantage than in Rubinstein's piano concerto in G major, which followed. Viewed strictly as a concerto the work has faults. The solo instrument is too continuously prominent, and there is no real intertwining of piano and orchestra, as in the three last Beethoven concertos. It is, like Chopin's concertos, a grand piano solo with an orchestral background. But taken from this latter standpoint the work is immensely successful, for it gives the soloist every possible opportunity to display bravura effects, and presents an array of difficulties sufficient to crush any ordinary pianist. But Miss Aus der Ohe is not an ordinary pianist, and all the technical points were surmounted without any undue exertion. The boldness of the pianist's playing was entirely in place, and at the end of the first movement, when the theme appeared in the orchestra embellished with every kind of fioriture on the piano, the latter instrument fairly balanced the forcible tutti. The second movement afforded opportunities for contrast that were well employed. A degree of sadness, a refined melancholy, were in the performance of this, that showed the pianist in a totally different mood from the fiery style of the first and last movements. Miss Aus der Ohe never degenerated from sentiment into sentimentality, and never allowed the pathos of the adagio to become bathos. The third movement is the most successful of the concerto. It is so full of difficulties that it may almost be characterized as one continuous cadenza. There is much antiphonal work between piano and orchestra in this, and a commendable balance characterized the responses. Such octava work, such chromatic passages and such chord work as the pianist gave in the finale, can scarcely be fully explained in type! Suffice it to say that even with the memory of D'Albert fresh in mind, the performance was a most effective one, and the recalls which greeted the fair young artist at the conclusion of the work were evidence that the large audience understood the worth of the performance.

It was interesting to listen to Bach's "Pastorale" so soon after hearing Handel's setting of the same subject, the journey of the shepherds to the Savior's cradle. Of the two works, that of Bach is much the finer. It received a properly conservative reading, and the beautiful contrasts between strings and wood wind were finely brought out. It was sensible too, to call the work "Pastorale" instead of "Pastoral Symphony," since the pre-Haydnite use of the word "symphony" cannot but be confusing to the auditor. I hope that the Handel and Haydn Society will follow this example.

With Beethoven's second symphony the concert ended. The performance of this last work was a worthy one; Mr. Nikisch did not attempt to astound the audience in any way, but gave to the work a dignified yet powerful reading as befitted it. As the symphony belongs to the so called "first period" of the master's style, it was pleasant to find the reading so direct and unexaggerated in character. That degree of individualization which some critics might condone in a fifth or a ninth symphony, would have been out of place in this work which so thoroughly reflects the school of Beethoven's teacher, Haydn. The first movement was finely read and played, but the second, the lovely Larghetto, was the gem of it all. The orchestra has seldom done better shading than was apparent in this. The fiery energy of the finale also was excellently caught up by conductor and men, and the entire concert was one on which the critic can dwell with satisfaction.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER.
TUESDAY JANUARY 7.

The next of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at the Hyperion, Monday evening. The program will consist of the overture "Genoveva," by Schumann; Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra; Rhapsodie Norwegienne; Fantasie for flute on themes from Oberon and Symphony in C minor. The soloists will be C. M. Loeffler and M. Ch. Mole, and the orchestra will be conducted by Arthur Nikisch. Seats are now on sale at Steinert's music store.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There is surely no pianist in this country who enjoys a greater general favor than Miss Adele aus der Ohe. And there is reason for this, because beside her unquestionably high achievements as a virtuosa, the brilliancy, power, endurance and dash of her playing as it comes to the ear, there is the appeal which she always makes to the eye through her agreeable personality, her becoming costumes and the various graceful, although often superflous, movements which she makes as she plays, now swaying to and fro like a reed bending before the breeze, now tossing her hands up with a flashing spurt, as of a jet from a fountain, and now emphasizing some special passage with a sharply down-dropping finger or a tap of her head. One must not perhaps find fault with these movements, too many and too often distracting though they be. Holmes somewhere says that a canary could not sing unless he went through all his little poses and pranks at the same time, and so perhaps if Miss Aus der Ohe were bound to the calm manner of some other artists, something of the life and freedom might go out of her playing. Be this as it may, there can be no doubt but that these things make what she does appear more difficult and more delightful than they really are, to a great many people, and help to swell the admiration to which she is always entitled. Her appearance in the Symphony programme of this week means a crowded audience tonight, as it drew a very large concourse yesterday afternoon. Her selection is Rubinstein's third concerto, that in G, not often attempted, because of its exceeding arduousness. Most compositions written for their own use by great performers have in them passages which can rarely be accomplished with ease and elegance by other players, because the training of the hand and the personal temperament for which they were meant are so seldom repeated in oth But Miss Ans der Ohe has many of the c acteristics which this concerto —especially in e two allegro movements—requires, and her ndering of it yesterday was eminently bold, ompetent, and stirring. There is immense b ura in the more brilliant pages, but through it all must be kept in view the theme and the intention which Rubinstein has piqu ntly set out in a little synopsis which we have not space to cite, and the demand made upon the player for clearness and equality as well as for celerity and spirit are incessant and unpitying. Miss Aus der Ohe carried the concerto through unfalteringly, in spite of the fact that Mr. Nikisch's beat occasionally lagged a little behind her accent, and read the gentler second movement peacefully and smoothly, if not exactly with tenderness. A work new to these concerts, Liszt's "Fest-Klange," full of spectacular suggestion, splendor, clangor and excitement, begins the programme. It's author has attached to it no explanations, and the listener, after once the summoning drums and trumpets have ceased, must interpret all the rest into such scenes of festal commemoration and quiet contrast as he chooses. As played yesterday, it sounded not so well as we expected; there was too much noise, too constant a fatissimo, and at times a suggestion rather of a less peaceful festivity than Liszt must have had in view. Perhaps if the conductor had had the score before him and had from it ntrolled some of the minor details all of w ch no memory can be trusted to carry, the r lt might have been better. The concert, which will be a long one, will be completed by the addition of the Pastoral from Bach's Christmas oratorio and Beethoven's second sympathy. The programme for next Saturday is a thoroughly new one, being thns made up: the first symphony of Borodin, given for the first time in America, the violin coucerto of Saint Saëns, not before performed in Boston, to be given by Mr. Adamowski, and Valkmann's "Festival" overture, which has not been played in these concerts yet.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1889.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVER welcome as the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been in the last few years, the first one of the present season, which took place on Tuesday evening of last week, was doubly so, for, first of all, New York does not this winter suffer from the last seasons' overdose of good orchestral concerts, and, secondly, everybody who is anybody was curious to hear the excellent organization under their famous new conductor, Arthur Nikisch.

The reports from Boston that had preceded him to this city were of the most glowing description, and let it be said at the outset that they were not exaggerated. Nikisch is a conductor to the manner born and a musician of powerful and original mind. You may be startled by what he does, you may even not always agree with his conception and carrying out of an idea, yet you will be forced to admit that it is musical and that the effect produced seems to justify the means employed. The orchestra under him has retained all the brilliancy in the strings, the rhythmic precision and the general finish of its performances for which it was noted under Gericke, but it has now added to these fine qualities a brio, a dash, a verve, an ease and abandon, and above all a sonority in the brasses and a general virility of tone and freedom in expression which formerly were more or less absent. It is "Prometheus Unbound" against the former "Prometheus Bound."

Nikisch knows every note of what he conducts from memory, he indicates every entrance by look and gesture, he phrases with each solo instrument, his beat is firm and decisive, and as he is magnetic and convincing to a degree it is no wonder that he carries the entire orchestra with him on the wings of his own imagination and inspiration, and the performances therefore become real interpretations and not mere mechanical reproductions. His readings moreover are always interesting and original, sometimes, as we said before, startling, but ever musical. The "Euryanthe" overture sounded new and fresh, the episode for muted violins absolutely heavenly and the working up of the final climax noble and grand. The familiar "Tristan" Vorspiel was taken at an unusually slow tempo, but worked out to a degree of finish and clearness of detail, as well as warmth of color that seemed to warrant the slower tempo. And the same may be said with regard to the scherzo of the Schumann D minor symphony, in the reading of which work Mr. Nikisch fairly outdid himself and the original interpretation of which invested the well-known and oft-heard work with a charm of novelty it never before seemed to possess. Note the beautiful working up of the coda of the scherzo, the exquisite little ritardando in the second theme of the last movement and a number of effects too numerous to mention.

It makes one smile to see in an alleged musical paper, which even before Nikisch's arrival vented its hostility upon him, the puerile attempts at belittling his powers. After abusing him for his readings of the two shorter works and yet not being able to deny the success of the symphony, the critic (?) in question tries to crawl out of it as follows:

> The Schumann symphony was given in a more satisfactory manner, owing, perhaps, to the artistic merit of the superb work and to the richness and variety of the instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius and to the sublime creative power of Schumann.

Imagine anybody talking about "the richness and variety of Schumann's instrumentation, which is in itself an imperishable monument to the colossal genius of Schumann," while every musician knows and acknowledges that the instrumentation is the weakest spot in Schumann's orchestral works, and a man like Raff even was possessed with the idea to re-orchestrate all four of Schumann's symphonies. Only a musical, or rather unmusical, rhinoceros could have written such a sentence, which in itself is on a par with his utterance on Schubert's immortal C major symphony, a work admired by Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn, and about which the same rhinoceros says:

> Thomas is still our greatest director, and even the monotonous and interminable Schubert symphony in C can be listened to, under his baton, with interest if not with pleasure.

And yet such rhinoceroses are allowed to vent their spleen on composers, conductors and their fellow critics!

The soloist of this concert was Franz Kneisel, the efficient concertmeister of the Boston orchestra, and he played the difficult and not over grateful D major violin concerto by Brahms in a manner worthy of the highest praise. His intonation was always pure, even in the most difficult passages; his tone, if not very big, is sweet and agreeable: his conception and phrasing intelligent and musicianly, and his bowing good. A most difficult cadenza of his own composition was played by Mr. Kneisel with such abundant technic and surety that it alone would have sufficed to convince anybody of the concertmeister's skill on his chosen instrument. He was generously applauded by a large sized and fashionable audience, which made Steinway Hall resound with enthusiastic applause also after each of the efforts of the Boston orchestra and its genial conductor.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL
THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1890.

[53]

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of their series of concerts in Infantry Hall last evening. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist and the programme was as follows:

Prelude, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 3, in G...Rubenstein
MISS AUS DER OHE.
Norwegian Rhapsody No. 3, in A, Op. 19....
.....Svendsen
Tarantelle di Bravura.....Liszt
MISS AUS DER OHE.
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52....
.....Schumann

This programme seemed to shadow forth distinctly what the previous two had suggested—that Mr. Nikisch's intentions with regard to Providence have a certain historical direction. He has brought his Providence hearers through something of the classics and the earlier romantic masters, and now presents them with a programme wholly modern in its quality. The performance thus had an interest and an artistic significance wholly apart from what inhered in either of the former appearances of the orchestra here this season; for it showed Mr. Nikisch's tendencies as a conductor in a field that is evidently most absolutely congenial. With Wagner and Schumann especially he has elsewhere proven the intimate kinship of his artistic nature. Thus the two selections by these masters, though both of them are familiar to the concert halls of Providence, had nevertheless very much of that new and exceptional interest with which it is given to this gifted musician to invest almost everything he does.

If any single orchestral movement were wanted to exemplify those exceedingly individual points in Mr. Nikisch's conducting that previously have been pointed out at length in this journal as entitling him to a foremost rank among the world's conductors, the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel would best do it. It certainly furnished an epitome of all that is best and most characteristic in this new art of conducting which Mr. Nikisch is making known to us, so lucid was it in its exposition of every idea and shade of meaning, so eloquent with poetic beauty, with vigorous intellectual mastership. Especially must the observant have noted the exquisite poesy and loveliness of the transitions between the several divisions of the work, how significantly and broadly treated they were, and the pregnant, passionate stress of utterance with which the right theme was sought out and everywhere given the due prominence at the right point. And yet, so nicely adjusted were the complex parts of this composition, that the whole was splendidly solid and sonorous, as beautiful and stately in its larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail. Such a performance shows more clearly than anything else the absolute sway that the conductor has over his orchestra in his ability to fill them so wholly with the letter and the spirit of a complex intention. This rendering of the "Meistersinger" prelude is worthy of far more than a passing note, for it is the most triumphant of all Mr. Nikisch's achievements, in every point so magnificently, so convincingly right; and, all in all, one of the most splendid publications of the composer's intent to be heard anywhere, not even excepting the inspired auditorium of the Bayreuth Theatre.

Of the Schumann "Overture, scherzo and finale"—a symphony in intent, and all but a symphony in its general assemblage of movements—there is less to be said only because there was, on the whole, less of absolutely penetrating vitality of idea in its treatment. Yet there was noticeable through it the same determined purpose to allow no hard and fast notion of time-beating to interfere with or obscure any motive or phrase, melodic or rhythmic, and to preserve, at the cost of any amount of reproach over undue "tempo rubato," the true intent of the musical idea. Warm and romantic the whole little symphony was, in color, its rhythmical niceties entrancingly expounded, its wide variety of sentiment and purport generously perceived and most sympathetically read, with nothing lacking in the fire of the overture, the exquisite freshness and grace of the scherzo, the pomp, the self-insistence of the finale.

Svendsen has put into the rhapsody which formed the lighter element of last evening's programme, apparently three or four "folk songs" of his native land. They are easily enough recognizable as such, if in no other way by piano students from what Grieg has made familiar. These he has assembled and adorned with all the resources of a master consummate master of counterpoint and of orchestration.—the latter element being indeed the chief interest of the composition and a constant study in new and, to tell the truth, sometimes rather experimental effects.

Miss Aus der Ohe never before in her several Providence appearances had things quite so wholly her own way, nor ever quite so well deserved to. To begin with, she was doubtless in better technical form than she has been before, and she played a composition that was practically a complete novelty to nearly everybody present—and such a one! In it the greatest of living pianists, the one best acquainted with the power and the resources, and the possibilities of piano technique, apparently sat down to stretch them to their limit. Rubinstein has here given the concerto form to a splendid summing up of the difficulties and the effects of piano bravura; and more, he has put much of his gift of lovely, spontaneous melody into it, which makes it something better. With what magnificent impetuosity and dazzling verve Miss Aus der Ohe sounded to the very bottom the technical difficulties of the work, can scarcely be described. Her physical power, her dexterity of finger, wrist and arm seemed limitless. Yet there was to her playing, too, another side, on which the true poetic spirit met the deeper and better aspect which Rubenstein had imparted to the work. She gave both to herself and her composer something more than virtuosity, but it cannot be denied that on this score her work was chiefly and worthily notable. Less worthily so was it in the tiresome tarantelle of Liszt's, as near to sound and fury as that most versatile composer ever came, which was sometimes very near. Miss Aus der Ohe was repeatedly recalled, and the excellence of her performance was evidently highly appreciated.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MR. W. J. WINCH.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL,

MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6, 1890.

FREUND'S MUSIC AND DRAMA

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE DEBUT OF NIKISCH.

With an orchestra of about eighty men, some of them imported direct from Leipsic, Herr Nikisch last night invaded the precincts of New York, and challenged admiration in a battlefield which Seidl has abandoned, and where Thomas comes but rarely. The attendance was large, but not overflowing. Very many musicians were present, and the general feeling of the audience was critical, yet friendly.

The concert opened with a vigorous and spirited rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Nikisch's command of his forces was obvious. His peculiar methods were more observable, however, in the "Tristan Vorspiel," which was given with great poetic taste and rich tonal coloring. In the long Schumann Symphony, also, Mr. Nikisch was successful.

He appears to be a conductor of a more sentimental tendency than many to whom we are accustomed. He uses the right arm, of course, for the bâton, and the left to give emphasis; and also, by a slow, soothing motion, to restrain and subdue the tempests of sound. He is alert to anticipate the different phases of the composer, and intimate to the players their various entrées. His friends in Boston think he is something phenomenal, while another class—not of enemies, but of critics—claim that he is too poetical and too variable in his interpretations. To us he seems to be a graceful, interesting conductor, not a giant in will-power, nor remarkable in originality, but certainly efficient, able and poetic.

Mr. Kneisel, a Boston violinist of masterly skill, made a great impression in a concerto by Brahms, the very long and enormously difficult cadenza fairly astonishing both his audience and his brother musicians. Mr. Kneisel has been here before with Gericke, and will always be welcome to New York connoisseurs.

Clipping from Ledger Philadelphia Pa.

Date 12/19

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual); which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concert, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established here.

Clipping from Express New York N. Y.

Date 12/20

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—"Il Trovatore" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The absolute quiet which reigned in the audience at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conducter, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, began the opening number, the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," was something remarkable. Even the people who whisper or keep up an audible commentary on the performance at the expense of their neighbors' enjoyment were awed into silence, and of this numerous company even the boldest held his breath for a time. When the orchestra, which has won so enviable a reputation under its former conductor, was delighting the audience at Steinway Hall in previous years, it was felt that under the direction of a leader who would indulge in a wider range of expression the performances would be nearer perfection. In Mr. Nikisch this admirable organization has such a conductor, and the performance to which the audience, which represented in a more than ordinary degree the musical culture of New York, listened on Tuesday evening amply justified the reputation which the newcomer has gained in Boston as well as in Germany. It was a superb instrument that he had at his command in the band of eighty-two musicians, so carefully trained by Mr. Gericke, and admirably did he display his skill in using it to the best advantage. A programme which, besides the charming overture with which the concert began, comprised the Brahms violin concerto in D, op. 77, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony, afforded ample scope for a display of the effectiveness of the orchestra under its new leadership, and abundant opportunity for estimating the proper rank to be accorded to Mr. Nikisch as a conductor. The impression produced upon the audience was evidently in the highest degree favorable, and justly so. The performance of the band equaled in technical excellence its achievements last season, and the results so far as poetic expression and variety of effect were concerned, were far more satisfactory than ever before.

The concert was a delightful one from beginning to end. Weber's lovely overture was played with charming grace and delicacy of expression. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with superb effect and the romantic beauty of the symphony was made most agreeably manifest. Throughout the evening's performance Mr. Nikisch's rare excellence as a conductor was seen in his perfect control of his band, his nice perception of the delicate shades of meaning in the composition he is interpreting and his evident enthusiasm in his work.

In the Brahms concerto Mr. Franz Kneisel won hearty and well-merited applause, especially by his admirable performance of the cadenza, of his own composing, which he introduced. Altogether the concert was thoroughly enjoyable for its high artistic merit and afforded good reason for pleasurable anticipation of those which are to follow.

THE OPERA.

To many of those present at the Metropolitan Opera House Wednesday evening the real attraction lay in that part of the audience that had the charm of novelty. The Three-Americas delegates occupied the baignoir boxes and Secretary Blaine, ex-Secretary Whitney, ex-President Cleveland and Mrs. Cleveland were also among the spectators. Verdi's "Il Trovatore" was the opera performed, and its familiar and melodious strains were doubtless more acceptable to the distinguished visitors from abroad than the work of some German composer. The performance on this occasion was one of unequal merit. Herr Perotti bore off the honors. He was in excellent voice, and in the tower scene and continuously through the opera, wherever he took part in the proceedings, his clear ringing voice was heard with splendid effect. The "Di quella pura" in which he reaches the high C so effectively aroused the usual enthusiasm and its repetition was eagerly demanded. Herr Reichmann's personation of the Count di Luna did not equal his former assumption of the character. He was not in good voice, and his continual wandering from the key was painfully evident. In response to an encore he repeated "Il Balen" in the original version. Fraulein Betty Frank was the Leonora of the evening, and Frau Sonntag-Uhl took the part of Azucena.

Verdi is certainly having a good share of attention at the Metropolitan nowadays, but it cannot be said that last night's representation of his most popular opera was a specially creditable one, so far as the singers were concerned, excepting, of course, the brilliant work of the tenor. Mr. Walter Damrosch led the orchestra with proper spirit and discretion. On Friday evening Halévy's highly dramatic opera, "The Jewess," will be given.

Clipping from American Baltimore Md.

Date 12/20

A NOTABLE MUSICAL EVENT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Baltimore for the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening, under the new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch. The program was one of the best this orchestra has ever presented, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Rubinstein piano-concerto No. 3, in G; Liszt symphonic poem "The Preludes," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

All these works have been frequently performed in Baltimore; and they were therefore all the more highly enjoyed by the very musical audience present. The overture, although one of Mendelssohn's earlier works, is one of his best, it is full of the imagination and fire of youth, and, like Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," is the result of an effort to give musical embodiment to the grandeur of one of Nature's great works.

Professor Carl Faelten was given a hearty welcome by his many Baltimore friends when he came forward to play the Rubinstein concerto. He seated himself in his easy, old-fashioned way, threw his head a little to one side, and was soon at home in his work of rolling off the allegro moderato of the first movements. Among all the pianists in America there is no one more at home in the rendition of a concerto than he is.

In addition to his wonderful memory and technique as a virtuoso, he is a thorough orchestral musician, and as well acquainted with the parts of all the other instruments as he is with the noble pet Knabe grand piano on which he plays. He is an easy master of all the forms of pianism, and this concerto gives him a splendid opportunity for the fullest display of his very marvelous art. He was heartily recalled, as he thoroughly deserved to be.

The new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, was put to the greatest test in the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, No. 5. The Boston critics have been quite divided over the comparative merits of the former and the present director of the Symphony Orchestra, and it was quite evident that there was room for two parties in Baltimore on the same question. Mr. Nikisch is, to begin with, a more graceful conductor than Mr. Gericke; but both are the subjects of most decided mannerisms, which those who dislike them will persist in regarding as affectations. Mr. Gericke was quite addicted to the flying motion with his arms under the excitement of orchestral leading. He also had a particular wiggle, which he gave at the end of certain beats, and which had no meaning except to indicate the particular spot in Europe from which he came. Mr. Nikisch continues this little peculiarity, which attracts more attention from the audience than it does from the orchestra. He directs without notes, as Mr. Hamerik was in the habit of doing when he came to America. It is justifiable only when both conductor and orchestra are not only absolutely familiar with the work, but have just had it in rehearsal, and when the understanding between conductor and orchestra is simply perfect. Frequently, during the symphony last evening, the orchestra was fully an eighth of a beat behind the conductor, giving to the listener, who tried to follow both eye and ear, the inevitable effect of lack of precision and dragging, which is inexcusable in so fine an organization as the Boston Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch differs widely from his predecessors in the reading of the symphony, as well as from the majority of directors in America. The first movement was taken much slower than usual, and the scherzo undoubtedly suffered in the same way. The andante was well rendered, and in the finale some of the spirit lost in the previous movements was recovered.

But the performance of the work as a whole was not up to former renditions of the symphony in Baltimore, or to the high standard of the orchestra last year. However, it goes for the saying that the material of the Boston orchestra is the best in the country, and it is not to be expected that this organization will give a concert that is not very enjoyable. The fine performance of the strings and of the double basses, particularly in the scherzo and finale of the symphony, was a treat that only the most musical could fully appreciate. As a whole, the concert was a rare occasion for the lovers of the best music, and which should have been heard by a much larger audience.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1890.

——The program of the Symphony Concert last Saturday evening in Boston consisted of three novelties—a symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, a violin concerto No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by Mr. Adamowski, and a festival overture by Volkmann. Next Saturday evening's Symphony Concert will have as a program the following selections: MacDowell, symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C minor. The soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MR. W. J. WINCH.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

STEINERT HALL,

MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6, 1890.

Clipping from Freund's Music and Drama

Date SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE DEBUT OF NIKISCH.

With an orchestra of about eighty men, some of them imported direct from Leipsic, Herr Nikisch last night invaded the precincts of New York, and challenged admiration in a battlefield which Seidl has abandoned, and where Thomas comes but rarely. The attendance was large, but not overflowing. Very many musicians were present, and the general feeling of the audience was critical, yet friendly.

The concert opened with a vigorous and spirited rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Nikisch's command of his forces was obvious. His peculiar methods were more observable, however, in the "Tristan Vorspiel," which was given with great poetic taste and rich tonal coloring. In the long Schumann Symphony, also, Mr. Nikisch was successful.

He appears to be a conductor of a more sentimental tendency than many to whom we are accustomed. He uses the right arm, of course, for the bâton, and the left to give emphasis; and also, by a slow, soothing motion, to restrain and subdue the tempests of sound. He is alert to anticipate the different phases of the composer, and intimate to the players their various entrees. His friends in Boston think he is something phenomenal, while another class—not of enemies, but of critics—claim that he is too poetical and too variable in his interpretations. To us he seems to be a graceful, interesting conductor, not a giant in will-power, nor remarkable in originality, but certainly efficient, able and poetic.

Mr. Kneisel, a Boston violinist of masterly skill, made a great impression in a concerto by Brahms, the very long and enormously difficult cadenza fairly astonishing both his audience and his brother musicians. Mr. Kneisel has been here before with Gericke, and will always be welcome to New York connoisseurs.

Clipping from Tribune

Date Dec. 21

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual), which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concert, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established here.

Clipping from Express

New York N. Y.

Date 12/20

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—"Il Trovatore" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The absolute quiet which reigned in the audience at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conducter, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, began the opening number, the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," was something remarkable. Even the people who whisper or keep up an audible commentary on the performance at the expense of their neighbors' enjoyment were awed into silence, and of this numerous company even the boldest held his breath for a time. When the orchestra, which has won so enviable a reputation under its former conductor, was delighting the audience at Steinway Hall in previous years, it was felt that under the direction of a leader who would indulge in a wider range of expression the performances would be nearer perfection. In Mr. Nikisch this admirable organization has such a conductor, and the performance to which the audience, which represented in a more than ordinary degree the musical culture of New York, listened on Tuesday evening amply justified the reputation which the newcomer has gained in Boston as well as in Germany. It was a superb instrument that he had at his command in the band of eighty-two musicians, so carefully trained by Mr. Gericke, and admirably did he display his skill in using it to the best advantage. A programme which, besides the charming overture with which the concert began, comprised the Brahms violin concerto in D, op. 77, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony, afforded ample scope for a display of the effectiveness of the orchestra under its new leadership, and abundant opportunity for estimating the proper rank to be accorded to Mr. Nikisch as a conductor. The impression produced upon the audience was evidently in the highest degree favorable, and justly so. The performance of the band equaled in technical excellence its achievements last season, and the results so far as poetic expression and variety of effect were concerned, were far more satisfactory than ever before.

The concert was a delightful one from beginning to end. Weber's lovely overture was played with charming grace and delicacy of expression. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with superb effect and the romantic beauty of the symphony was made most agreeably manifest. Throughout the evening's performance Mr. Nikisch's rare excellence as a conducter was seen in his perfect control of his band, his nice perception of the delicate shades of meaning in the composition he is interpreting and his evident enthusiasm in his work.

In the Brahms concerto Mr. Franz Kneisel won hearty and well-merited applause, especially by his admirable performance of the cadenza, of his own composing, which he introduced. Altogether the concert was thoroughly enjoyable for its high artistic merit and afforded good reason for pleasurable anticipation of those which are to follow.

THE OPERA.

To many of those present at the Metropolitan Opera House Wednesday evening the real attraction lay in that part of the audience that had the charm of novelty. The Three-Americas delegates occupied the baignoir boxes and Secretary Blaine, ex-Secretary Whitney, ex-President Cleveland and Mrs. Cleveland were also among the spectators. Verdi's "Il Trovatore" was the opera performed, and its familiar and melodious strains were doubtless more acceptable to the distinguished visitors from abroad than the work of some German composer. The performance on this occasion was one of unequal merit. Herr Perotti bore off the honors. He was in excellent voice, and in the tower scene and continuously through the opera, wherever he took part in the proceedings, his clear ringing voice was heard with splendid effect. The "Di quella pura" in which he reaches the high C so effectively aroused the usual enthusiasm and its repetition was eagerly demanded. Herr Reichmann's personation of the Count di Luna did not equal his former assumption of the character. He was not in good voice, and his continual wandering from the key was painfully evident. In response to an encore he repeated "Il Balen" in the original version. Fraulein Betty Frank was the Leonora of the evening, and Frau Sonntag-Uhl took the part of Azucena.

Verdi is certainly having a good share of attention at the Metropolitan nowadays, but it cannot be said that last night's representation of his most popular opera was a specially creditable one, so far as the singers were concerned, excepting, of course, the brilliant work of the tenor. Mr. Walter Damrosch led the orchestra with proper spirit and discretion. On Friday evening Halévy's highly dramatic opera, "The Jewess," will be given.

Clipping from American

Baltimore Md.

Date 12/20

A NOTABLE MUSICAL EVENT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Baltimore for the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening, under the new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch. The program was one of the best this orchestra has ever presented, including the Mendelssohn overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Rubinstein piano-concerto No. 3, in G; Liszt symphonic poem "The Preludes," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

All these works have been frequently performed in Baltimore; and they were therefore all the more highly enjoyed by the very musical audience present. The overture, although one of Mendelssohn's earlier works, is one of his best. It is full of the imagination and fire of youth, and, like Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," is the result of an effort to give musical embodiment to the grandeur of one of Nature's great works.

Professor Carl Faelten was given a hearty welcome by his many Baltimore friends when he came forward to play the Rubinstein concerto. He seated himself in his easy, old-fashioned way, threw his head a little to one side, and was soon at home in his work of rolling off the allegro moderato of the first movements. Among all the pianists in America there is no one more at home in the rendition of a concerto than he is.

In addition to his wonderful memory and technique as a virtuoso, he is a thorough orchestral musician, and as well acquainted with the parts of all the other instruments as he is with the noble pet Knabe grand piano on which he plays. He is an easy master of all the forms of pianism, and this concerto gives him a splendid opportunity for the fullest display of his very marvelous art. He was heartily recalled, as he thoroughly deserved to be.

The new director, Herr Arthur Nikisch, was put to the greatest test in the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, No. 5. The Boston critics have been quite divided over the comparative merits of the former and the present director of the Symphony Orchestra, and it was quite evident that there was room for two parties in Baltimore on the same question. Mr. Nikisch is, to begin with, a more graceful conductor than Mr. Gericke; but both are the subjects of most decided mannerisms, which those who dislike them will persist in regarding as affectations. Mr. Gericke was quite addicted to the flying motion with his arms under the excitement of orchestral leading. He also had a particular wiggle, which he gave at the end of certain beats, and which had no meaning except to indicate the particular spot in Europe from which he came. Mr. Nikisch continues this little peculiarity, which attracts more attention from the audience than it does from the orchestra. He directs without notes, as Mr. Hamerik was in the habit of doing when he came to America. It is justifiable only when both conductor and orchestra are not only absolutely familiar with the work, but have just had it in rehearsal, and when the understanding between conductor and orchestra is simply perfect. Frequently, during the symphony last evening, the orchestra was fully an eighth of a beat behind the conductor, giving to the listener, who tried to follow both eye and ear, the inevitable effect of lack of precision and dragging, which is inexcusable in so fine an organization as the Boston Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch differs widely from his predecessors in the reading of the symphony, as well as from the majority of directors in America. The first movement was taken much slower than usual, and the scherzo undoubtedly suffered in the same way. The andante was well rendered, and in the finale some of the spirit lost in the previous movements was recovered.

But the performance of the work as a whole was not up to former renditions of the symphony in Baltimore, or to the high standard of the orchestra last year. However, is goes for the saying that the material of the Boston orchestra is the best in the country, and it is not to be expected that this organization will give a concert that is not very enjoyable. The fine performance of the strings and of the double basses, particularly in the scherzo and finale of the symphony, was a treat that only the most musical could fully appreciate. As a whole, the concert was a rare occasion for the lovers of the best music, and which should have been heard by a much larger audience.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1890.

——The program of the Symphony Concert last Saturday evening in Boston consisted of three novelties—a symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, a violin concerto No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by Mr. Adamowski, and a festival overture by Volkmann. Next Saturday evening's Symphony Concert will have as a program the following selections: MacDowell, symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C minor. The soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

STEINERT HALL.

THIRD CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN D, (No. 6, PETERS.) — HAYDN

ALLEGRO MODERATO.—ADAGIO CANTABILE.—
MINUETTO (ALLEGRETTO) AND TRIO.—FINALE (VIVACE).

SONG. "ADELAIDE." — BEETHOVEN

MR. WINCH.

QUARTET IN G MINOR, OP. 27. — GRIEG

UN POCO ANDANTE; ALLEGRO MOLTO ED AGITATO (PRESTO; PRESTISSIMO).—
ROMANCE. ANDANTINO; ALLEGRO AGITATO; TEMPO DEL ANIMATO; MA UN POCO PIU ANIMATO; ALLEGRO AGITATO.—
INTERMEZZO. ALLEGRO MOLTO MARCATO.—
FINALE. LENTO; PRESTO; UN POCO ANDANTE; PRESTO

HAYDN ordained that the quartet, like the sonata and the symphony, should consist of four fixed movements, and, as has been prettily said "It was his inexhaustibly fertile invention and his freedom in the treatment of form which nourished and developed the germ of this chamber music until it bore the most beautiful blossom of German musical art." "Inexhaustibly fertile invention" applied to Haydn ssems to the musician of to-day an extravagant estimate of the genius of the composer of the "Surprise" symphony and "The Creation," but to the composers and connoiseurs of 1780 Haydn was an iconoclast. It was Mozart who added strength and elegance to the form designed and winsomely illustrated by Haydn. That Haydn profited by Mozart's style, that the master learned of his pupil, is apparent in his later quartets. Haydn wrote eighty-three string quartets, Mozart only twenty-three. He was a self-taught musician, a man of immense industry, skilfully observant and patient. Of course he succeeded. He says of himself: "I never was a quick writer, and always composed with care and deliberation; that alone is the way to compose works that will last, and a real connoisseur can see at a glance whether a score has been written in undue haste or not."

Another quartet by Joseph Haydn, another fresh draught from the Pierian spring of unadulterated melody, melody that, to use the language of the poet, "flows and sings and shines," may not improbably be the silent reflection of those who know what wholesome influences the works of this spontaneous writer exercise. A special characteristic of the quartet played to-day are its conciseness and brevity: but though with "——the beam-like ephemeris Whose path is the lightning's," of Shelley's Sensitive Plant, it passes away as the "——light cloud by the moon," of Byron's "Seige of Corinth," and is gone almost as soon as seen, or rather silent, almost as soon as heard, it leaves an impression difficult to efface. But the best way is to let the music speak for itself. The quartet bears external evidence of being a comparatively early effort. Haydn began quartet writing when he was twenty-three years old at the instance of a wealthy amateur named Furnberg at whose home near the famous monastery of Melk he composed eighteen quartets in less than two years. (First performance at Adamowski Concerts.)

Edward Grieg, the composer, is a true Norseman. "My native place," he says' "is Bergen and my home is still in the neighborhood of that town. I passed my early childhood among some of the grandest scenery of the North, and ever since I can remember has the beauty of my country impressed me as some. thing wonderful and magnificent beyond expression. It is our mountains, our

Clipping from Express New York City
Date 12/4/20

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—"Il Trovatore" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The absolute quiet which reigned in the au dience at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, whe the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new co ductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, began the openi number, the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe, was something remarkable. Even the peopl who whisper or keep up an audible commentat on the performance at the expense of their neigh bors' enjoyment were awed into silence, and e this numerous company even the boldest held hi breath for a time. When the orchestra, which has won so enviable a reputation under its former conductor, was delighting the audience at Stein way Hall in previous years, it was felt that under the direction of a leader who would indulge in a wider range of expression the performances would be nearer perfection. In Mr. Nikisch this admirable organization has such a conductor, and the performance to which the audience, which represented in a more than ordinary degree the musical culture of New York, listened on Tuesday evening amply justified the reputation which the newcomer has gained in Boston as well as in Germany. It was a superb instrument that he had at his command in the band of eighty-two musicians, so carefully trained by Mr. Gericke, and admirably did he display his skill in using it to the best advantage. A programme which, besides the charming overture with which the concert began, comprised the Brahms violin concerto in D, op. 77, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony, afforded ample scope for a display of the effectiveness of the orchestra under its new leadership, and abundant opportunity for estimating the proper rank to be accorded to Mr. Nikisch as a conductor. The impression produced upon the audience was evidently in the highest degree favorable, and justly so. The performance of the band equaled in technical excellence its achievements last season, and the results so far as poetic expression and variety of effect were concerned, were far more satisfactory than ever before.

The concert was a delightful one from beginning to end. Weber's lovely overture was played with charming grace and delicacy of expression. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with superb effect and the romantic beauty of the symphony was made most agreeably manifest. Throughout the evening's performance Mr. Nikisch's rare excellence as a conducter was seen in his perfect control of his band, his nice perception of the delicate shades of meaning in the composition he is interpreting and his evident enthusiasm in his work.

In the Brahms concerto Mr. Franz Kneisel won hearty and well-merited applause, especially by his admirable performance of the cadenza, of his own composing, which he introduced. Altogether the concert was thoroughly enjoyable for its high artistic merit and afforded good reason for pleasurable anticipation of those which are to follow.

THE OPERA.

To many of those present at the Metropolitan Opera House Wednesday evening the real attraction lay in that part of the audience that had the charm of novelty. The Three-Americas delegates occupied the baignoir boxes and Secretary Blaine, ex-Secretary Whitney, ex-President Cleveland and Mrs. Cleveland were also among the spectators. Verdi's "Il Trovatore" was the opera performed, and its familiar and melodious strains were doubtless more acceptable to the distinguished visitors from abroad than the work of some German composer. The performance on this occasion was one of unequal merit. Herr Perotti bore off the honors. He was in excellent voice, and in the tower scene and continuously through the opera, wherever he took part in the proceedings, his clear ringing voice was heard with splendid effect. The "Di quella pura" in which he reaches the high C so effectively aroused the usual enthusiasm and its repetition was eagerly demanded. Herr Reichmann's personation of the Count di Luna did not equal his former assumption of the character. He was not in good voice, and his continual wandering from the key was painfully evident. In response to an encore he repeated "Il Balen" in the original version. Fraulein Betty Frank was the Leonora of the evening, and Frau Sonntar-Uhl took the part of Azucena.

Verdi is certainly having a good share of attention at the Metropolitan nowadays, but it cannot be said that last night's representation of his most popular opera was a specially creditable one, so far as the singers were concerned, excepting, of course, the brilliant work of the tenor. Mr. Walter Damresch led the orchestra with proper spirit and discretion. On Friday evening Halévy's highly dramatic opera, "The Jewess," will be given.

FREUND'S MUSIC AND DRAMA

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE DEBUT OF NIKISCH.

With an orchestra of about eighty men, some of them imported direct from Leipsic, Herr Nikisch last night invaded the precincts of New York, and challenged admiration in a battlefield which Seidl has abandoned, and where Thomas comes but rarely. The attendance was large, but not overflowing. Very many musicians were present, and the general feeling of the audience was critical, yet friendly.

The concert opened with a vigorous and spirited rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Nikisch's command of his forces was obvious. His peculiar methods were more observable, however, in the "Tristan Vorspiel," which was given with great poetic taste and rich tonal coloring. In the long Schumann Symphony, also, Mr. Nikisch was successful.

He appears to be a conductor of a more sentimental tendency than many to whom we are accustomed. He uses the right arm, of course, for the bâton, and the left to give emphasis; and also, by a slow, soothing motion, to restrain and subdue the tempests of sound. He is alert to anticipate the different phases of the composer, and intimate to the players their various entrees. His friends in Boston think he is something phenomenal, while another class—not of enemies, but of critics—claim that he is too poetical and too variable in his interpretations. To us he seems to be a graceful, interesting conductor, not a giant in will-power, nor remarkable in originality, but certainly efficient, able and poetic.

Mr. Kneisel, a Boston violinist of masterly skill, made a great impression in a concerto by Brahms, the very long and enormously difficult cadenza fairly astonishing both his audience and his brother musicians. Mr. Kneisel has been here before with Gericke, and will always be welcome to New York connoisseurs.

Clipping from Ledger Philadelphia Pa.
Date 12/9

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 8 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual); which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concerts, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established.

THE MUSICAL COUR

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8,

——The program of the Symphony Concer urday evening in Boston consisted of three symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, a certo No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by owski, and a festival overture by Volkmann. day evening's Symphony Concert will have as a following selections: MacDowell, symphonic poem lot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pian minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

lakes and forests which have influenced my work far more than any human being has done, and even now, though I am over forty (I was born in 1843), they have the self-same power over me. My musical education up to my fifteenth year was solely in the hands of my mother, who was a very good pianiste indeed, and who was very careful in her teaching. I remember one amusing scene at school when I was about nine years old, and when my first composition failed to find favor in the eyes of my master. We were having a German lesson, and every pupil was supposed to bring a bulky dictionary to school. I had forgotten mine and was duly scolded by the teacher, when the boy who sat next to me burst out 'He hasn't got his dictionary, but he has got something else. He has a piece of music which he himself has written.' It had to be produced, and the verdict was that I would far better leave such rubbish at home and think of my lessons. I dare say it was rubbish. At all events, it does not exist any more."

No greater contrast to Haydn's lucid measures can be imagined than the romantic, impetuous and unconventional quartet by Grieg, the only work of the kind the Scandinavian composer has written. In its early portions the melancholy, humor and sentiment of the North find picturesque, if not startling expression, while the Italian dance theme of the finale has a vehement setting not characteristic of Southern skies. (First performance at Adamowski Concerts.)

WORKS PERFORMED AT THREE CONCERTS.

SECOND SEASON. 1889—90.

BEETHOVEN.	SONG. "ADELAIDE."
BRAHMS.	PIANOFORTE QUARTET in A, op. 26.
DAVIDOFF.	"AM SPRINGBRUNNEN," For 'Cello.
FRANZ.	THREE SONGS.
GRIEG.	QUARTET in G minor, op. 27.
HAYDN.	QUARTET in D, (No. 6, Peters)
MACKENZIE.	BENEDICTUS for Violin.
MOLIQUE.	ANDANTE from 'Cello Concerto in D minor.
MOZART.	QUARTET in D, (K 575).
RUBINSTEIN.	PIANOFORTE TRIO in G minor, op. 15.
SCHUMANN.	QUARTET in A minor, op. 41. No. 1.

Clipping from Express
New York N. Y.
Date 12/20

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—"Il Trovatore" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The absolute quiet which reigned in the audience at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, began the opening number, the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," was something remarkable. Even the people who whisper or keep up an audible commentary on the performance at the expense of their neighbors' enjoyment were awed into silence, and of this numerous company even the boldest held his breath for a time. When the orchestra, which has won so enviable a reputation under its former conductor, was delighting the audience at Steinway Hall in previous years, it was felt that under the direction of a leader who would indulge in a wider range of expression the performances would be nearer perfection. In Mr. Nikisch this admirable organization has such a conductor, and the performance to which the audience, which represented in a more than ordinary degree the musical culture of New York, listened on Tuesday evening amply justified the reputation which the newcomer has gained in Boston as well as in Germany. It was a superb instrument that he had at his command in the band of eighty-two musicians, so carefully trained by Mr. Gericke, and admirably did he display his skill in using it to the best advantage. A programme which, besides the charming overture with which the concert began, comprised the Brahms violin concerto in D, op. 77, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony, afforded ample scope for a display of the effectiveness of the orchestra under its new leadership, and abundant opportunity for estimating the proper rank to be accorded to Mr. Nikisch as a conductor. The impression produced upon the audience was evidently in the highest degree favorable, and justly so. The performance of the band equaled in technical excellence its achievements last season, and the results so far as poetic expression and variety of effect were concerned, were far more satisfactory than ever before.

The concert was a delightful one from beginning to end. Weber's lovely overture was played with charming grace and delicacy of expression. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given with superb effect and the romantic beauty of the symphony was made most agreeably manifest. Throughout the evening's performance Mr. Nikisch's rare excellence as a conductor was seen in his perfect control of his band, his nice perception of the delicate shades of meaning in the composition he is interpreting and his evident enthusiasm in his work.

In the Brahms concerto Mr. Franz Kneisel won hearty and well-merited applause, especially by his admirable performance of the cadenza, of his own composing, which he introduced. Altogether the concert was thoroughly enjoyable for its high artistic merit and afforded good reason for pleasurable anticipation of those which are to follow.

THE OPERA.

To many of those present at the Metropolitan Opera House Wednesday evening the real attraction lay in that part of the audience that had the charm of novelty. The Three-Americas delegates occupied the baignoir boxes and Secretary Blaine, ex-Secretary Whitney, ex-President Cleveland and Mrs. Cleveland were also among the spectators. Verdi's "Il Trovatore" was the opera performed, and its familiar and melodious strains were doubtless more acceptable to the distinguished visitors from abroad than the work of some German composer. The performance on this occasion was one of unequal merit. Herr Perotti bore off the honors. He was in excellent voice, and in the tower scene and continuously through the opera, wherever he took part in the proceedings, his clear ringing voice was heard with splendid effect. The "Di quella pura" in which he reaches the high C so effectively aroused the usual enthusiasm and its repetition was eagerly demanded. Herr Reichmann's personation of the Count di Luna did not equal his former assumption of the character. He was not in good voice, and his continual wandering from the key was painfully evident. In response to an encore he repeated "Il Balen" in the original version. Fraulein Betty Frank was the Leonora of the evening, and Frau Sonntag-Uhl took the part of Azucena.

Verdi is certainly having a good share of attention at the Metropolitan nowadays, but it cannot be said that last night's representation of his most popular opera was a specially creditable one, so far as the singers were concerned, excepting, of course, the brilliant work of the tenor. Mr. Walter Damrosch led the orchestra with proper spirit and discretion. On Friday evening Halévy's highly dramatic opera, "The Jewess," will be given.

FREUND'S MUSIC AND DRAMA

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1889.

THE DEBUT OF NIKISCH.

With an orchestra of about eighty men, some of them imported direct from Leipsic, Herr Nikisch last night invaded the precincts of New York, and challenged admiration in a battlefield which Seidl has abandoned, and where Thomas comes but rarely. The attendance was large, but not overflowing. Very many musicians were present, and the general feeling of the audience was critical, yet friendly.

The concert opened with a vigorous and spirited rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Nikisch's command of his forces was obvious. His peculiar methods were more observable, however, in the "Tristan Vorspiel," which was given with great poetic taste and rich tonal coloring. In the long Schumann Symphony, also, Mr. Nikisch was successful.

He appears to be a conductor of a more sentimental tendency than many to whom we are accustomed. He uses the right arm, of course, for the bâton, and the left to give emphasis; and also, by a slow, soothing motion, to restrain and subdue the tempests of sound. He is alert to anticipate the different phases of the composer, and intimate to the players their various entrees. His friends in Boston think he is something phenomenal, while another class—not of enemies, but of critics—claim that he is too poetical and too variable in his interpretations. To us he seems to be a graceful, interesting conductor, not a giant in will-power, nor remarkable in originality, but certainly efficient, able and poetic.

Mr. Kneisel, a Boston violinist of masterly skill, made a great impression in a concerto by Brahms, the very long and enormously difficult cadenza fairly astonishing both his audience and his brother musicians. Mr. Kneisel has been here before with Gericke, and will always be welcome to New York connoisseurs.

Clipping from Ledger
Phila. Pa.
Date 12/19

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled in every part with an audience whose size, under the circumstances of the weather, denoted a healthy state of musical feeling in this city, and which bestowed upon the work of the orchestra demonstrations of approval that were flattering to the new conductor of the organization, Arthur Nikisch. The ever enjoyable "Euryanthe" (Von Weber) overture, played to perfection, opened the concert charmingly and notified the more observant of a fact subsequently emphasized—that Mr. Nikisch is a decidedly original reader. This was followed by Litoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Op. 45), in which Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, the soloist, displayed artistic abilities much beyond the common. Her playing sometimes lacked power, but at no time clearness, beauty of tone or sincerity. In the allegro passages she attained brilliancy and gave the andante with nice rather than deep expression. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler made a very good impression and deserved all the applause she received.

The only other two numbers were the third and perhaps most familiar of Liszt's symphonic poems—"Les Preludes," and the Symphony (placed at the end, as usual), which was Schumann's fourth, in D minor (op. 120), and which is also so well known as to enable most of those who attended the concert to note differences between former interpretations and those of Mr. Nikisch. Speaking in general terms of the orchestra, it is within bounds to say that it had not before been heard to such advantage as it was last night in regard to its general effectiveness. There was a freedom of execution, fiery sweeps of the strings, and an average virility of tone that came as a novelty from this band, whose balance was never finer, its quality of tone never more lovely. And, in point of virtuosity, it would be difficult for any orchestra to excel this one. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes, except in the concerto, does not beat time, as a rule, in the usual way. He has certain signs, figures and movements, evidently understood clearly by his men, which he uses instead, and the result of his incessant watchfulness, authoritative direction and the magnetic response he gets from the band is wonderful in the finish of its performance. It should be added that this seems to add new "effects"—the introduction of what in stage craft is understood as "business"—where they are not always most welcome to those who are used to quieter "orthodox" readings, but there can be no question as to the superbly finished character of the playing of the Boston Orchestra and its present conductor. The latter, by last night's concert, won a good share of the standing the former had already firmly established here.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8,

——The program of the Symphony Concer urday evening in Boston consisted of three symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, certo No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by owski, and a festival overture by Volkmann.
day evening's Symphony Concert will have as a following selections; MacDowell, symphonic poem lot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pian minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

Clipping from Times Philadelphia Pa

Date 12/19

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

TRAVELLER.

JANUARY 7.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Only lack of space prevents due recognition of the admirable concert with which the Adamouski Quartet ended its second season. Last night the quartet played in Steinert Hall Haydn's quartet in D (Peters No. 6) and Grieg's romantic and characteristic G minor quartet, not heard here in its entirety for several years. Between the two instrumental pieces Mr. W. J. Winch sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" with that earnestness of spirit and beauty of sentiment which are his in such a marked degree. The performance of the difficult Grieg quartet, so changeful of mood, indicated a great deal of rehearsing; it was not only an admirable performance technically considered, but the players were heartily in sympathy with its ardent spirit. The work, though unequal, is virile and eloquent. The quartet closes its second season in excellent shape; the coming of Mr. Adamowski's brother to take the position of violoncellist was accomplished without detriment to the ensemble, while it furnished the town with another excellent chamber player.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. Mr. W. J. Winch will be the soloist. The following is the interesting programme: Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.) Haydn; Aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; songs, with piano, Dvorák; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold at the door on the evening of the concert.

The Boston Singers' public concert in Music Hall last night was attended by a fair-sized audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. Haydn's symphony in G (No. 13 B and H) was rendered by the orchestra in a graceful manner, yet with much exactness. Mr. W. J. Winch, the soloist of the evening, sung an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe," and several songs by Dvorák, which were well received. In the latter numbers, the accompanist was Mr. Winch himself. Perhaps the best number of the evening, however, was the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The Independent

251 Broadway, opp. City Hall Park.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 26th, 1889.

THE first visit to New York this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was emphatically the event of last week; and it received the attention it deserved. A stormy night made no conspicuous difference in the size of the audience in Steinway Hall. The character of that audience was of the special sort, the called and chosen of the musical public here, professional or amateur, who rightly regard these entertainments as among the very best things, not to say the best in the way of absolute music the winter brings. The particular fact that a large majority of those present must have been curious to derive its own impression and make up its own mind as to the newly installed conductor, Mr. Arthur Gericke—his outward man and havior and what traits in his leadership would be individualized on such a public occasion, added a lively element of curiosity; and a capital program for enjoyment in itself, or for comparisons, made the sum of special interests complete. To discuss in detail of criticism the performance of the Boston orchestra during the four numbers of the program — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms's Violin Concerto in B Minor, Opus 77, Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and the D Minor Symphony of Schumann, would be merely to repeat phrases and once more write down compliments that are no longer novel from a New York source and even more deserved. It needed only half the course of the Weber Overture, and more particularly, the first movement of Schumann's familiar symphony, to make it evident that if the Bostonians were manifestly the best orchestra in America before now, they are even more wonderful to-day; and that the Mr. Nikisch is all that such an organization demands and a successor to Mr. Gericke admirably qualified to carry out the work committed to him exactly on the noble lines on which it has progressed in the recent past. It is not agreeable to our own amour-propre in New York to confess the emphatic inferiority of our best orchestral performances if compared with these guests who teach us the fact modestly but convincingly every time they play a new or an old score for us; to say that the Philharmonic, much less to say the Symphony Society, or Mr. Seidl's, or Mr. Van der Stucken's, or any other vocal leader's efforts have so far failed to give us anything quite so precise, so sympathetic, so solid, such a balance of tone and attention to shading in every measure of a symphony or overture, so conscientious as that realized in the case of the Bostonians. In their performance it would seem that each man is, first of all, a master of his instrument; and, second, that to regard the value of every mark of expression on a page of music has become what Mr. Mivart calls "a matter of mechanical conscientiousness." In hearing such an orchestra one realizes that for a body of eighty musicians to play like one man, and that man a careful and perfect artist need not be so much of an ideal as it generally remains. Mr. Nikisch's reception was a part of the cordiality and enthusiasm of the evening. Smaller in physique than Mr. Gericke he has, nevertheless, a presence and a dignity of bearing that makes his short stature and slight build not to his disadvantage. He conducts with almost as little demonstration as Mr. Gericke, seldom so much as stretching his arm at full length, adhering a good deal to the traditions of a time-beater's methods, to which more than one zealous exponent of muscular leadership herein might do well to revert. He is said to prefer to lead without a score before him; and all except the Brahms Concerto he so directed the other evening. In regard to this last work it would seem that nobody, however out of sympathy with Brahms and his inspirations and treatment of them, could fail to recognize in it a perfect mine of exquisite melody and the loveliest harmonic and instrumental effects—and that in its first movement alone was latent enough musical material to furnish forth a symphony for some of the composer's immediate contemporaries, who are like foothills beside a mountain compared with him. Arbitrary and unmistakable as are his mannerisms, his changes of accent, time and key at his own sweet will, there is a fund of invention in such a piece of musical thought and writing that is marvelous and that atones for works of less originality and expressiveness. The last movement suggests in its theme the Hungarian polka motif used by Bruch in his Violin Concerto, but otherwise is on a par with its predecessors. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist in the concerto and played with great refinement. Still a young man, Mr. Kneisel is a superior artist, and it is easy to believe that with more time for development he would become more widely recognized as such among the many good violinists now in the country.

Boston Weekly Courier.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1890.

Twelfth Symphony Concert. Mr. Adamowski, Soloist.

The programme of the 12th symphony concert was:

A. Borodin.	Symphony No. 1, in E flat. Adagio; allegro.—Scherzo.— Andante.—Allegro molto vico. (First time in America.)
Saint-Saens.	Concerto for violin, in B minor, No. 3, op. 61. Allegro non troppo.— Andante quasi allegretto.— Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo. (First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.	Festival overture, in F, op. 50. (First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the soloist.

From an attitude almost partisan towards familiar German music Mr. Nikisch turns with a bound and startles his hearers with a programme containing only novelties, the chiefest of which is from an entirely new source. It is a hazardous undertaking to place in juxtaposition only novelties. Moreover there is a large class of regular Symphony-goers who perfer the old things; consequently such a programme as Mr. Nikisch provided on Saturday invited a fusilade of quiet criticism; for whereas the conservatives might be coaxed into liking a new work were it skilfully placed between old friends, they are shy of three such, and go to their performance just a bit out of mood, while the progressive element who want novelties are epicurean in their habits, and consider as important the proper balance of things new and old at the feast to which they are bidden. So much on general principles.

Now to the case in point. The three pieces composing Saturday's programme were in such good contrast as to matter and style, and moreover were so brief as to furnish only the slightest defence of the general principles laid down in the preceding paragraph. Borodin is a name new to Boston. He is not well known to amateurs anywhere save in Russia, where he taught chemistry, and finally was won to music. The symphony—one of two in the catalogue of this composer—is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. Nikisch's preference is to be commended, for although the symphony is crude in spots, uneasily and perhaps inelegantly written as are the fundamental string portions, the composer justifies his originality by interesting invention, knows what a good theme is, and is fertile in fancy and imagination. It is easy enough to find suggestions of other composers, but it does not seem to us that Borodin is a conscious plagiarist. The somewhat extended first movement, though unequal and whimsical in form, has force, and in the instrumentation is splendidly barbaric; the finale has an element of humor in the interchange of phrases from top to bottom of the orchestra, is ingeniously scored and thematically sturdy. But the gem of the work is the fascinating scherzo, as brittle and dainty a piece of scoring, with an effective color contrast in the trio, as one often hears. The slow movement is not without sentiment, the first theme is good and well treated; both this movement and the scherzo betray an enviable ability to write for the wood-wind. The work was read with every regard for the composer's meaning, and as it is as changeful of mood as a Bar Harbor maiden, and difficult, as is said maiden, its performance was a real triumph for the orchestra; the scherzo was a remarkable expression of perfect technique. The symphony was enjoyed by the audience, and Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for presenting it.

The violin concerto has little that is characteristic of its composer. It is a graceful composition, melodic, but not remarkable. Though not extravagantly virtuosic, in the solo portions, the orchestra is subordinate from first to last. Some of the themes, notably the subject of the andante and the second motif of the first movement, are very lovely. In the treatment there are occasional touches in the accompaniment which arrest the attention, but generally the scoring is subjective. Mr. Adamowski's performance was beautifully sympathetic and technically neat; it seemed to us an advance over his admirable playing of the Moszkowski concerto last season.

Mr. Volkman's Pesth-House overture—the work was written for the conservatory at Pesth—is a sumptuous piece of scoring, containing much musicianly work. Volkmann must have written it after hearing "Die Meistersinger."

The next programme will present a new symphonic poem by MacDowell, "Lancelot and Elaine," Gade's C minor symphony, and Schumann's pianoforte concerto. The pianist will be Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place on tonight's programme will be assigned to an entirely new work, receiving—after two readings at Weisbaden and Darmstadt—its initial performance. This work is the symphonic poem entitled "Launcelot and Elaine," founded upon the characters as portrayed by Tennyson in those "Idylls of the King," which bear their names, and it comes from the pen of Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who has established himself in America, as he had already done in Germany, as a young man of mark. Highly reputed abroad during his years of study and those of public work subsequent to them for the possession of talent, industry, original views and technical mastery in art, he has shown himself since his return as a writer, and also as a player, of force perhaps more than of fancy, his concertos and lighter pieces—even the brilliant and bold "Hexentanz"—having been more eminent for earnestness, ardor and firmness than for elegance, grace and ductility of style, although these qualities were not lacking by any means. His talent and his disposition alike seemed to lead him to choose first positive themes and to enunciate them with energy and insistance, thus promising that when repose and reflection should bring elaboration, reserve and polish, there would be in his compositions the individuality, robustness and tenacity which are often wanting in the delicate and refined writers who never get beyond nice kapellmeister music. The subject chosen for this new work requires a command of many elements of expression for a truly significant presentation. On the one hand are the passion, the boldness, the martial spirit, the remorse and downfall of that chief of Arthur's knights, and on the other, the patience, the gentleness, the forbearance, the long-suffering, the trust and the tenderly pathetic end of the obscure and holy maiden—false love against true, warfare against peace, public defeat against unnoticed triumph, the laurel plucked down from lofty living temples and a crown of light laid upon the lowly dead brow. Indeed the choice of a subject so rich in sharp and splendid contrast seems to offer so vast a range for thought and treatment that no possible single episodes could fitly imply its many-sidedness and its material and spiritual antitheses. Mr. MacDowell's poem, however, is felicitous and beautiful, knit up with strength and enlightened with fine imagination. The scheme of it may be hastily sketched thus: A calm introduction, rather legendary (if the word may be so used) than idyllic, in which appears a dignified but warm theme which indicates the presence of the queen in the story; then comes a brief decisive figure which means Launcelot; next comes a foreshadowing of the great tournament scene, followed by the Elaine figure, properly here placed, as it was on his journey that the knight brought her fate to the loving girl; a brilliant, bold and tumultuous battle-piece, through which is heard and felt the Launcelot figure until the end, which comes brokenly and suits into despondent gloom; thence to the finale the two chief themes are interwoven, except for a moment when the queen subject is stormily thrown across them; then soft, sepulchral tones are heard, with lamentable suggestions of bells and chants, the Launcelot theme softens and the whole finishes softly and lingeringly with what might almost be called an apotheosis of the Elaine melody. The effect left by yesterday's hearing was delightful and the general verdict was flattering; the larger scenes show the composer's more urgent characteristics, while opposed to them are plaintive and sensitive moods at which Mr. MacDowell's other works have only hinted; the technical treatment is clear and free, and the temptation to do outrè things, to bring in musical instruments, or ever the harp, has been nobly resisted The soloist of tonight will be Mrs. Steiniger-Clark, who has been too long absent from these concerts; her selection is Schumann's piano forte concerto, which she read admirably at yesterday's rehearsal. It is the well known principle of this artist that grace and beauty are the first things to seek in music, and her exposition of the concerto accorded with this principle. The phrase was always lucidly set forth and the technique was subordinated to it, so that what was sometimes lost from warmth and force was compensated for by purity, simplicity and self-abnegation. It was a worthy presentment in spirit and unquestionably apt and evident in form. The first symphony of Gade will complete the programme.

The concert of this day fortnight will have for its novelty Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, for its soloist, Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing a "Euryanthe" air and songs by Dvorák; the overture will be Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and the symphony, Schuman's in E-flat, commonly called the "Rhenish."

[55]

Clipping from Times Philadelphia Pa

Date 12/7/89

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

TRAVELLER.

JANUARY 7.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Only lack of space prevents due recognition of the admirable concert with which the Adamouski Quartet ended its second season. Last night the quartet played in Steinert Hall Haydn's quartet in D (Peters No. 6) and Grieg's romantic and characteristic G minor quartet, not heard here in its entirety for several years. Between the two instrumental pieces Mr. W. J. Winch sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" with that earnestness of spirit and beauty of sentiment which are his in such a marked degree. The performance of the difficult Grieg quartet, so changeful of mood, indicated a great deal of rehearsing; it was not only an admirable performance technically considered, but the players were heartily in sympathy with its ardent spirit. The work, though unequal, is virile and eloquent. The quartet closes its second season in excellent shape; the coming of Mr. Adamowski's brother to take the position of violoncellist was accomplished without detriment to the ensemble, while it furnished the town with another excellent chamber player.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. Mr. W. J. Winch will be the soloist. The following is the interesting programme: Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.) Haydn; Aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; songs, with piano, Dvorák; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold at the door on the evening of the concert.

The Boston Singers' public concert in Music Hall last night was attended by a fair-sized audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. Haydn's symphony in G (No. 13 B and H) was rendered by the orchestra in a graceful manner, yet with much exactness. Mr. W. J. Winch, the soloist of the evening, sung an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe," and several songs by Dvorak, which were well received. In the latter numbers, the accompanist was Mr. Nikisch himself. Perhaps the best number of the evening, however, was the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The Independent

251 Broadway, opp. City Hall Park.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 26th, 1889.

THE first visit to New York this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was emphatically the event of last week; and it received the attention it deserved. A stormy night made no conspicuous difference in the size of the audience in Steinway Hall. The character of that audience was of the special sort, the called and chosen of the musical public here, professional or amateur, who rightly regard these entertainments as among the very best things, not to say the best in the way of absolute music the winter brings. The particular fact that a large majority of those present must have been curious to derive its own impression and make up its own mind as to the newly installed conductor, Mr. Arthur Gericke—his outward man and havior and what traits in his leadership would be individualized on such a public occasion, added a lively element of curiosity; and a capital program for enjoyment in itself, or for comparisons, made the sum of special interests complete. To discuss in detail of criticism the performance of the Boston orchestra during the four numbers of the program — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms's Violin Concerto in B Minor, Opus 77, Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and the D Minor Symphony of Schumann, would be merely to repeat phrases and once more write down compliments that are no longer novel from a New York source and even more deserved. It needed only half the course of the Weber Overture, and more particularly, the first movement of Schumann's familiar symphony, to make it evident that if the Bostonians were manifestly the best orchestra in America before now, they are even more wonderful to-day; and that the Mr. Nikisch is all that such an organization demands and a successor to Mr. Gericke admirably qualified to carry out the work committed to him exactly on the noble lines on which it has progressed in the recent past. It is not agreeable to our own amour-propre in New York to confess the emphatic inferiority of our best orchestral performances if compared with these guests who teach us the fact modestly but convincingly every time they play a new or an old score for us; to say that the Philharmonic, much less to say the Symphony Society, or Mr. Seidl's, or Mr. Van der Stucken's, or any other vocal leader's efforts have so far failed to give us anything quite so precise, so sympathetic, so solid, such a balance of tone and attention to shading in every measure of a symphony or overture, so conscientious as that realized in the case of the Bostonians. In their performance it would seem that each man is, first of all, a master of his instrument; and, second, that to regard the value of every mark of expression on a page of music has become what Mr. Mivart calls "a matter of mechanical conscientiousness." In hearing such an orchestra one realizes that for a body of eighty musicians to play like one man, and that man a careful and perfect artist need not be so much of an ideal as it generally remains. Mr. Nikisch's reception was a part of the cordiality and enthusiasm of the evening. Smaller in physique than Mr. Gericke he has, nevertheless, a presence and a dignity of bearing that makes his short stature and slight build not to his disadvantage. He conducts with almost as little demonstration as Mr. Gericke, seldom so much as stretching his arm at full length, adhering a good deal to the traditions of a time-beater's methods, to which more than one zealous exponent of muscular leadership herein might do well to revert. He is said to prefer to lead without a score before him; and all except the Brahms Concerto he so directed the other evening. In regard to this last work it would seem that nobody, however out of sympathy with Brahms and his inspirations and treatment of them, could fail to recognize in it a perfect mine of exquisite melody and the loveliest harmonic and instrumental effects—and that in its first movement alone was latent enough musical material to furnish forth a symphony for some of the composer's immediate contemporaries, who are like foothills beside a mountain compared with him. Arbitrary and unmistakable as are his mannerisms, his changes of accent, time and key at his own sweet will, there is a fund of invention in such a piece of musical thought and writing that is marvelous and that atones for works of less originality and expressiveness. The last movement suggests in its theme the Hungarian polka motif used by Bruch in his Violin Concerto, but otherwise is on a par with its predecessors. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist in the concerto and played with great refinement. Still a young man, Mr. Kneisel is a superior artist, and it is easy to believe that with more time for development he would become more widely recognized as such among the many good violinists now in the country.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1890.

Twelfth Symphony Concert. Mr. Adamowski, Soloist.

The programme of the 12th symphony concert was:

A. Borodin.	Symphony No. 1, in E flat. Adagio; allegro.—Scherzo.—Andante.—Allegro molto vico. (First time in America.)
Saint-Saens.	Concerto for violin, in B minor, No. 3, op. 61. Allegro non troppo.—Andante quasi allegretto.—Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo. (First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.	Festival overture, in F, op. 50. (First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the soloist.

From an attitude almost partisan towards familiar German music Mr. Nikisch turns with a bound and startles his hearers with a programme containing only novelties, the chiefest of which is from an entirely new source. It is a hazardous undertaking to place in juxtaposition only novelties. Moreover there is a large class of regular Symphony-goers who perfer the old things; consequently such a programme as Mr. Nikisch provided on Saturday invited a fusilade of quiet criticism; for whereas the conservatives might be coaxed into liking a new work were it skilfully placed between old friends, they are shy of three such, and go to their performance just a bit out of mood, while the progressive element who want novelties are epicurean in their habits, and consider as important the proper balance of things new and old at the feast to which they are bidden. So much on general principles.

Now to the case in point. The three pieces composing Saturday's programme were in such good contrast as to matter and style, and moreover were so brief as to furnish only the slightest defence of the general principles laid down in the preceding paragraph. Borodin is a name new to Boston. He is not well known to amateurs anywhere save in Russia, where he taught chemistry, and finally was won to music. The symphony—one of two in the catalogue of this composer—is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. Nikisch's preference is to be commended, for although the symphony is crude in spots, uneasily and perhaps inelegantly written as are the fundamental string portions, the composer justifies his originality by interesting invention, knows what a good theme is, and is fertile in fancy and imagination. It is easy enough to find suggestions of other composers, but it does not seem to us that Borodin is a conscious plagiarist. The somewhat extended first movement, though unequal and whimsical in form, has force, and in the instrumentation is splendidly barbaric; the finale has an element of humor in the interchange of phrases from top to bottom of the orchestra, is ingeniously scored and thematically sturdy. But the gem of the work is the fascinating scherzo, as brittle and dainty a piece of scoring, with an effective color contrast in the trio, as one often hears. The slow movement is not without sentiment, the first theme is good and well treated; both this movement and the scherzo betray an enviable ability to write for the wood-wind. The work was read with every regard for the composer's meaning, and as it is as changeful of mood as a Bar Harbor maiden, and difficult, as is said maiden, its performance was a real triumph for the orchestra; the scherzo was a remarkable expression of perfect technique. The symphony was enjoyed by the audience, and Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for presenting it.

The violin concerto has little that is characteristic of its composer. It is a graceful composition, melodic, but not remarkable. Though not extravagantly virtuosic, in the solo portions, the orchestra is subordinate from first to last. Some of the themes, notably the subject of the andante and the second motif of the first movement, are very lovely. In the treatment there are occasional touches in the accompaniment which arrest the attention, but generally the scoring is subjective. Mr. Adamowski's performance was beautifully sympathetic and technically neat; it seemed to us an advance over his admirable playing of the Moszkowski concerto last season.

Mr. Volkman's Pesth-House overture—the work was written for the conservatory at Pesth—is a sumptuous piece of scoring, containing much musicianly work. Volkmann must have written it after hearing "Die Meistersinger."

The next programme will present a new symphonic poem by MacDowell, "Lancelot and Elaine," Gade's C minor symphony, and Schumann's pianoforte concerto. The pianist will be Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1890.

[55]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place on tonight's programme will be assigned to an entirely new work, receiving—after two readings at Weisbaden and Darmstadt—its initial performance. This work is the symphonic poem entitled "Launcelet and Elaine," founded upon the characters as portrayed by Tennyson in those "Idylls of the King," which bear their names, and it comes from the pen of Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who has established himself in America, as he had already done in Germany, as a young man of mark. Highly reputed abroad during his years of study and those of public work subsequent to them for the possession of talent, industry, original views and technical mastery in art, he has shown himself since his return as a writer, and also as a player, of force perhaps more than of fancy, his concertos and lighter pieces—even the brilliant and bold "Hexentanz"—having been more eminent for earnestness, ardor and firmness than for elegance, grace and ductility of style, although these qualities were not lacking by any means. His talent and his disposition alike seemed to lead him to choose first positive themes and to enunciate them with energy and insistance, thus promising that when repose and reflection should bring elaboration, reserve and polish, there would be in his compositions the individuality, robustness and tenacity which are often wanting in the delicate and refined writers who never get beyond nice kapellmeister music. The subject chosen for this new work requires a command of many elements of expression for a truly significant presentation. On the one hand are the passion, the boldness, the martial spirit, the remorse and downfall of that chief of Arthur's knights, and on the other, the patience, the gentleness, the forbearance, the long-suffering, the trust and the tenderly pathetic end of the obscure and holy maiden—false love against true, warfare against peace, public defeat against unnoticed triumph, the laurel plucked down from lofty living temples and a crown of light laid upon the lowly dead brow. Indeed the choice of a subject so rich in sharp and splendid contrast seems to offer so vast a range for thought and treatment that no possible single episodes could fitly imply its many-sidedness and its material and spiritual antitheses. Mr. MacDowell's poem, however, is felicitous and beautiful, knit up with strength and enlightened with fine imagination. The scheme of it may be hastily sketched thus: A calm introduction, rather legendary (if the word may be so used) than idyllic, in which appears a dignified but warm theme which indicates the presence of the queen in the story; then comes a brief decisive figure which means Launcelot; next comes a foreshadowing of the great tournament scene, followed by the Elaine figure, properly here placed, as it was on his journey that the knight brought her fate to the loving girl; a brilliant, bold and tumultuous battle-piece, through which is heard and felt the Launcelot figure until the end, which comes brokenly and suits into despondent gloom; thence to the finale the two chief themes are interwoven, except for a moment when the queen subject is stormily thrown across them; then soft, sepulchral tones are heard, with lamentable suggestions of bells and chants, the Launcelot theme softens and the whole finishes softly and lingeringly with what might almost be called an apotheosis of the Elaine melody. The effect left by yesterday's hearing was delightful and the general verdict was flattering; the larger scenes show the composer's more urgent characteristics, while opposed to them are plaintive and sensitive moods at which Mr. MacDowell's other works have only hinted; the technical treatment is clear and free, and the temptation to do outrè things, to bring in musical instruments, or even the harp, has been nobly resisted The soloist of tonight will be Mrs. Steiniger-Clark, who has been too long absent from these concerts; her selection is Schumann's piano forte concerto, which she read admirably at yesterday's rehearsal. It is the well known principle of this artist that grace and beauty are the first things to seek in music, and her exposition of the concerto accorded with this principle. The phrase was always lucidly set forth and the technique was subordinated to it, so that what was sometimes lost from warmth and force was compensated for by purity, simplicity and self-abnegation. It was a worthy presentment in spirit and unquestionably apt and evident in form. The first symphony of Gade will complete the programme.

The concert of this day fortnight will have for its novelty Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, for its soloist, Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing a "Euryanthe" air and songs by Dvorák; the overture will be Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and the symphony, Schuman's in E-flat, commonly called the "Rhenish."

Clipping from Times
Philadelphia Pa
Date 1/12/89

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch Makes an Impression on His First Appearance.

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which attracted a fashionable audience to the Academy of Music last night, would have been an important event in any case and was rendered doubly interesting by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Nikisch, whom Mr. Higginson has brought from Leipsic to take the direction of his superb organization. The new conductor was very cordially received upon his entrance and very quickly established himself in the sympathy and favor of the audience. He is a young man, of slight build, with the alert manner of a Frenchman, and he conducts as a Frenchman might, standing erect upon a high platform, without a desk or book, and directing his musicians with a singularly expressive but always unobtrusive motion of his arms alone. The manner is of interest, because it was at once apparent that Mr. Nikisch had brought to his work the influence of a potent individuality.

Mr. Gericke had left the orchestra unexcelled in completeness of discipline, in purity and exactness of execution. His successor has breathed into it the breath of life, of fervent feeling and poetic imagination, and never before has this magnificent orchestra been heard with so brilliant effect. Mr. Nikisch has slighted nothing in technical delicacy, but he is not afraid for his orchestra to be heard. He believes in climaxes, and under his inspiring leadership the band displayed a splendid sonority and power that it hitherto has lacked.

Just what Mr. Nikisch will do with Beethoven and the classics it is impossible to judge, but his rendering of the "Euryanthe" overture and of Liszt's "Preludes," to which he imparted a meaning seldom expressed, was as full of poetry as of musical knowledge, and the Schuman symphony in D minor, which closed the concert, was played with many original and curious readings that nevertheless did not impair a large and noble ensemble. These three compositions really made up the programme, for the piano concerto of Litolf, though long, is not interesting, and while Mrs. Zeisler played it well, she did not give sufficient distinction to the solo part to make the selection worth while.

We shall have to know Mr. Nikisch better before we can estimate his place as a conductor, but there can be no question of his artistic quality or of the personal interest which he excited and which will heighten the pleasure with which all music lovers will look forward to the succeeding concerts of this admirable orchestra.

TRAVELLER.

JANUARY 7.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Only lack of space prevents due recognition of the admirable concert with which the Adamouski Quartet ended its second season. Last night the quartet played in Steinert Hall Haydn's quartet in D (Peters No. 6) and Grieg's romantic and characteristic G minor quartet, not heard here in its entirety for several years. Between the two instrumental pieces Mr. W. J. Winch sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" with that earnestness of spirit and beauty of sentiment which are his in such a marked degree. The performance of the difficult Grieg quartet, so changeful of mood, indicated a great deal of rehearsing; it was not only an admirable performance technically considered, but the players were heartily in sympathy with its ardent spirit. The work, though unequal, is virile and eloquent. The quartet closes its second season in excellent shape; the coming of Mr. Adamowski's brother to take the position of violoncellist was accomplished without detriment to the ensemble, while it furnished the town with another excellent chamber player.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. Mr. W. J. Winch will be the soloist. The following is the interesting programme: Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.) Haydn; Aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; songs, with piano, Dvorák; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold at the door on the evening of the concert.

The Boston Singers' public concert in Music Hall last night was attended by a fair-sized audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. Haydn's symphony in G (No. 13 B and H) was rendered by the orchestra in a graceful manner, yet with much exactness. Mr. W. J. Winch, the soloist of the evening, sung an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe," and several songs by Dvorak, which were well received. In the latter numbers, the accompanist was Mr. Nikisch himself. Perhaps the best number of the evening, however, was the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The Independent

251 Broadway, opp. City Hall Park.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 26th, 1889.

THE first visit to New York this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was emphatically the event of last week; and it received the attention it deserved. A stormy night made no conspicuous difference in the size of the audience in Steinway Hall. The character of that audience was of the special sort, the called and chosen of the musical public here, professional or amateur, who rightly regard these entertainments as among the very best things, not to say the best in the way of absolute music the winter brings. The particular fact that a large majority of those present must have been curious to derive its own impression and make up its own mind as to the newly installed conductor, Mr. Arthur Gericke—his outward man and havior and what traits in his leadership would be individualized on such a public occasion, added a lively element of curiosity; and a capital program for enjoyment in itself, or for comparisons, made the sum of special interests complete. To discuss in detail of criticism the performance of the Boston orchestra during the four numbers of the program — Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms's Violin Concerto in B Minor, Opus 77, Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and the D Minor Symphony of Schumann, would be merely to repeat phrases and once more write down compliments that are no longer novel from a New York source and even more deserved. It needed only half the course of the Weber Overture, and more particularly, the first movement of Schumann's familiar symphony, to make it evident that if the Bostonians were manifestly the best orchestra in America before now, they are even more wonderful to-day; and that the Mr. Nikisch is all that such an organization demands and a successor to Mr. Gericke admirably qualified to carry out the work committed to him exactly on the noble lines on which it has progressed in the recent past. It is not agreeable to our own amour-propre in New York to confess the emphatic inferiority of our best orchestral performances if compared with these guests who teach us the fact modestly but convincingly every time they play a new or an old score for us; to say that the Philharmonic, much less to say the Symphony Society, or Mr. Seidl's, or Mr. Van der Stucken's, or any other vocal leader's efforts have so far failed to give us anything quite so precise, so sympathetic, so solid, such a balance of tone and attention to shading in every measure of a symphony or overture, so conscientious as that realized in the case of the Bostonians. In their performance it would seem that each man is, first of all, a master of his instrument; and, second, that to regard the value of every mark of expression on a page of music has become what Mr. Mivart calls "a matter of mechanical conscientiousness." In hearing such an orchestra one realizes that for a body of eighty musicians to play like one man, and that man a careful and perfect artist need not be so much of an ideal as it generally remains. Mr. Nikisch's reception was a part of the cordiality and enthusiasm of the evening. Smaller in physique than Mr. Gericke he has, nevertheless, a presence and a dignity of bearing that makes his short stature and slight build not to his disadvantage. He conducts with almost as little demonstration as Mr. Gericke, seldom so much as stretching his arm at full length, adhering a good deal to the traditions of a time-beater's methods, to which more than one zealous exponent of muscular leadership herein might do well to revert. He is said to prefer to lead without a score before him; and all except the Brahms Concerto he so directed the other evening. In regard to this last work it would seem that nobody, however out of sympathy with Brahms and his inspirations and treatment of them, could fail to recognize in it a perfect mine of exquisite melody and the loveliest harmonic and instrumental effects—and that in its first movement alone was latent enough musical material to furnish forth a symphony for some of the composer's immediate contemporaries, who are like foothills beside a mountain compared with him. Arbitrary and unmistakable as are his mannerisms, his changes of accent, time and key at his own sweet will, there is a fund of invention in such a piece of musical thought and writing that is marvelous and that atones for works of less originality and expressiveness. The last movement suggests in its theme the Hungarian polka motif used by Bruch in his Violin Concerto, but otherwise is on a par with its predecessors. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist in the concerto and played with great refinement. Still a young man, Mr. Kneisel is a superior artist, and it is easy to believe that with more time for development he would become more widely recognized as such among the many good violinists now in the country.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1890.

Twelfth Symphony Concert. Mr. Adamowski, Soloist.

The programme of the 12th symphony concert was:

A. Borodin.	Symphony No. 1, in E flat. Adagio; allegro.—Scherzo.—Andante.—Allegro molto vico. (First time in America.)
Saint-Saens.	Concerto for violin, in B minor, No. 3, op. 61. Allegro non troppo.—Andante quasi allegretto.—Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo. (First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.	Festival overture, in F, op. 50. (First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the soloist.

From an attitude almost partisan towards familiar German music Mr. Nikisch turns with a bound and startles his hearers with a programme containing only novelties, the chiefest of which is from an entirely new source. It is a hazardous undertaking to place in juxtaposition only novelties. Moreover there is a large class of regular Symphony-goers who perfer the old things; consequently such a programme as Mr. Nikisch provided on Saturday invited a fusilade of quiet criticism; for whereas the conservatives might be coaxed into liking a new work were it skilfully placed between old friends, they are shy of three such, and go to their performance just a bit out of mood, while the progressive element who want novelties are epicurean in their habits, and consider as important the proper balance of things new and old at the feast to which they are bidden. So much on general principles.

Now to the case in point. The three pieces composing Saturday's programme were in such good contrast as to matter and style, and moreover were so brief as to furnish only the slightest defence of the general principles laid down in the preceding paragraph. Borodin is a name new to Boston. He is not well known to amateurs anywhere save in Russia, where he taught chemistry, and finally was won to music. The symphony—one of two in the catalogue of this composer—is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. Nikisch's preference is to be commended, for although the symphony is crude in spots, uneasily and perhaps inelegantly written as are the fundamental string portions, the composer justifies his originality by interesting invention, knows what a good theme is, and is fertile in fancy and imagination. It is easy enough to find suggestions of other composers, but it does not seem to us that Borodin is a conscious plagiarist. The somewhat extended first movement, though unequal and whimsical in form, has force, and in the instrumentation is splendidly barbaric; the finale has an element of humor in the interchange of phrases from top to bottom of the orchestra, is ingeniously scored and thematically sturdy. But the gem of the work is the fascinating scherzo, as brittle and dainty a piece of scoring, with an effective color contrast in the trio, as one often hears. The slow movement is not without sentiment, the first theme is good and well treated; both this movement and the scherzo betray an enviable ability to write for the wood-wind. The work was read with every regard for the composer's meaning, and as it is as changeful of mood as a Bar Harbor maiden, and difficult, as is said maiden, its performance was a real triumph for the orchestra; the scherzo was a remarkable expression of perfect technique. The symphony was enjoyed by the audience, and Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for presenting it.

The violin concerto has little that is characteristic of its composer. It is a graceful composition, melodic, but not remarkable. Though not extravagantly virtuosic, in the solo portions, the orchestra is subordinate from first to last. Some of the themes, notably the subject of the andante and the second motif of the first movement, are very lovely. In the treatment there are occasional touches in the accompaniment which arrest the attention, but generally the scoring is subjective. Mr. Adamowski's performance was beautifully sympathetic and technically neat; it seemed to us an advance over his admirable playing of the Moszkowski concerto last season.

Mr. Volkman's Pesth-House overture—the work was written for the conservatory at Pesth—is a sumptuous piece of scoring, containing much musicianly work. Volkmann must have written it after hearing "Die Meistersinger."

The next programme will present a new symphonic poem by MacDowell, "Lancelot and Elaine," Gade's C minor symphony, and Schumann's pianoforte concerto. The pianist will be Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1890.

[55]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place on tonight's programme will be assigned to an entirely new work, receiving—after two readings at Weisbaden and Darmstadt—its initial performance. This work is the symphonic poem entitled "Launcelot and Elaine," founded upon the characters as portrayed by Tennyson in those "Idylls of the King," which bear their names, and it comes from the pen of Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who has established himself in America, as he had already done in Germany, as a young man of mark. Highly reputed abroad during his years of study and those of public work subsequent to them for the possession of talent, industry, original views and technical mastery in art, he has shown himself since his return as a writer, and also as a player, of force perhaps more than of fancy, his concertos and lighter pieces—even the brilliant and bold "Hexentanz"—having been more eminent for earnestness, ardor and firmness than for elegance, grace and ductility of style, although these qualities were not lacking by any means. His talent and his disposition alike seemed to lead him to choose first positive themes and to enunciate them with energy and insistance, thus promising that when repose and reflection should bring elaboration, reserve and polish, there would be in his compositions the individuality, robustness and tenacity which are often wanting in the delicate and refined writers who never get beyond nice kapellmeister music. The subject chosen for this new work requires a command of many elements of expression for a truly significant presentation. On the one hand are the passion, the boldness, the martial spirit, the remorse and downfall of that chief of Arthur's knights, and on the other, the patience, the gentleness, the forbearance, the long-suffering, the trust and the tenderly pathetic end of the obscure and holy maiden—false love against true, warfare against peace, public defeat against unnoticed triumph, the laurel plucked down from lofty living temples and a crown of light laid upon the lowly dead brow. Indeed the choice of a subject so rich in sharp and splendid contrast seems to offer so vast a range for thought and treatment that no possible single episodes could fitly imply its many-sidedness and its material and spiritual antitheses. Mr. MacDowell's poem, however, is felicitous and beautiful, knit up with strength and enlightened with fine imagination. The scheme of it may be hastily sketched thus: A calm introduction, rather legendary (if the word may be so used) than idyllic, in which appears a dignified but warm theme which indicates the presence of the queen in the story; then comes a brief decisive figure which means Launcelot; next comes a foreshadowing of the great tournament scene, followed by the Elaine figure, properly here placed, as it was on his journey that the knight brought her fate to the loving girl; a brilliant, bold and tumultuous battle-piece, through which is heard and felt the Launcelot figure until the end, which comes brokenly and suits into despondent gloom; thence to the finale the two chief themes are interwoven, except for a moment when the queen subject is stormily thrown across them; then soft, sepulchral tones are heard, with lamentable suggestions of bells and chants, the Launcelot theme softens and the whole finishes softly and lingeringly with what might almost be called an apotheosis of the Elaine melody. The effect left by yesterday's hearing was delightful and the general verdict was flattering; the larger scenes show the composer's more urgent characteristics, while opposed to them are plaintive and sensitive moods at which Mr. MacDowell's other works have only hinted; the technical treatment is clear and free, and the temptation to do outrè things, to bring in musical instruments, or even the harp, has been nobly resisted. The soloist of tonight will be Mrs. Steiniger-Clark, who has been too long absent from these concerts; her selection is Schumann's piano forte concerto, which she read admirably at yesterday's rehearsal. It is the well known principle of this artist that grace and beauty are the first things to seek in music, and her exposition of the concerto accorded with this principle. The phrase was always lucidly set forth and the technique was subordinated to it, so that what was sometimes lost from warmth and force was compensated for by purity, simplicity and self-abnegation. It was a worthy presentment in spirit and unquestionably apt and evident in form. The first symphony of Gade will complete the programme.

The concert of this day fortnight will have for its novelty Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, for its soloist, Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing a "Euryanthe" air and songs by Dvorák; the overture will be Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and the symphony, Schuman's in E-flat, commonly called the "Rhenish."

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in G, No. 13. (B. & H.) Adagio; Allegro.—Largo.— Minuet (Allegretto).—Allegretto con spirito.
WEBER.	ARIA. "Euryanthe."
BRAHMS.	VARIATIONS on a THEME by HAYDN.
DVOŘÁK.	SONGS WITH PIANO. a) "MEIN LIED ERTONT." b) "EI WIE MEIN TRIANGEL." c) "RINGS IST DER WALD." d) "ALS DIE ALTE MUTTER."
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Sakuntala."

SOLOIST:

MR. W. J. WINCH.

The Pianoforte used is a Steinway.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch for the Symphony concert last evening in Music hall may be said to have exactly its proper place in the present series of programmes, and in this respect at least was well selected.

The new "symphonic poem" by MacDowell, based upon Tennyson's "Elaine," is a work that is in every way creditable to the composer's skill. His knowledge of harmony, his mastery of orchestration and, in brief, his artistic ingenuity, are shown in a highly favorable light. All such traits, while praiseworthy, are merely technical in their relation to the general merit of Mr. MacDowell's work. His "poem" is otherwise too labored and uninspired to admit of its being denominated an important work. In brief, the composer has written in a very skilful manner and at no inconsiderable length, but with no such effects as might be indicative of his possession of genius.

Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte followed the "symphonic poem," and with Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark as soloist. The purity of the artist's execution, and the general finish and refinement of her performance were impressive. In other respects her playing was not especially effective, and failed to bear a just relation to the emotional virility of Schumann's noble music. Mrs. Clark, however, is an intensely sincere and accomplished artiste and the justice of her appearance in so important a concert as that of last evening must have at least proved satisfactory to any musician.

The concert ended with Gade's symphony in C minor. Gade's music was more generally known here in the well-remembered concert days of the Harvard Musical association than it is now. The composer does not rank with the brilliant geniuses of the age, but the sincerity, chasteness and artistic integrity of his music invariably command a respectful hearing. He is also a musician of marked individuality; yet his C minor symphony is a work that is very characteristic of his famously sombre moods. This of itself were enough to prevent it from being rated as a really great symphony.

The orchestra throughout the concert played quite as usual, the readings of Conductor Nikisch being quite generally in accordance with the incitations of the score. That the orchestra was not at its best is partly due to absence of Mr. Reiter and his incomparably good horn playing.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1890.

Twelfth Boston Symphony Concert.

THREE Novelties. First there was the Symphony in E-flat, No. 1, by Borodine of St. Petersburg, a work never but once performed in Germany, and then under Nikisch's direction. The opening Adagio and Allegro are followed, not by the Andante, but by the Scherzo,—swift, beautiful, quaint. Then comes the Andante, scored only for strings; wood-wind (including English horn), and horns; and finally the Allegro molto vivo. The Symphony was heard for the first time in America, and roused profound interest by its sharp contrasts and wide suggestions.

The Third Violin Concerto, in B-minor, op. 61, by Saint-Saens, was heard for the first time in our city, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist, drawing out, in the Allegro, notes of fine-spun glass. This Concerto is dedicated to Sarasate, who might well recognize fraternity in Adamowski's good work. The last movement, Andante quasi allegretto is honey-laden. The last movement Molto moderata e maestoso, allegro non troppo, roused decided enthusiasm. Of what does that recurrent theme remind you? Is it "Draw the sword Scotland"?

Volkmann's Festival Overture in F, op. 50, composed for the 25th anniversary of his Conservatory at Pesth, is rich in full orchestral work, majestic and broad, and was never played before at these concerts. J. H. W.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Thursday, January 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The First Appearance of Herr Nikisch in New York City—The Metropolitan Newspapers Praise Him Highly—A Brilliant Young Conductor.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at theHyperion Theater next Monday evening. At the last concert the principal feature was the first appearance of Herr Nikisch and the real excellence of the concert was for the time overlooked in the general admiration of the new conductor. Since the concert Herr Nikisch had made his debut before a metropolitan audience and all the newspapers of New York city, with one or two exceptions, have accorded him the highest praise.

The Tribune published the following: "Under Mr. Nikisch's direction it may safely be said that the technical finish of the orchestra's playing is not brought so constantly and impressively to the attention of the listeners as formerly, but in its place we have something infinitely better—a robust tone and a vitality of proclamation which sacrifices nothing of the composer's intended eloquence to the love of placidity and undisturbed euphony. Mr. Nikisch evidently believes that the breath which the blowers of brass breathe into their instruments should be the breath of life, and when the music stands in need of a sonorous forte he brings it out. Fortunately he is gifted with a beautiful sense of symmetry and balance of tone, and never permits the outbursts of sound to obscure the musical idea. In his development of climaxes he proceeds with the most refined care, and with a deliberation which is rare among men who cherish theories like his concerning the privilege of conductors in reading the works of composers. He never precipitates a climax by anticipation, but builds it up steadily and strongly, and when the supreme moment is at hand, strikes like a thunderbolt."

The Herald contained the following characteristic criticism: "Herr Nikisch is a young and handsome fellow who takes his task with extreme seriousness. In manner he resembles Bulow as a conductor. He is not content with beating time; he literally leads his orchestra. He is the master musician, playing upon a vast instrument made up of many players. This, of course, is the highest function of the ideal leader. Herr Nikisch has nothing of the metronome in him. His mood changes with every bar of the music. It will naturally be asked. How does the Boston orchestra's work under Herr Nikisch compare with its work under his predecessor, Herr Gericke? The difference was felt in the first dozen bars of the "Euryanthe" overture, and steadily accented during the evening. The famous band, which Boston owes to the generosity of Mr. Higginson, is not so wonderful an instrument as it was, but it is handled with greater freedom. Whether upon the whole there is gain or loss depends upon taste. To leave comparison aside, last night's concert was a beautiful one, and was applauded with the heartiness it deserved. The band played throughout, notably in the symphony, with splendid vigor and musical spirit, and at the close of the concert Herr Nikisch received quite an ovation."

The Sun thus commended both the orchestra and its leader: "It is no disparagement to our own excellent orchestral organizations to say that the annual visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as important in their line as any entertainments that occur in this city, not excepting the notable concerts of the Philharmonic Society. We have no instrumental body which is kept at work throughout the season every week under the guidance of one man, and our bands cannot be expected to achieve those high results which are to be reached only through constant and rigorous drill. The 'Tristan' Vorspiel was read nobly. The announcement of the opening motive was pregnant with dramatic power, the crescendo in the 'cello phrase being most effective. The tremendous climax, one of the mightiest utterances of all music, was given with great breadth and dignity, and with a magnificently expressive balance of the interwoven voice parts. But the conductor's finest achievement was in the symphony. It was played in a marvelously fine manner. The performance of it showed that Mr. Nikisch could make an orchestra not only sing, but also declaim, a feature which was equally conspicuous in the cantabile passage of the overture. Under this leader the orchestra does not, it is true, achieve such exquisite polish as it did under Mr. Gericke, but it reveals something far better—a grand sweep of power and a masterly dramatic force. That Mr. Nikisch was successful last night is beyond a question, and New York has almost as much reason to be thankful for his presence in America as Boston ought to have."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890.

The Symphony—New Work By Mr. MacDowell—Mme. Clark as Soloist.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge for the programme that Mr. Nikisch prepared for the 13th symphony concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, that whatsoever it may have lacked in importance was almost wholly reconciled by the beauty of proportion, and excellent adjustment of its very enjoyable parts. The chief feature of interest was a "symphonic poem" composed by E. A. MacDowell In calling his work a "symphonic poem"—based as it is upon the suggestions of Tennyson's "Elaine"—Mr. MacDowell would seem to have followed in the wake of Liszt and other musicians of the "higher development" school. With what literary justification, however, the term symphonic poem has been used in this connection is by no means clear. True the word poetry has a very wide latitude of meaning, yet it may be seriously questioned whether any such mixed up metaphor as the one in question did not originate as a mere catch-phrase. Be this as it may, it is none the less clear that, while the work can be favorably considered from almost any other standpoint than that of its pretensions, it should be acknowledged for the composer that not even the most analytical scholarship of any musician can be expected to enter the domain of poetry as the actual poets think and feel in it. It is for this reason possibly that one finds in his "poem" that the composer has simply been mastered by impressions and that these impressions are by no means intuitive but susceptible, by no means logical but reflective, and not so invariably actual as visionary. Extrinsically considered much of Mr. MacDowell's work is admirable. There is a noticeable absence of an incoherent and overcrowded score, although it cannot be said for his themes themselves that they are either so clearly laid down or so logically treated as one might wish. Just as the interest in almost any one of the motives seems about to grow to a fine climax, there is encountered the aggravating disappointment of a delightful antecedent motive being followed by a wholly illogical consequent.

In other respects the work is exceedingly well made. It mainly consists of a kaleidoscopic arrangement of charming harmonies, and equally charming progressions and resolutions, which appear to have originated the very themes themselves, and not to have been influenced by them. Ergo the thematic development by itself considered is often obscure and seldom either musical or pleasing. In brief, Mr. Mac Dowell's "symphonic poem" is not without many beauties, but these are for the most part artificial; otherwise there are transient moments of fineness and even grandeur, yet with no such fancy, exuberant, rich, spontaneous and flowing as the exigency of so pretentious a work would seem to demand. The work was as well received as the most optimistic admirer of the composer could wish, and joining in the applause as ardently as any in the audience were some of the best known artists and amateurs.

The soloist for Schumann's A minor pianoforte concerto was Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark. The artist played the work with all that purity of technique and artistic refinement for which she is justly noted, yet the performance throughout was so delicately Chopinesque as to seem quite inconsistent with the breadth and virility of Schumann's noble themes. The concert ended with Gade's admirable symphony in C minor. The orchestra played exceptionally well. C. L. CAPEN.

[56]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in G, No. 13. (B. & H.) Adagio; Allegro.—Largo.— Minuet (Allegretto).—Allegretto con spirito.
WEBER.	ARIA. "Euryanthe."
BRAHMS.	VARIATIONS on a THEME by HAYDN.
DVOŘÁK.	SONGS WITH PIANO. a) "MEIN LIED ERTONT." b) "EI WIE MEIN TRIANGEL." c) "RINGS IST DER WALD." d) "ALS DIE ALTE MUTTER."
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Sakuntala."

SOLOIST:

MR. W. J. WINCH.

The Pianoforte used is a Steinway.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch for the Symphony concert last evening in Music hall may be said to have exactly its proper place in the present series of programmes, and in this respect at least was well selected.

The new "symphonic poem" by MacDowell, based upon Tennyson's "Elaine," is a work that is in every way creditable to the composer's skill. His knowledge of harmony, his mastery of orchestration and, in brief, his artistic ingenuity, are shown in a highly favorable light. All such traits, while praiseworthy, are merely technical in their relation to the general merit of Mr. MacDowell's work. His "poem" is otherwise too labored and uninspired to admit of its being denominated an important work. In brief, the composer has written in a very skilful manner and at no inconsiderable length, but with no such effects as might be indicative of his possession of genius.

Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte followed the "symphonic poem," and with Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark as soloist. The purity of the artist's execution, and the general finish and refinement of her performance were impressive. In other respects her playing was not especially effective, and failed to bear a just relation to the emotional virility of Schumann's noble music. Mrs. Clark, however, is an intensely sincere and accomplished artiste and the justice of her appearance in so important a concert as that of last evening must have at least proved satisfactory to any musician.

The concert ended with Gade's symphony in C minor. Gade's music was more generally known here in the well-remembered concert days of the Harvard Musical association than it is now. The composer does not rank with the brilliant geniuses of the age, but the sincerity, chasteness and artistic integrity of his music invariably command a respectful hearing. He is also a musician of marked individuality; yet his C minor symphony is a work that is very characteristic of his famously sombre moods. This of itself were enough to prevent it from being rated as a really great symphony.

The orchestra throughout the concert played quite as usual, the readings of Conductor Nikisch being quite generally in accordance with the incitations of the score. That the orchestra was not at its best is partly due to absence of Mr. Reiter and his incomparably good horn playing.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1890.

Twelfth Boston Symphony Concert.

THREE Novelties. First there was the Symphony in E-flat, No. 1, by Borodine of St. Petersburg, a work never but once performed in Germany, and then under Nikisch's direction. The opening Adagio and Allegro are followed, not by the Andante, but by the Scherzo,—swift, beautiful, quaint. Then comes the Andante, scored only for strings; wood-wind (including English horn), and horns; and finally the Allegro molto vivo. The Symphony was heard for the first time in America, and roused profound interest by its sharp contrasts and wide suggestions.

The Third Violin Concerto, in B-minor, op. 61, by Saint-Saens, was heard for the first time in our city, and Timothee Adamowski was the soloist, drawing out, in the Allegro, notes of fine-spun glass. This Concerto is dedicated to Sarasate, who might well recognize fraternity in Adamowski's good work. The last movement, Andante quasi allegretto is honey-laden. The last movement Molto moderata e maestoso, allegro non troppo, roused decided enthusiasm. Of what does that recurrent theme remind you? Is it "Draw the sword Scotland"?

Volkmann's Festival Overture in F, op. 50, composed for the 25th anniversary of his Conservatory at Pesth, is rich in full orchestral work, majestic and broad, and was never played before at these concerts. J. H. W.

Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Thursday, January 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The First Appearance of Herr Nikisch in New York City—The Metropolitan Newspapers Praise Him Highly—A Brilliant Young Conductor.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at the Hyperion Theater next Monday evening. At the last concert the principal feature was the first appearance of Herr Nikisch and the real excellence of the concert was for the time overlooked in the general admiration of the new conducter. Since the concert Herr Nikisch had made his debut before a metropolitan audience and all the newspapers of New York city, with one or two exceptions, have accorded him the highest praise.

The Tribune published the following: "Under Mr. Nikisch's direction it may safely be said that the technical finish of the orchestra's playing is not brought so constantly and impressively to the attention of the listeners as formerly, but in its place we have something infinitely better—a robust tone and a vitality of proclamation which sacrifices nothing of the composer's intended eloquence to the love of placidity and undisturbed euphony. Mr. Nikisch evidently believes that the breath which the blowers of brass breathe into their instruments should be the breath of life, and when the music stands in need of a sonorous forte he brings it out. Fortunately he is gifted with a beautiful sense of symmetry and balance of tone, and never permits the outbursts of sound to obscure the musical idea. In his development of climaxes he proceeds with the most refined care, and with a deliberation which is rare among men who cherish theories like his concerning the privilege of conductors in reading the works of composers. He never precipitates a climax by anticipation, but builds it up steadily and strongly, and when the supreme moment is at hand, strikes like a thunderbolt."

The Herald contained the following characteristic criticism: "Herr Nikisch is a young and handsome fellow who takes his task with extreme seriousness. In manner he resembles Bulow as a conductor. He is not content with beating time; he literally leads his orchestra. He is the master musician, playing upon a vast instrument made up of many players. This, of course, is the highest function of the ideal leader. Herr Nikisch has nothing of the metronome in him. His mood changes with every bar of the music. It will naturally be asked. How does the Boston orchestra's work under Herr Nikisch compare with its work under his predecessor, Herr Gericke? The difference was felt in the first dozen bars of the "Euryanthe" overture, and steadily accented during the evening. The famous band, which Boston owes to the generosity of Mr. Higginson, is not so wonderful an instrument as it was, but it is handled with greater freedom. Whether upon the whole there is gain or loss depends upon taste. To leave comparison aside, last night's concert was a beautiful one, and was applauded with the heartiness it deserved. The band played throughout, notably in the symphony, with splendid vigor and musical spirit, and at the close of the concert Herr Nikisch received quite an ovation."

The Sun thus commended both the orchestra and its leader: "It is no disparagement to our own excellent orchestral organizations to say that the annual visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as important in their line as any entertainments that occur in this city, not excepting the notable concerts of the Philharmonic Society. We have no instrumental body which is kept at work throughout the season every week under the guidance of one man, and our bands cannot be expected to achieve those high results which are to be reached only through constant and rigorous drill. The 'Tristan' Vorspiel was read nobly. The announcement of the opening motive was pregnant with dramatic power, the crescendo in the 'cello phrase being most effective. The tremendous climax, one of the mightiest utterances of all music, was given with great breadth and dignity, and with a magnificently expressive balance of the interwoven voice parts. But the conductor's finest achievement was in the symphony. It was played in a marvelously fine manner. The performance of it showed that Mr. Nikisch could make an orchestra not only sing, but also declaim, a feature which was equally conspicuous in the cantabile passage of the overture. Under this leader the orchestra does not, it is true, achieve such exquisite polish as it did under Mr. Gericke, but it reveals something far better—a grand sweep of power and a masterly dramatic force. That Mr. Nikisch was successful last night is beyond a question, and New York has almost as much reason to be thankful for his presence in America as Boston ought to have."

The World's critic evidently does not like Herr Nikisch. The very features which the other newspapers praised most the World most strongly condemned. The following paragraph closed the criticism: "The interest of the evening was of course with the new conductor, whose next number was the prelude to Wagner's 'Tristan and Isolde,' a work which is very familiar to all concert audiences. In this it must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch did only respectably. It was, in fact, scarcely Wagner at all. The overture as rendered by the Bostonians had nothing of the thrilling intensity that Seidl gives to it that carries an audience away with the throbbing woes of two unfortunate lovers. It had nothing of Wagner's genius in it. It was too calm, too studied, too sleepy and without a breath of inspiration. Seidl and Thomas as Wagner conductors rose immeasurably under its last night's rendition. In the symphony, Schumann,s No. 4 in D minor, however, the Boston leader reached a very high point of artistic excellence. In this the orchestra played with most vigorous and artistic feeling. In the strength and powerful sweep of the cadences, it would be difficult to equal, certainly to surpass, this fine performance. Altogether, in exquisite poetry of feeling and delicate beauty, particularly on the strings, Mr. Nikisch does not touch Mr. Thomas, and in the sentimentality and artificiality of his Wagner reading he cannot be mentioned in the same breath with Seidl's overwhelming greatness in the interpretation of Tristan."

Now that Herr Nikisch has been fairly introduced to our music lovers, they will be able to give their undivided attention to the excellent programme selected for the next concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890.

The Symphony—New Work By Mr. MacDowell—Mme. Clark as Soloist.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge for the programme that Mr. Nikisch prepared for the 13th symphony concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, that whatsoever it may have lacked in importance was almost wholly reconciled by the beauty of proportion, and excellent adjustment of its very enjoyable parts. The chief feature of interest was a "symphonic poem" composed by E. A. MacDowell In calling his work a "symphonic poem"—based as it is upon the suggestions of Tennyson's "Elaine"—Mr. MacDowell would seem to have followed in the wake of Liszt and other musicians of the "higher development" school. With what literary justification, however, the term symphonic poem has been used in this connection is by no means clear. True the word poetry has a very wide latitude of meaning, yet it may be seriously questioned whether any such mixed up metaphor as the one in question did not originate as a mere catch-phrase. Be this as it may, it is none the less clear that, while the work can be favorably considered from almost any other standpoint than that of its pretensions, it should be acknowledged for the composer that not even the most analytical scholarship of any musician can be expected to enter the domain of poetry as the actual poets think and feel in it. It is for this reason possibly that one finds in his "poem" that the composer has simply been mastered by impressions and that these impressions are by no means intuitive but susceptible, by no means logical but reflective, and not so invariably actual as visionary. Extrinsically considered much of Mr. MacDowell's work is admirable. There is a noticeable absence of an incoherent and overcrowded score, although it cannot be said for his themes themselves that they are either so clearly laid down or so logically treated as one might wish. Just as the interest in almost any one of the motives seems about to grow to a fine climax, there is encountered the aggravating disappointment of a delightful antecedent motive being followed by a wholly illogical consequent.

In other respects the work is exceedingly well made. It mainly consists of a kaleidoscopic arrangement of charming harmonies, and equally charming progressions and resolutions, which appear to have originated the very themes themselves, and not to have been influenced by them. Ergo the thematic development by itself considered is often obscure and seldom either musical or pleasing. In brief, Mr. Mac Dowell's "symphonic poem" is not without many beauties, but these are for the most part artificial; otherwise there are transient moments of fineness and even grandeur, yet with no such fancy, exuberant, rich, spontaneous and flowing as the exigency of so pretentious a work would seem to demand. The work was as well received as the most optimistic admirer of the composer could wish, and joining in the applause as ardently as any in the audience were some of the best known artists and amateurs.

The soloist for Schumann's A minor pianoforte concerto was Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark. The artist played the work with all that purity of technique and artistic refinement for which she is justly noted, yet the performance throughout was so delicately Chopinesque as to seem quite inconsistent with the breadth and virility of Schumann's noble themes. The concert ended with Gade's admirable symphony in C minor. The orchestra played exceptionally well. C. I. CAPEN.

[57]

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1890

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Borodine.....Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
(First time in America.)
Saint Saens.....
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61
(First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.....Festival Overture, in F, op. 50
(First time at these concerts.)

It is stated in the annotated program of this concert that the "only performance in Germany" of the Symphony in E-flat of Borodine was "at the Lower Rhine Festival of 1883, held at Wiesbaden, when it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch." This statement is not correct. The Symphony was also brought out in Berlin Feb. 11, 1884, by Franz Wüllner at the second concert of his second season. It was superbly played; and it provoked discussion; yet they who were not pleased with the work, admitted its strength and spoke of it respectfully. Nor indeed is it a composition to be idly passed over; to be carelessly dismissed with a jest.

It is safe to say that the originality, flavor, and characteristics of any national school of music can be seen in the folk-songs of the nation; now the greater number of Russian folk-songs handed down from one generation to the next were conceived in the "tonality" of plain song; and so the "tonality" of modern Russian music affects strangely our ears accustomed as they are to the modern major and minor. It is true that plain-song ruled formerly in Germany, Italy and France, and even now in the streets of Paris men and women hawk their wares in pure Gregorian: as, "voila l'plaisir, mesdames, voila l' plaisir!" But the modern tonality predominates generally throughout even the rural districts of these three countries, while in Russia plain-song has almost held its own, although Russian critics deplore the fact that by means of hand-organs and orchestrions and cheap editions of Western music, their people learn Italian and French melodies with "deplorable ease." Now the "tonality" of plain song if sparingly used is effective and beautiful in dramatic music of the present day; as for example Meyerbeer's use of it in "The Prophet" and Gounod's in "King of Thule." Unless it is discreetly employed, if it permeates the whole composition, it results in monotony, and that which at first attracted and charmed, soon repels and wearies. Take again an example, "On the Steppes," a short orchestral piece by Borodine, a composition extremely effective chiefly on account of its old tonality and singular instrumentation; the piece is not so long that the ear becomes accustomed to strange impressions and is eated.

The chief characteristics of pure Russian music, the music of Stcherbatcheff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Tschaikowsky and others are then a perhaps inevitable predilection for an old tonality, a consequent tendency toward profound melancholy, a sense of rhythm which at times degenerates into barbaric frenzy uncontrolled by form, a love of the grotesque. If the Russians have been influenced by any one, and have taken ideas from other nations (and in music there is no such word as Protection), they have looked towards France rather than Germany; and the deep and lasting impression made by the appearance of Hector Berlioz in Russia is seen to-day in all music coming from that country.

Now the national characteristics of a musical composition should not so predominate that its pure and cosmopolitan musical beauties take a second place and can not readily be appreciated by the hearers of another and far-removed nation. A musician should not write merely for his own people; he should write for the whole musical world. At the same time a Russian composer has a right to expect that the audience of a foreign country should not capriciously say, "This music differs from that which we have been in the habit of hearing; therefore it is not good and we do not like it. It is Russian, therefore it must be barbarous stuff." He has a right to reply, "It is true I am a Russian; I am necessarily influenced by my temperament, by traditions, by associations. Gogol and Dostoievsky were affected by the conditions under which they wrote, their habit of thought and mode of expression differed from the habit and mode of Fielding or Balzac or Hawthorne; do you therefore deny them a place in literature? Is there nothing in this work of mine except 'local color' or 'national eccentricity?'"

How is it then with this Symphony of Borodine presented to an orthodox Boston audience in Music Hall? Is it possible to judge of it after one hearing? Must not one condemn superficially or praise too suddenly? Is one not too apt to weigh a new work in a self-adjusted balance without stopping to think that this balance may be false? Let us then only put down impressions. And now let it be said that the first movement is most ingenious, curiously scored; at times fascinating in the extreme, particularly in the employment of the wood wind, occasionally almost ugly in the treatment of the strings; abounding in beautiful passages placed side by side with that which seems intentionally grotesque; there are strange and effective passages for the brass;—as a whole, this movement seems too long, and there is an almost painful reiteration of that which is in itself of little value,—as in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés" a trifling infirmity of Stépan is dwelt upon until it becomes a bore. The second movement suggests to some the "Queen Mab" music of Berlioz. The resemblance is not so striking that the word "plagiarism" can be used. On the contrary, both the Scherzo and the Andante, though certain measures may bring the great Frenchman to the mind, are, from many points of view, very original. And the instrumentation is striking and at the same time clear. It is true that Berlioz was fond of the English horn, and that Borodine uses it in this symphony as in other works of his. But are certain passages given by Wagner to divided strings any the less beautiful because in the "Caduta de 'Decemviri" of Alessandro Scarlatti nearly three centuries ago the first violins were divided into four parts. Others object to the "melancholy" nature of the andante just as others demand that the "ending" of all novels and plays should be cheerful. This is such a gay world, life is such a blessed thing, the gaining of enough meat to keep one's body and soul together and of sufficient clothing to cover one's nakedness is such a mere joke to thousands, that melancholy has no place among us; nor should music which gives rise to melancholy be any more encouraged than a lonely moor or the sinking of a ship in midocean.

The last movement of this strange symphony is Schumanesque and remarkable for its rhythmic difficulties. It is the least interesting part of the work. As a whole the composition is undeniably worthy of another hearing; for whether it is the work of a professional or an amateur, it is too strongly and earnestly written to be contemptuously passed by.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski played a new concerto for the violin by Saint Saens. It was written for Sarasate, and it is intentionally a concerto for violin, "with accompaniment of orchestra." It may be here remarked that the accompaniment was coarsely played; so that the exquisite instrumentation lost in effect, and the soloist at times was seen and not heard. Mr. Nikisch from the very start has been unfortunate in the matter of accompaniment, and [illegible] his experience as a theater director should [illegible]. However he accompanies pianist, violinist or singer, the soloist, Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra are at cross purposes. Since this is the rule and not the exception, it is evidently the fault of Mr. Nikisch. The concerto itself abounds in pleasing melodies, and it is a "grateful" composition for a soloist; though it cannot be placed among the best works of Saint Saens. Mr. Adamowski played it with taste, and it is pleasant to observe at his successive performances a steady gain in tone. He was very warmly applauded.

The Volkmann Overture, a pièce d'occasion, if cut down a little, would make a good "theater overture." It is well written and is an eminently respectable composition containing nothing which could offend the most sensitive hearer.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme Saturday evening was of exactly the right length, and of a most interesting character, and it was listened to with the most evident and unqualified attention of the audience. What one expects from a symphony audience is attention, but this can not be obtained if the concerts are too long; in this particular a successful dinner and an interesting concert have great points of similarity. The programme:

Symphonic poem. "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25 (new, first time). E. A. MacDowell
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54.....Schumann
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Gade

The symphonic poem is beyond all doubt a very interesting work, and it conclusively proves that Mr. MacDowell possesses especial gifts for this style of modern composition; at the same time one cannot but hope that certain all too evident shortcomings in the score of this work will be avoided in future. The most noticeable of these is the incessant and prominent use of the horns, which gives a cloying and monotonous coloring to the orchestration. This peculiar feature of the instrumentation, as well as one or two familiar rhythms (notably at the beginning of the so-called "Tournament music," piu allegro e con fuoco), show very plainly that Mr. MacDowell's admiration for his old master, Joachim Raff, sometimes leads him to unconscious imitation. Mr. Wilson in the analytical programme prints a long description of what the work is intended to mean, and as he doubtless obtained this from the composer himself, it must be accepted as final. At the same time it must be observed that although this is a very beautiful "symphonic poem," perhaps the most beautiful ever written by an American, it is difficult to see the connection between the music itself and the "programme."

The work opens with a simple but extremely effective bit of writing for strings alone in D minor, followed by striking horn and trumpet calls; a rush of the strings, a heavy chord and then a pause. The first passage is repeated in the wood, taken up by the strings, which gradually descend to a subdued tremolo, and a horn announces the Lancelot theme in a fragmentary manner, interrupted by a harsh note of warning on the low oboe. This passage is extremely effective, and immediately afterwards the whole Lancelot theme is played on three horns, accompanied by the basses and 'cellos pizzicato. The theme is then repeated by the strings with the whole orchestra, excepting the heavy brass. By this time the attention of the whole audience was riveted on the music, and nearly everyone seemed to feel the undoubted power of the composition. The time changes to an easy treble rhythm, a strong passage for the whole orchestra with high strings is gracefully repeated by the wood-wind—bassoons—and the four horns again appear by way of modulation to the Elaine theme on the oboe in F major. It is original and taking, and it is like a slap in the face to find it immediately followed by an undeniably vulgar passage where the ubiquitous four horns and the violas perform a sort of slow waltz to the accompaniment of the other strings in trills and pizzicato to arpeggios. This passage is an unfortunate but very prominent blemish in this otherwise beautiful work. The violas hint at the tournament theme, which is finally reached through a strong and splendid piece of writing for all the brass. The music is now vigorous, and often very skilfully and originally scored. The prancing horses, eager fighters and excited onlookers are all tolerably well depicted in the stirring tones, and this is one of the most successful parts of the work. The Elaine and Lancelot themes appear again, and also the objectionable "waltz tune"—and, as the programme informs us, "Lancelot and Elaine separate." The theme of the introduction returns again, and is immediately followed by the Lancelot theme in the original key, but now to the wood and strings. The "waltz tune," now strong and dignified, is played boldly on the two trumpets, in unison with an original and tremendously effective accompaniment by the strings. The programme volunteers the information that this represents the interview between Lancelot and the Queen; whatever it means it is a superb piece of orchestral writing. From here on to the end the different themes appear in fragmentary forms. There is a feeling of constant diminuendo, and the music dies away in quiet peace.

This description is unfortunately wholly inadequate to give a proper idea of the very profound impression which two hearings of this work made. It seems just, however, to say that the second hearing not only increased the pleasure which the work gave, but also accentuated what have already been mentioned as its obvious faults. It will be seen that these seem to be chiefly in the manner of expression, and not in the subject matter itself. If Mr. MacDowell would follow the great modern instrumentalists as closely in their method of using the strings as he has in their manner of writing for brass, his score would be improved, if possible, a hundred per cent. At all events, it is undoubtedly one of the most important and beautiful works ever produced by a fellow-countryman, and it is to be hoped that Mr. MacDowell has many more as good or better works going through the familiar mellowing process in the drawers of his writing desk, but it will be a favor to the public if he does not leave them there too long. The work was nothing short of superbly played, and it was long and loudly applauded.

Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark played the Schumann concerto in an inadequate and inartistic manner. It is impossible to hear her light touch in Music Hall, and she did not appear to at all understand this beautiful and noble work. The Gade symphony was magnificently played. It is impossible to believe that it could be better performed. The airy structure of the scherzo was most daintily interpreted, and the vigorous finale was grandly given. There will be no concert next week, as the orchestra does not return until Sunday.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 12, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mme. Anna

The programme given at last evening's symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was greatly enjoyed by the large audience in attendance, and the works presented, as well as their performance, richly merited the applause given by those attending. The novelty of the three compositions performed was Mr. E. A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25, which had its first hearing in this country on this occasion. It belongs to the more recent period of this composer, having been written only three years ago at Wiesbaden, where it was first produced. The subject of Tennyson's "Idyll" lends itself to musical treatment admirably under the hand of such a musician as Mr. MacDowell has shown himself to be, and the opportunities afforded for sharp contrasts and effective episodes have been used with consummate skill in this composition. Mr. MacDowell's poem tells the story of Tennyson's characters in a clear and definite style, the leading themes being eminently in keeping with the scenes and ideas portrayed, and all these are elaborated and worked out with admirable skill. The motifs used as descriptive of King Arthur's court, the tournament, the themes given to depict the two characters of Lancelot and Elaine, and the strong dramatic music of the work, all show the stamp of genius, and bear the mark of the born musician. The charming individuality of the composer is shown throughout the poem, and the work is a new evidence of the largeness and breadth of his musical nature. The value of the composition was instantly realized by the audience, and the performance given it under Mr. Nickish's baton, brought out all its beauties in bold relief. The composer and the conductor were alike honored by the applause following the conclusion of the work. The appearance of Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark as the solo pianist in Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, op. 54, was the second event of the evening, and this talented and conscientious player, had a very cordial reception from the audience. Her performance in the concerto was characterized by the same merits that she has shown in earlier appearances here, and she was rewarded with a very generous expression of the approval of her hearers. The symphony by Gade, No. 1, in C minor ended the evening's programme, and the performance of this most enjoyable work marked the highest point of success attained by Mr. Nikisch since his arrival in this country. The scherzo was given in the daintiest fashion, and the graceful third movement was played in the most charming fashion. The tuneful characteristic of the entire symphony, its remarkably rich tone colorings and all its wealth of musical ideas were finely brought out in this reading, and the concert, as a whole, left a very pleasant impression. The orchestra will be away during the coming week, and the next concert will occur on the 24th inst.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch has begun the last half of the series of concerts with a programme that proved to be as successful as any that he has given during the season. Not only were the selections novelties, to some extent—at all events they were not familiar—but they had in them the merit of giving pleasure to the audience. There were many substitutes for familiar faces in the seats of the hall, and those who are not regular attendants heard a concert which aroused them to much enthusiasm. Nothing since the famous three-symphony concert has shown the wonderful playing of the orchestra and the ability of Mr. Nikisch as a director more than the concert of Saturday evening.

Two numbers only had been assigned to the orchestra—the symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine," by the young American composer, MacDowell, and Gade's Symphony in C minor. The poem is the latest work of the composer that has been published, and it was its first performance here. The composition abounds in lively effects for the wood-wind particularly, and the several themes or motifs are heard conspicuously in different movements, while through it all is a development of harmony and an absorption on the part of the composer in the idea of the poem on which it is founded. It was rendered magnificently. The contrast in the different movements, the beautiful crescendos, the shading and the finest passages were all in harmony with the composer. An ovation to Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra was followed up until Mr. MacDowell, who was seated in the second balcony, was compelled to bow his acknowledgments.

The Gade symphony was a success in every way. We are informed in the lucid notes of Brother Wilson that this symphony delighted Mendelssohn more than anything he had heard when it was first taken up by his orchestra for rehearsal. There is not a dull moment in the entire four movements, and apart from the rich coloring and even elaborate development there is a melody which appeals to the ordinary musical auditor. The scherzo and andantino are specially noteworthy in this regard, and it is very creditable to Mr. Nikisch to allow the audience the opportunity of hearing it and his broad and masterly reading of it. The closing movement was brought out with spirit and majesty—to the strength of the full orchestra, and the musicians seemed inspired.

There was a soloist, also, Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark, who gave Schumann's only concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. It is not possible to commend as strongly the rendition of this number, either by the orchestra or soloist. Mme. Clark is an artist, and some of the work was feelingly and conscientiously delivered, but much of her work was overpowered by the orchestra. There appeared to be little power to her playing, and the piano had a muffled sound. There was not the clear and brilliant effect to the passages which we must give Mme. Clark the credit of believing would have been the case had the pianos used by the previous performers at these concerts been selected by her. If this is not true, her technique must be faulty. The concerto itself is a beautiful thing, and the work itself was pleasurable to the audience. It is worthy of note that Mr. Nikisch had the score before him in the direction of the Gade symphony for the first time. There is to be no concert this week. William J. Winch is to be the soloist at the next concert, to which, with the programme, reference will be made later on.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mr. E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25, which had not been heard at these concerts before. It is an artistic bit of work, admirably scored, and technically is clean cut, able and scholarly. That it is especially edifying as music was not made apparent to us on a first hearing. The Liszt influence is very strongly suggested in it, and tone, color and sudden contrasts in effect are made to do service for still more important essentials that are lacking. The work is programme music pure and simple, needing a commentary to make its meaning clear at every stage of its progress. Without such commentary, it is utterly unmeaning, for it has no connected musical flow, and no form to make it coherent. The general effect is that of a rhapsodic improvisation upon the suggestions of the story, and it would doubtless provide good tone coloring for a stage presentation of the poem, but, standing alone and upon its own suggestiveness, it says anything or nothing at all. There are several impressive moments in the massive effects of the score, and, as we have said, the work is musicianly and is creditable to the skill and the ability of the composer. It was beautifully played, and was listened to with attentive interest, meeting with great applause at its end, the composer being forced to bow his acknowledgments from the upper gallery in response to the recognition attending his work and himself. The symphony was Gade's in C-minor, No. 1, which was splendidly and brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Nikisch; in fact, we cannot recall a finer reading and performance of this work than were given to it last night. It was one of Mr. Nikisch's successes of the season. The andante was exquisitely rendered and the finale with a power and impetuosity that were as strong as they were impressive. The soloist was Madame Anna Steiniger-Clark, who played Schumann's concerto with sincere feeling, and on the whole with excellent technical finish, but lack of physical power on the part of the artist marred her obvious good intention. Madam Clark was liberally applauded and recalled. At the next concert Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture; Grieg's suite "Peer Gynt" (first time), and Schumann's Symphony in E flat will be played. Mr. W. J. Winch is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 12, 1890.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

A New Descriptive Poem, a Schumann Concerto and Gade's First Symphony Heard in Music Hall.

A delicate and poetic work is E. A. MacDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine," which opened Mr. Nikisch's programme yesterday. It is a musical setting, of course, of Tennyson's idyl; and much of the spirit of the poem actuates this effective orchestral novelty. In the best sense, Mr. McDowell's symphonic poem is a "descriptive" work, and the Boston Symphony orchestra interprets all its themes with daintiness and skill. The beautiful Schumann concerto for piano forte was interpreted by Mme. Anna Clark Steiniger. No more sympathetic artist ever performed this master work here. She has a keen appreciation of the delicacy and poetic quality that are so characteristic of the concerto; and she possesses also a remarkable skill in setting forth these characteristics. There is something lacking in power and fire in Mme. Steiniger Clark's playing, yet as a whole her performance is so imbued with the master's spirit that is delightful to follow. For the most part the orchestral accompaniment was admirably balanced and subordinated. Gade's noble symphony in C minor, given with wonderful smoothness and a clear appreciation of the peculiar charm of the work, ended the 13th concert. It made a most favorable impression; the scherzo and the andantino were followed by very warm applause. This week's programme opens with Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture and closes with Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony. An Ibsen flavor may be imparted to the concert, for Griegs' suite "Peer Oynt" is one of the selections. It is new here. Mr. W. J. Winch will sing an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and four songs by Dvorak (pronounce, if you please, Vorshak) with piano accompaniment.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1890.

——The program of the Symphony Concert last Saturday evening in Boston consisted of three novelties—a symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, a violin concerto No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by Mr. Adamowski, and a festival overture by Volkmann. Next Saturday evening's Symphony Concert will have as a program the following selections: MacDowell, symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C minor. The soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

——The Schubert Club, composed of the following professional artists: Lizzie Webb Cary, Marie S. Bissell, Carrie Hun-King, Fannie Hirsch, Minnie E. Denniston, [illegible] Dudley

[57]

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1890

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Borodine.....Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
(First time in America.)

Saint Saens.....
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61
(First time in Boston.)

Volkmann.....Festival Overture, in F, op. 50
(First time at these concerts.)

It is stated in the annotated program of this concert that the "only performance in Germany" of the Symphony in E-flat of Borodine was "at the Lower Rhine Festival of 1883, held at Wiesbaden, when it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch." This statement is not correct. The Symphony was also brought out in Berlin Feb. 11, 1884, by Franz Wüllner at the second concert of his second season. It was superbly played; and it provoked discussion; yet they who were not pleased with the work, admitted its strength and spoke of it respectfully. Nor indeed is it a composition to be idly passed over; to be carelessly dismissed with a jest.

It is safe to say that the originality, flavor, and characteristics of any national school of music can be seen in the folk-songs of the nation; now the greater number of Russian folk-songs handed down from one generation to the next were conceived in the "tonality" of plain song; and so the "tonality" of modern Russian music affects strangely our ears accustomed as they are to the modern major and minor. It is true that plain-song ruled formerly in Germany, Italy and France, and even now in the streets of Paris men and women hawk their wares in pure Gregorian: as, "voila l'plaisir, mesdames, voila l' plaisir!" But the modern tonality predominates generally throughout even the rural districts of these three countries, while in Russia plain-song has almost held its own, although Russian critics deplore the fact that by means of hand-organs and orchestrions and cheap editions of Western music, their people learn Italian and French melodies with "deplorable ease." Now the "tonality" of plain song if sparingly used is effective and beautiful in dramatic music of the present day; as for example Meyerbeer's use of it in "The Prophet" and Gounod's in "King of Thule." Unless it is discreetly employed, if it permeates the whole composition, it results in monotony, and that which at first attracted and charmed, soon repels and wearies. Take again an example, "On the Steppes," a short orchestral piece by Borodine, a composition extremely effective chiefly on account of its old tonality and singular instrumentation; the piece is not so long that the ear becomes accustomed to strange impressions and is sated.

The chief characteristics of pure Russian music, the music of Stcherbatcheff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Tschaikowsky and others are then a perhaps inevitable predilection for an old tonality, a consequent tendency toward profound melancholy, a sense of rhythm which at times degenerates into barbaric frenzy uncontrolled by form, a love of the grotesque. If the Russians have been influenced by any one, and have taken ideas from other nations (and in music there is no such word as Protection), they have looked towards France rather than Germany; and the deep and lasting impression made by the appearance of Hector Berlioz in Russia is seen to-day in all music coming from that country.

Now the national characteristics of a musical composition should not so predominate that its pure and cosmopolitan musical beauties take a second place and can not readily be appreciated by the hearers of another and far-removed nation. A musician should not write merely for his own people; he should write for the whole musical world. At the same time a Russian composer has a right to expect that the audience of a foreign country should not capriciously say, "This music differs from that which we have been in the habit of hearing; therefore it is not good and we do not like it. It is Russian, therefore it must be barbarous stuff." He has a right to reply, "It is true I am a Russian; I am necessarily influenced by my temperament, by traditions, by associations. Gogol and Dostoievsky were affected by the conditions under which they wrote, their habit of thought and mode of expression differed from the habit and mode of Fielding or Balzac or Hawthorne; do you therefore deny them a place in literature? Is there nothing in this work of mine except 'local color' or 'national eccentricity?'"

How is it then with this Symphony of Borodine presented to an orthodox Boston audience in Music Hall? Is it possible to judge of it after one hearing? Must not one condemn superficially or praise too suddenly? Is one not too apt to weigh a new work in a self-adjusted balance without stopping to think that this balance may be false? Let us then only put down impressions. And now let it be said that the first movement is most ingenious, curiously scored; at times fascinating in the extreme, particularly in the employment of the wood wind, occasionally almost ugly in the treatment of the strings; abounding in beautiful passages placed side by side with that which seems intentionally grotesque; there are strange and effective passages for the brass;—as a whole, this movement seems too long, and there is an almost painful reiteration of that which is in itself of little value,—as in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés" a trifling infirmity of Stépan is dwelt upon until it becomes a bore. The second movement suggests to some the "Queen Mab" music of Berlioz. The resemblance is not so striking that the word "plagiarism" can be used. On the contrary, both the Scherzo and the Andante, though certain measures may bring the great Frenchman to the mind, are, from many points of view, very original. And the instrumentation is striking and at the same time clear. It is true that Berlioz was fond of the English horn, and that Borodine uses it in this symphony as in other works of his. But are certain passages given by Wagner to divided strings any the less beautiful because in the "Caduta de 'Decemviri" of Alessandro Scarlatti nearly three centuries ago the first violins were divided into four parts. Others object to the "melancholy" nature of the andante just as others demand that the "ending" of all novels and plays should be cheerful. This is such a gay world, life is such a blessed thing, the gaining of enough meat to keep one's body and soul together and of sufficient clothing to cover one's nakedness is such a mere joke to thousands, that melancholy has no place among us; nor should music which gives rise to melancholy be any more encouraged than a lonely moor or the sinking of a ship in midocean.

The last movement of this strange symphony is Schumanesque and remarkable for its rhythmic difficulties. It is the least interesting part of the work. As a whole the composition is undeniably worthy of another hearing; for whether it is the work of a professional or an amateur, it is too strongly and earnestly written to be contemptuously passed by.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski played a new concerto for the violin by Saint Saens. It was written for Sarasate, and it is intentionally a concerto for violin, "with accompaniment of orchestra." It may be here remarked that the accompaniment was coarsely played; so that the exquisite instrumentation lost in effect, and the soloist at times was seen and not heard. Mr. Nikisch from the very start has been unfortunate in the matter of accompanying a soloist; here his experience as a theater director should help him. The moment however he accompanies pianist, violinist or singer, the soloist, Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra are at cross purposes. Since this is the rule and not the exception, it is evidently the fault of Mr. Nikisch. The concerto itself abounds in pleasing melodies, and it is a "grateful" composition for a soloist; though it cannot be placed among the best works of Saint Saens. Mr. Adamowski played it with taste, and it is pleasant to observe at his successive performances a steady gain in tone. He was very warmly applauded.

The Volkmann Overture, a pièce d'occasion, if cut down a little, would make a good "theater overture." It is well written and is an eminently respectable composition containing nothing which could offend the most sensitive hearer.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme Saturday evening was of exactly the right length, and of a most interesting character, and it was listened to with the most evident and unqualified attention of the audience. What one expects from a symphony audience is attention, but this can not be obtained if the concerts are too long; in this particular a successful dinner and an interesting concert have great points of similarity. The programme:

Symphonic poem. "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25 (new, first time)..E. A. MacDowell
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54.....Schumann
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Gade

The symphonic poem is beyond all doubt a very interesting work, and it conclusively proves that Mr. MacDowell possesses especial gifts for this style of modern composition; at the same time one cannot but hope that certain all too evident shortcomings in the score of this work will be avoided in future. The most noticeable of these is the incessant and prominent use of the horns, which gives a cloying and monotonous coloring to the orchestration. This peculiar feature of the instrumentation, as well as one or two familiar rhythms (notably at the beginning of the so-called "Tournament music," piu allegro e con fuoco), show very plainly that Mr. MacDowell's admiration for his old master Joachim Raff, sometimes leads him to unconscious imitation. Mr. Wilson in the analytical programme prints a long description of what the work is intended to mean, and as he doubtless obtained this from the composer himself, it must be accepted as final. At the same time it must be observed that although this is a very beautiful "symphonic poem," perhaps the most beautiful ever written by an American, it is difficult to see the connection between the music itself and the "programme."

The work opens with a simple but extremely effective bit of writing for strings alone in D minor, followed by striking horn and trumpet calls; a rush of the strings, a heavy chord and then a pause. The first passage is repeated in the wood, taken up by the strings, which gradually descend to a subdued tremolo, and a horn announces the Lancelot theme in a fragmentary manner, interrupted by a harsh note of warning on the low oboe. This passage is extremely effective, and immediately afterwards the whole Lancelot theme is played on three horns, accompanied by the basses and 'cellos pizzicato. The theme is then repeated by the strings with the whole orchestra, excepting the heavy brass. By this time the attention of the whole audience was riveted on the music, and nearly everyone seemed to feel the undoubted power of the composition. The time changes to an easy treble rhythm, a strong passage for the whole orchestra with high strings is gracefully repeated by the wood-wind—bassoons—and the four horns again appear by way of modulation to the Elaine theme on the oboe in F major. It is original and taking, and it is like a slap in the face to find it immediately followed by an undeniably vulgar passage where the ubiquitous four horns and the violas perform a sort of slow waltz to the accompaniment of the other strings in trills and pizzicato to arpeggios. This passage is an unfortunate but very prominent blemish in this otherwise beautiful work. The violas hint at the tournament theme, which is finally reached through a strong and splendid piece of writing for all the brass. The music is now vigorous, and often very skilfully and originally scored. The prancing horses, eager fighters and excited onlookers are all tolerably well depicted in the stirring tones, and this is one of the most successful parts of the work. The Elaine and Lancelot themes appear again, and also the objectionable "waltz tune"—and, as the programme informs us, "Lancelot and Elaine separate." The theme of the introduction returns again, and is immediately followed by the Lancelot theme in the original key, but now to the wood and strings. The "waltz tune," now strong and dignified, is played boldly on the two trumpets, in unison with an original and tremendously effective accompaniment by the strings. The programme volunteers the information that this represents the interview between Lancelot and the Queen; whatever it means it is a superb piece of orchestral writing. From here on to the end the different themes appear in fragmentary forms. There is a feeling of constant diminuendo, and the music dies away in quiet peace.

This description is unfortunately wholly inadequate to give a proper idea of the very profound impression which two hearings of this work made. It seems just, however, to say that the second hearing not only increased the pleasure which the work gave, but also accentuated what have already been mentioned as its obvious faults. It will be seen that these seem to be chiefly in the manner of expression, and not in the subject matter itself. If Mr. MacDowell would follow the great modern instrumentalists as closely in their method of using the strings as he has in their manner of writing for brass, his score would be improved, if possible, a hundred per cent. At all events, it is undoubtedly one of the most important and beautiful works ever produced by a fellow-countryman, and it is to be hoped that Mr. MacDowell has many more as good or better works going through the familiar mellowing process in the drawers of his writing desk, but it will be a favor to the public if he does not leave them there too long. The work was nothing short of superbly played, and it was long and loudly applauded.

Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark played the Schumann concerto in an inadequate and inartistic manner. It is impossible to hear her light touch in Music Hall, and she did not appear to at all understand this beautiful and noble work. The Gade symphony was magnificently played. It is impossible to believe that it could be better performed. The airy structure of the scherzo was most daintily interpreted, and the vigorous finale was grandly given. There will be no concert next week, as the orchestra does not return until Sunday.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 12, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mme. Anna

The programme given at last evening's symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was greatly enjoyed by the large audience in attendance, and the works presented, as well as their performance, richly merited the applause given by those attending. The novelty of the three compositions performed was Mr. E. A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25, which had its first hearing in this country on this occasion. It belongs to the more recent period of this composer, having been written only three years ago at Weisbaden, where it was first produced. The subject of Tennyson's "Idyll" lends itself to musical treatment admirably under the hand of such a musician as Mr. MacDowell has shown himself to be, and the opportunities afforded for sharp contrasts and effective episodes have been used with consummate skill in this composition. Mr. MacDowell's poem tells the story of Tennyson's characters in a clear and definite style, the leading themes being eminently in keeping with the scenes and ideas portrayed, and all these are elaborated and worked out with admirable skill. The motifs used as descriptive of King Arthur's court, the tournament, the themes given to depict the two characters of Lancelot and Elaine, and the strong dramatic music of the work, all show the stamp of genius, and bear the mark of the born musician. The charming individuality of the composer is shown throughout the poem, and the work is a new evidence of the largeness and breadth of his musical nature. The value of the composition was instantly realized by the audience, and the performance given it under Mr. Nickish's baton, brought out all its beauties in bold relief. The composer and the conductor were alike honored by the applause following the conclusion of the work. The appearance of Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark as the solo pianist in Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, op. 54, was the second event of the evening, and this talented and conscientious player, had a very cordial reception from the audience. Her performance in the concerto was characterized by the same merits that she has shown in earlier appearances here, and she was rewarded with a very generous expression of the approval of her hearers. The symphony by Gade, No. 1, in C minor ended the evening's programme, and the performance of this most enjoyable work marked the highest point of success attained by Mr. Nikisch since his arrival in this country. The scherzo was given in the daintiest fashion, and the graceful third movement was played in the most charming fashion. The tuneful characteristic of the entire symphony, its remarkably rich tone colorings and all its wealth of musical ideas were finely brought out in this reading, and the concert, as a whole, left a very pleasant impression. The orchestra will be away during the coming week, and the next concert will occur on the 24th inst.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Nikisch has begun the last half of the series of concerts with a programme that proved to be as successful as any that he has given during the season. Not only were the selections novelties, to some extent—at all events they were not familiar—but they had in them the merit of giving pleasure to the audience. There were many substitutes for familiar faces in the seats of the hall, and those who are not regular attendants heard a concert which aroused them to much enthusiasm. Nothing since the famous three-symphony concert has shown the wonderful playing of the orchestra and the ability of Mr. Nikisch as a director more than the concert of Saturday evening.

Two numbers only had been assigned to the orchestra—the symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine," by the young American composer, MacDowell, and Gade's Symphony in C minor. The poem is the latest work of the composer that has been published, and it was its first performance here. The composition abounds in lively effects for the wood-wind particularly, and the several themes or motifs are heard conspicuously in different movements, while through it all is a development of harmony and an absorption on the part of the composer in the idea of the poem on which it is founded. It was rendered magnificently. The contrast in the different movements, the beautiful crescendos, the shading and the finest passages were all in harmony with the composer. An ovation to Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra was followed up until Mr. MacDowell, who was seated in the second balcony, was compelled to bow his acknowledgments.

The Gade symphony was a success in every way. We are informed in the lucid notes of Brother Wilson that this symphony delighted Mendelssohn more than anything he had heard when it was first taken up by his orchestra for rehearsal. There is not a dull moment in the entire four movements, and apart from the rich coloring and even elaborate development there is a melody which appeals to the ordinary musical auditor. The scherzo and andantino are specially noteworthy in this regard, and it is very creditable to Mr. Nikisch to allow the audience the opportunity of hearing it and his broad and masterly reading of it. The closing movement was brought out with spirit and majesty—to the strength of the full orchestra, and the musicians seemed inspired.

There was a soloist, also, Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark, who gave Schumann's only concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. It is not possible to commend as strongly the rendition of this number, either by the orchestra or soloist. Mme. Clark is an artist, and some of the work was feelingly and conscientiously delivered, but much of her work was overpowered by the orchestra. There appeared to be little power to her playing, and the piano had a muffled sound. There was not the clear and brilliant effect to the passages which we must give Mme. Clark the credit of believing would have been the case had the pianos used by the previous performers at these concerts been selected by her. If this is not true, her technique must be faulty. The concerto itself is a beautiful thing, and the work itself was pleasurable to the audience. It is worthy of note that Mr. Nikisch had the score before him in the direction of the Gade symphony for the first time. There is to be no concert this week. William J. Winch is to be the soloist at the next concert, to which, with the programme, reference will be made later on.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mr. E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25, which had not been heard at these concerts before. It is an artistic bit of work, admirably scored, and technically is clean cut, able and scholarly. That it is especially edifying as music was not made apparent to us on a first hearing. The Liszt influence is very strongly suggested in it, and tone, color and sudden contrasts in effect are made to do service for still more important essentials that are lacking. The work is programme music pure and simple, needing a commentary to make its meaning clear at every stage of its progress. Without such commentary, it is utterly unmeaning, for it has no connected musical flow, and no form to make it coherent. The general effect is that of a rhapsodic improvisation upon the suggestions of the story, and it would doubtless provide good tone coloring for a stage presentation of the poem, but, standing alone and upon its own suggestiveness, it says anything or nothing at all. There are several impressive moments in the massive effects of the score, and, as we have said, the work is musicianly and is creditable to the skill and the ability of the composer. It was beautifully played, and was listened to with attentive interest, meeting with great applause at its end, the composer being forced to bow his acknowledgments from the upper gallery in response to the recognition attending his work and himself. The symphony was Gade's in C minor, No. 1, which was splendidly and brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Nikisch; in fact, we cannot recall a finer reading and performance of this work than were given to it last night. It was one of Mr. Nikisch's successes of the season. The andante was exquisitely rendered and the finale with a power and impetuosity that were as strong as they were impressive. The soloist was Madame Anna Steiniger-Clark, who played Schumann's concerto with sincere feeling, and on the whole with excellent technical finish, but lack of physical power on the part of the artist marred her obvious good intention. Madam Clark was liberally applauded and recalled. At the next concert Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture; Grieg's suite "Peé Gynt" (first time), and Schumann's Symphony in E flat will be played. Mr. W. J. Winch is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 12, 1890.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

A New Descriptive Poem, a Schumann Concerto and Gade's First Symphony Heard in Music Hall.

A delicate and poetic work is E. A. McDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine," which opened Mr. Nikisch's programme yesterday. It is a musical setting, of course, of Tennyson's idyl; and much of the spirit of the poem actuates this effective orchestral novelty. In the best sense, Mr. McDowell's symphonic poem is a "descriptive" work, and the Boston Symphony orchestra interprets all its themes with daintiness and skill. The beautiful Schumann concerto for piano forte was interpreted by Mme. Anna Clark Steiniger. No more sympathetic artist ever performed this master work here. She has a keen appreciation of the delicacy and poetic quality that are so characteristic of the concerto; and she possesses also a remarkable skill in setting forth these characteristics. There is something lacking in power and fire in Mme. Steiniger Clark's playing, yet as a whole her performance is so imbued with the master's spirit that is delightful to follow. For the most part the orchestral accompaniment was admirably balanced and subordinated. Gade's noble symphony in C minor, given with wonderful smoothness and a clear appreciation of the peculiar charm of the work, ended the 13th concert. It made a most favorable impression; the scherzo and the andantino were followed by very warm applause. This week's programme opens with Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture and closes with Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony. An Ibsen flavor may be imparted to the concert, for Griegs' suite "Peer Oynt" is one of the selections. It is new here. Mr. W. J. Winch will sing an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and four songs by Dvorak (pronounce, if you please, Vorshak) with piano accompaniment.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1890.

——The program of the Symphony Concert last Saturday evening in Boston consisted of three novelties—a symphony by the Russian composer Borodine, a violin concerto No. 3 in B minor by Saint-Saëns, played by Mr. Adamowski, and a festival overture by Volkmann. Next Saturday evening's Symphony Concert will have as a program the following selections: MacDowell, symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine;" Schumann, concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54; Gade, symphony No. 1 in C minor. The soloist will be Mrs. Anna Steniger-Clark.

——The Schubert Club, composed of the following professional artists: Lizzie Webb Cary, Marie S. Bissell, Carrie Hun-King, Fannie Hirsch, Minnie E. Denniston,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, January 13, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Sleeping Cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan. 14.
METROPOLITAN HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 15, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Jan. 16, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore Friday, Jan. 17, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.
Arrive Washington 10.15 A. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington Saturday, Jan. 18, at 9.20 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12.45 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Sunday, Jan. 18, at 9 A. M.
Arrive New York, 12 noon.
Leave New York, 5 P. M.
Arrive Boston, 11 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, January 13, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

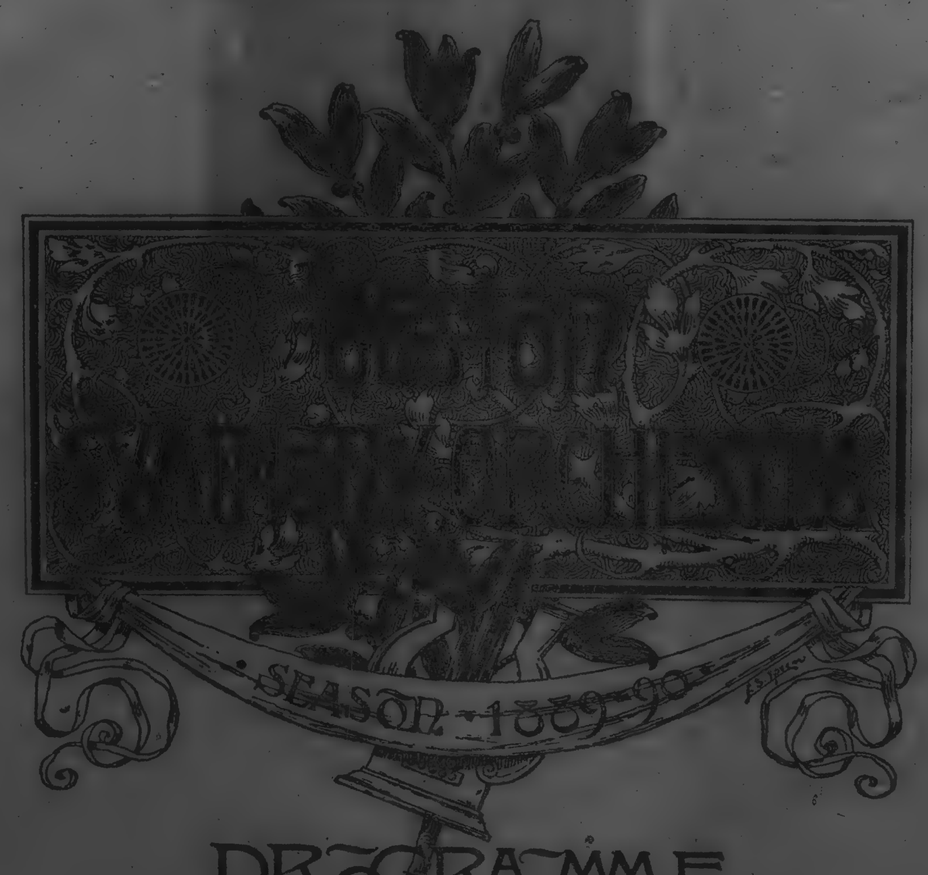
STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, January 14, at 8.



PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a large audience together in Steinway Hall last evening. The entertainment was one of more than ordinary interest. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for 'cello in A minor, opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and Alexander Borodin's first symphony in E flat. The last work was recently produced in Boston for the first time in America, and the 'cello concerto served to introduce a new artist, Mr. Anton Hekking, lately first 'cello of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borodin was a Russian composer, who, like Berlioz, was originally intended for the medical profession. He died at the age of 50 a few years ago, leaving behind him two symphonies, some smaller orchestral compositions, some chamber music, and an unfinished opera. Judging by the work heard last night, Borodin had a decided talent for orchestral exposition of the characteristic melody of his native land, and though it is not probable that he would have left any imperishable monument to his memory, he might have produced more work worthy of the general acquaintance of music lovers.

His symphony is a short one, and, excepting the placing of the scherzo before the andante, follows the classical model both in the character and sequence of its movements as well as in the internal structure of the movements themselves. The composition, however, is modern and romantic in spirit and distinctly northern in character. Its thematic material is borrowed from Russian folk melodies, and the harmonic background is full of sombre and weird tints. The first movement is, without much doubt, the strongest. The first theme is one of abrupt, nervous character and the second a flowing melody of sad meaning. The two are well worked one against the other, the force and incisiveness of the first giving a generally rugged and aggressive feeling to the movement. The scoring is full of extremely well-managed contrasting solos and the climax is admirably written.

The scherzo is the brightest and prettiest movement, but is less charged with matter than the opening allegro. It contains some brilliant and difficult passages for the wood, which were cleverly disposed of by Mr. Nikisch's men. The andante is very dark and gloomy, being a faithful reflection of that deep undercurrent of sadness which is found in the northern nations of Europe, and which some writers, with good reason, regard as a result of their national environment. The last movement of the symphony is a somewhat boisterous allegro, very ingeniously handled. One of its features is a passage of fine breadth, built on the first theme, and richly scored. Taken as a whole, the symphony is a good though not a great composition, well worthy of a place on one of Mr. Nikisch's programmes, and a decidedly interesting novelty. It was performed superbly, the conductor bringing out its varied effects with magnificent dramatic force and electrical precision.

The Saint-Saëns concerto was very well played by Mr. Hekking, who proved to be a valuable addition to the orchestral virtuosi of this country. His tone is full, and his style warm and sympathetic. He was not at his best in the more rapid passages, but in the broader cantabile measures he played with great feeling. The orchestral performance of the Brahms and Goldmark compositions was worthy of the very highest praise. Mr. Nikisch's reading [illegible]oldmark overture was superb, the [illegible]igor and intensity of this excellent [illegible]riting being revealed in the finest [illegible]yle. Altogether the concert was one [illegible]ellence, and demonstrated anew that [illegible]Nikisch the Bostonians have acquired [illegible]r who can preserve their marvellous [illegible]n ensemble playing, and impart to [illegible] a keen and penetrative dramatic [illegible]ch it formerly lacked.

Herald

W RUSSIAN SYMPHONY.

Forward by Herr Nikisch at the oston Orchestra's Concert.

E AND D'ALBERT, AU REVOIR!

ays Give Their Third Recital at Chickering Hall.

interesting feature of the excellent con- before a large and enthusiastic audience on Orchestra in Steinway Hall last night direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was ably a symphony by the Russian com- nder Borodin, who has heretofore been in our concert rooms solely by a short d, "On the Steppes."

, however, the author of much music composed chiefly as a relaxation from work as professor of chemistry at the cademy of St. Petersburg. He died a go, leaving an unfinished opera, two and many miscellaneous compositions. hony heard last night—that in E flat—is e known outside of Russia, its first per- n Germany having been due to Mr. Nik- ad it played at a music festival held in 83. It is in the usual four movements, one more proof that if Russian music thing of form and polish according to andards it is by no means devoid of as.

o be noted that the orchestral treat- ways interesting and often masterly. coming crudities, endless reiteration of t phrases, for instance, which are saved ally brilliant musical handling, of which d not have been ashamed.

atter of personal pride with Mr. Nikisch symphony well given, and its interpre- im and his fine orchestra credit.

terest on the programme was Saint- concerto in A minor, a beautiful, if ong-drawn-out work, which was well r. Anto.. Hekking, a regular member of tra.

of the evening was given up to a mas- rmance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" d to Braham's interesting but too ex- tions upon a Haydn theme.

PAGES.

snug little fortune of $10,000, which he had accumulated during thirty years of hekking.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Criticism, in the sense that the short-sighted and unreasoning employ the term, has little to do with performances like that of the Boston Symphony society, at Steinway Hall last night. Indeed, it has little to do it in the true sense, which suggests as its province the separation of excellence from defect. It is chiefly that sublimated criticism which is all praise that is challenged by Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi for the things that were excellent last night so greatly outnumbered those that were defective that it would be a waste of time to attempt to draw the line between them. The sound, healthy, beautiful grain has the chaff from view. If musical New-York were disposed to petty feelings, there would be a chance for envy.

Mr. Nikisch's programme contained two compositions that have frequently been heard with admiration and two that were novel. In the overture to "Sakuntala," and Brahms's variations on a choral melody by Haydn (op. 56), the audience (an ample one by the way, but a little less exuberant in its tributes of applause than the first) was permitted to enjoy the brilliancy of the band's performance and the tastefulness, warmth and intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's readings without division of attention. In the other numbers, a concerto for violoncello (in A minor, op. 33), by Saint-Saens, and a symphony in E flat, by the Russian composer, Borodin, a two-fold exercise of judgment was asked, for the music was unfamiliar, as well as the performance. The concerto, a serious composition, which aims at artistic expression, and not at display of the solo instrument, was played by Mr. Anton Hekking, who came from Berlin to join the orchestra at the beginning of the season. Mr. Hekking is an artist of fine quality, reposeful in manner, correct in feeling, though we should say not very warm, and technically a master. His playing gave great pleasure. Russian music forcing itself upon the notice of the world almost as persistently as Russian literature, and it is quite as worthy of attention. One-half of the symphony played last night is a perfect warrant for the admission of Borodin to the ranks of modern symphonists. If the legacy which he left to the world when he died, a few years ago, before his fame had penetrated to these parts, contains any more compositions like this symphony, he deserves to share the attention now so largely monopolized by Tschaikowsky. The work is not at all revolutionary in form or manner, and only in parts does it employ some of the characteristic elements of Russian folk-music. Yet it has a most decided individuality, and its first two movements are not only original but beautiful. The first allegro is exceedingly energetic, and the distortion of rhythm by means of syncopation, puts a peculiar impress of eagerness on the first subject. The second subject is effectively contrasted in style and spirit, and, in spite of a tendency to bizarre effects in the instrumentation, the development of the themes in the free fantasia part of the movement, is full of ingenuity and beauty. The scherzo takes the second place in the symphony, and is vital with a lively, yet delicate humor, quite different from the mixture of ruggedness and melancholy so frequently found in the playful movements of Russian composers. In the trio there is a suggestion of national color, but nothing forced or unnatural. The andante and finale do not bear comparison with the other movements, either in their melodic material, or its employment. Mr. Nikisch has added materially to the interest of the musical season of New-York by bringing forward this symphony. Amateurs will be glad to hear other novelties from him.

Clipping from New Haven Com
Date 1/14

NIKISCH'S SECOND.

Another Excellent Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Herr Nikisch, passed off at the Hyperion last evening with as great eclat as any ever enjoyed by New Haven music-lovers. With the exception of the names of Schumann and Mendelssohn, the composers were somewhat unfamiliar to others than strictly musical people. The concert opened with the overture from the opera, "Genoveva," by Schumann. This, when first produced was received with little enthusiasm, as Schumann's genius was too far in advance of his own time to obtain the immediate recognition which that of his illustrious contemporary Mendelssohn received. The rendering was very fine; though the piece was not such as to arrest great attention. The Symphonic Espagnole, of modern character, by Lalo, was beautifully rendered by the violinist, C. M. Loeffler, whose sympathetic playing was best heard in the andante movement, but the naivete of the Scherzando and the bright cheerfulness of the Rondo were particularly appreciated by the audience. The orchestral effects in the latter part of the Rondo deserves special mention. The Norwegian Rhapsody of Svendsen contained the weird beauty and delightfully melodious arias of Northern music, and the abrupt termination after a succession of sweet harmonies was truly characteristic. Perhaps the feature of the evening was the beautiful flute solo rendered by Charles Mole, who deserves the world-wide fame he has won. It will be remembered that Gericke introduced him into this country a few years ago [illegible] from Paris. He received prolonged and hearty applause which [illegible] not cease. The [illegible]

E5

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, January 13, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Sleeping Cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan. 14.
METROPOLITAN HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 15, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Jan. 16, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore Friday, Jan. 17, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.
Arrive Washington 10.15 A. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington Saturday, Jan. 18, at 9.20 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12.45 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Sunday, Jan. 18, at 9 A. M.
Arrive New York, 12 noon.
Leave New York, 5 P. M.
Arrive Boston, 11 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, January 13, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, January 14, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a large audience together in Steinway Hall last evening. The entertainment was one of more than ordinary interest. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for 'cello in A minor, opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and Alexander Borodin's first symphony in E flat. The last work was recently produced in Boston for the first time in America, and the 'cello concerto served to introduce a new artist, Mr. Anton Hekking, lately first 'cello of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borodin was a Russian composer, who, like Berlioz, was originally intended for the medical profession. He died at the age of 50 a few years ago, leaving behind him two symphonies, some smaller orchestral compositions, some chamber music, and an unfinished opera. Judging by the work heard last night, Borodin had a decided talent for orchestral exposition of the characteristic melody of his native land, and though it is not probable that he would have left any imperishable monument to his memory, he might have produced more work worthy of the general acquaintance of music lovers.

His symphony is a short one, and, excepting the placing of the scherzo before the andante, follows the classical model both in the character and sequence of its movements as well as in the internal structure of the movements themselves. The composition, however, is modern and romantic in spirit and distinctly northern in character. Its thematic material is borrowed from Russian folk melodies, and the harmonic background is full of sombre and weird tints. The first movement is, without much doubt, the strongest. The first theme is one of abrupt, nervous character and the second a flowing melody of sad meaning. The two are well worked one against the other, the force and incisiveness of the first giving a generally rugged and aggressive feeling to the movement. The scoring is full of extremely well-managed contrasting solos and the climax is admirably written.

The scherzo is the brightest and prettiest movement, but is less charged with matter than the opening allegro. It contains some brilliant and difficult passages for the wood, which were cleverly disposed of by Mr. Nikisch's men. The andante is very dark and gloomy, being a faithful reflection of that deep undercurrent of sadness which is found in the northern nations of Europe, and which some writers, with good reason, regard as a result of their national environment. The last movement of the symphony is a somewhat boisterous allegro, very ingeniously handled. One of its features is a passage of fine breadth, built on the first theme, and richly scored. Taken as a whole, the symphony is a good though not a great composition, well worthy of a place on one of Mr. Nikisch's programmes, and a decidedly interesting novelty. It was performed superbly, the conductor bringing out its varied effects with magnificent dramatic force and electrical precision.

The Saint-Saëns concerto was very well played by Mr. Hekking, who proved to be a valuable addition to the orchestral virtuosi of this country. His tone is full, and his style warm and sympathetic. He was not at his best in the more rapid passages, but in the broader cantabile measures he played with great feeling. The orchestral performance of the Brahms and Goldmark compositions was worthy of the very highest praise. Mr. Nikisch's reading [illegible] Goldmark overture was superb, the vigor and intensity of this excellent writing being revealed in the finest style. Altogether the concert was one [illegible] excellence, and demonstrated anew that [illegible] Nikisch the Bostonians have acquired [illegible] or who can preserve their marvellous [illegible] in ensemble playing, and impart to [illegible] a keen and penetrative dramatic [illegible] ich it formerly lacked.

NEW RUSSIAN SYMPHONY.

Forward by Herr Nikisch at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

TE AND D'ALBERT, AU REVOIR!

bays Give Their Third Recital at Chickering Hall.

[illegible] interesting feature of the excellent con- [illegible] before a large and enthusiastic audience [illegible] ton Orchestra in Steinway Hall last night' [illegible] direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was [illegible] ably a symphony by the Russian com- [illegible] ander Borodin, who has heretofore been [illegible] d in our concert rooms solely by a short [illegible] ed, "On the Steppes."

[illegible] s, however, the author of much music, [illegible] e composed chiefly as a relaxation from [illegible] work as professor of chemistry at the [illegible] cademy of St. Petersburg. He died a [illegible] go, leaving an unfinished opera, two [illegible] and many miscellaneous compositions.

[illegible] hony heard last night—that in E flat—is [illegible] e known outside of Russia, its first per- [illegible] n Germany having been due to Mr. Nik- [illegible] had it played at a music festival held in [illegible] 883. It is in the usual four movements, [illegible] one more proof that if Russian music [illegible] thing of form and polish according to [illegible] andards it is by no means devoid of [illegible] as.

[illegible] o be noted that the orchestral treat- [illegible] ways interesting and often masterly. [illegible] eming crudities, endless reiteration of [illegible] phrases, for instance, which are saved [illegible] ally brilliant musical handling, of which [illegible] d not have been ashamed.

[illegible] atter of personal pride with Mr. Nikisch [illegible] symphony well given, and its interpre- [illegible] im and his fine orchestra credit.

[illegible] terest on the programme was Saint- [illegible] o concerto in A minor, a beautiful, if [illegible] ong-drawn-out work, which was well [illegible] . Anto_ Hekking, a regular member of [illegible] ra.

[illegible] of the evening was given up to a mas- [illegible] mance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" [illegible] d to Braham's interesting but too ex- [illegible] tions upon a Haydn theme.

PAGES.

snug little fortune of $10,000, which he had accumulated during thirty years of begging.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Criticism, in the sense that the short-sighted and unreasoning employ the term, has little to do with performances like that of the Boston Symphony Society, at Steinway Hall last night. Indeed, it has little to do it in the true sense, which suggests as its province the separation of excellence from defect. It is chiefly that sublimated criticism which is all praise that is challenged by Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi; for the things that were excellent last night so greatly outnumbered those that were defective that it would be a waste of time to attempt to draw the line between them. The sound, healthy, beautiful grain hid the chaff from view. If musical New-York were disposed to petty feelings, there would be a chance for envy.

Mr. Nikisch's programme contained two compositions that have frequently been heard with admiration and two that were novel. In the overture to "Sakuntala" and Brahms's variations on a choral melody by Haydn (op. 56), the audience (an ample one by the way, but a little less exuberant in its tributes of applause than the first) was permitted to enjoy the brilliancy of the band's performance and the tastefulness, warmth and intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's readings without division of attention. In the other numbers, a concerto for violoncello (in A minor, op. 33), by Saint-Saens, and a symphony in E flat, by the Russian composer, Borodin, a two-fold exercise of judgment was asked, for the music was unfamiliar, as well as the performance. The concerto, a serious composition, which aims at artistic expression, and not at display of the solo instrument, was played by Mr. Anton Hekking, who came from Berlin to join the orchestra at the beginning of the season. Mr. Hekking is an artist of fine quality, reposeful in manner, correct in feeling, though we should say not very warm, and technically a master. His playing gave great pleasure. Russian music forcing itself upon the notice of the world almost as persistently as Russian literature, and it is quite as worthy of attention. One-half of the symphony played last night is a perfect warrant for the admission of Borodin to the ranks of modern symphonists. If the legacy which he left to the world when he died, a few years ago, before his fame had penetrated to these parts, contains any more compositions like this symphony, he deserves to share the attention now so largely monopolized by Tschaikowsky. The work is not at all revolutionary in form or manner, and only in parts does it employ some of the characteristic elements of Russian folk-music. Yet it has a most decided individuality, and its first two movements are not only original but beautiful. The first allegro is exceedingly energetic, and the distortion of rhythm by means of syncopation, puts a peculiar impress of eagerness on the first subject. The second subject is effectively contrasted in style and spirit, and, in spite of a tendency to bizarre effects in the instrumentation, the development of the themes in the free fantasia part of the movement, is full of ingenuity and beauty. The scherzo takes the second place in the symphony, and is vital with a lively, yet delicate humor, quite different from the mixture of ruggedness and melancholy so frequently found in the playful movements of Russian composers. In the trio there is a suggestion of national color, but nothing forced or unnatural. The andante and finale do not bear comparison with the other movements, either in their melodic material, or its employment. Mr. Nikisch has added materially to the interest of the musical season of New-York by bringing forward this symphony. Amateurs will be glad to hear other novelties from him.

Clipping from Times
New Haven Conn
Date 1/14

NIKISCH'S SECOND.

Another Excellent Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Herr Nikisch, passed off at the Hyperion last evening with as great eclat as any ever enjoyed by New Haven music-lovers. With the exception of the names of Schumann and Mendelssohn, the composers were somewhat unfamiliar to others than strictly musical people. The concert opened with the overture from the opera, "Genoveva," by Schumann. This, when first produced, was received with little enthusiasm, as Schumann's genius was too far in advance of his own time to obtain the immediate recognition which that of his illustrious contemporary Mendelssohn, received. The rendering was very fine; though the piece was not such as to arrest great attention. The Symphonie Espagnole, of modern character, by Lalo, was beautifully rendered by the violinist, C. M. Loeffler, whose sympathetic playing was best heard in the andante movement, but the naivete of the Scherzando and the bright cheerfulness of the Rondo were particularly appreciated by the audience. The orchestral effects in the latter part of the Rondo deserves special mention. The Norwegian Rhapsody of Svendsen contained the weird beauty and delightfully melodious arias of Northern music, and the abrupt termination after a succession of sweet harmonies was truly characteristic. Perhaps the feature of the evening was the beautiful flute solo rendered by Charles Mole, who deserves the world-wide fame he has won. It will be remembered that Gericke introduced him into this country a few years ago. He is from Paris. He received prolonged and hearty applause to which unfortunately he did not respond. The closing number was the Symphony in A (Italian) of Mendelssohn, of which the andante movement, the well-known Pilgrim's March was most enjoyed. The final movement, a regular Tarantelle, was full

[58]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, January 13, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Sleeping Cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan. 14.
METROPOLITAN HOTEL, corner Broadway and Prince Street.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 15, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Jan. 16, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore Friday, Jan. 17, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.
Arrive Washington 10.15 A. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington Saturday, Jan. 18, at 9.20 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12 45 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Sunday, Jan. 18, at 9 A. M.
Arrive New York, 12 noon.
Leave New York, 5 P. M.
Arrive Boston, 11 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, January 13, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a large audience together in Steinway Hall last evening. The entertainment was one of more than ordinary interest. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for 'cello in A minor, opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and Alexander Borodin's first symphony in E flat. The last work was recently produced in Boston for the first time in America, and the 'cello concerto served to introduce a new artist, Mr. Anton Hekking, lately first 'cello of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borodin was a Russian composer, who, like Berlioz, was originally intended for the medical profession. He died at the age of 50 a few years ago, leaving behind him two symphonies, some smaller orchestral compositions, some chamber music, and an unfinished opera. Judging by the work heard last night, Borodin had a decided talent for orchestral exposition of the characteristic melody of his native land, and though it is not probable that he would have left any imperishable monument to his memory, he might have produced more work worthy of the general acquaintance of music lovers.

His symphony is a short one, and, excepting the placing of the scherzo before the andante, follows the classical model both in the character and sequence of its movements as well as in the internal structure of the movements themselves. The composition, however, is modern and romantic in spirit and distinctly northern in character. Its thematic material is borrowed from Russian folk melodies, and the harmonic background is full of sombre and weird tints. The first movement is, without much doubt, the strongest. The first theme is one of abrupt, nervous character and the second a flowing melody of sad meaning. The two are well worked one against the other, the force and incisiveness of the first giving a generally rugged and aggressive feeling to the movement. The scoring is full of extremely well-managed contrasting solos and the climax is admirably written.

The scherzo is the brightest and prettiest movement, but is less charged with matter than the opening allegro. It contains some brilliant and difficult passages for the wood, which were cleverly disposed of by Mr. Nikisch's men. The andante is very dark and gloomy, being a faithful reflection of that deep undercurrent of sadness which is found in the northern nations of Europe, and which some writers, with good reason, regard as a result of their national environment. The last movement of the symphony is a somewhat boisterous allegro, very ingeniously handled. One of its features is a passage of fine breadth, built on the first theme, and richly scored. Taken as a whole, the symphony is a good though not a great composition, well worthy of a place on one of Mr. Nikisch's programmes, and a decidedly interesting novelty. It was performed superbly, the conductor bringing out its varied effects with magnificent dramatic force and electrical precision.

The Saint-Saëns concerto was very well played by Mr. Hekking, who proved to be a valuable addition to the orchestral virtuosi of this country. His tone is full, and his style warm and sympathetic. He was not at his best in the more rapid passages, but in the broader cantabile measures he played with great feeling. The orchestral performance of the Brahms and Goldmark compositions was worthy of the very highest praise. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Goldmark overture was superb, the dramatic vigor and intensity of this excellent piece of writing being revealed in the finest possible style. Altogether the concert was one of rare excellence, and demonstrated anew that in Arthur Nikisch the Bostonians have acquired a conductor who can preserve their marvellous precision in ensemble playing, and impart to their work a keen and penetrative dramatic power which it formerly lacked.

Herald

A NEW RUSSIAN SYMPHONY.

Brought Forward by Herr Nikisch at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

SARASATE AND D'ALBERT, AU REVOIR!

The Korbays Give Their Third Recital at Chickering Hall.

The most interesting feature of the excellent concert given before a large and enthusiastic audience by the Boston Orchestra in Steinway Hall last night under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was unquestionably a symphony by the Russian composer, Alexander Borodin, who has heretofore been represented in our concert rooms solely by a short suite entitled, "On the Steppes."

Borodin is, however, the author of much music, although he composed chiefly as a relaxation from his regular work as professor of chemistry at the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg. He died a few years ago, leaving an unfinished opera, two symphonies and many miscellaneous compositions.

The symphony heard last night—that in E flat—is the only one known outside of Russia, its first performance in Germany having been due to Mr. Nikisch, who had it played at a music festival held in Leipsic in 1883. It is in the usual four movements, and gives one more proof that if Russian music lacks something of form and polish according to Western standards it is by no means devoid of musical ideas.

It is also to be noted that the orchestral treatment is always interesting and often masterly. There are seeming crudities, endless reiteration of insignificant phrases, for instance, which are saved only by a really brilliant musical handling, of which Berlioz need not have been ashamed.

It was a matter of personal pride with Mr. Nikisch to have this symphony well given, and its interpretation did him and his fine orchestra credit.

Next in interest on the programme was Saint-Saëns' 'cello concerto in A minor, a beautiful, if somewhat long-drawn-out work, which was well played by Mr. Anton Hekking, a regular member of the orchestra.

The rest of the evening was given up to a masterly performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and to Braham's interesting but too extended variations upon a Haydn theme.

Tribune

PAGES.

snug little fortune of $10,000, which he had accumulated during thirty years of begging.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Criticism, in the sense that the short-sighted and unreasoning employ the term, has little to do with performances like that of the Boston Symphony Society, at Steinway Hall last night. Indeed, it has little to do it in the true sense, which suggests as its province the separation of excellence from defect. It is chiefly that sublimated criticism which is all praise that is challenged by Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi; for the things that were excellent last night so greatly outnumbered those that were defective that it would be a waste of time to attempt to draw the line between them. The sound, healthy, beautiful grain hid the chaff from view. If musical New-York were disposed to petty feelings, there would be a chance for envy.

Mr. Nikisch's programme contained two compositions that have frequently been heard with admiration and two that were novel. In the overture to "Sakuntala" and Brahms's variations on a choral melody by Haydn (op. 56), the audience (an ample one by the way, but a little less exuberant in its tributes of applause than the first) was permitted to enjoy the brilliancy of the band's performance and the tastefulness, warmth and intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's readings without division of attention. In the other numbers, a concerto for violoncello (in A minor, op. 33), by Saint-Saens, and a symphony in E flat, by the Russian composer, Borodin, a two-fold exercise of judgment was asked, for the music was unfamiliar, as well as the performance. The concerto, a serious composition, which aims at artistic expression, and not at display of the solo instrument, was played by Mr. Anton Hekking, who came from Berlin to join the orchestra at the beginning of the season. Mr. Hekking is an artist of fine quality, reposeful in manner, correct in feeling, though we should say not very warm, and technically a master. His playing gave great pleasure. Russian music forcing itself upon the notice of the world almost as persistently as Russian literature, and it is quite as worthy of attention. One-half of the symphony played last night is a perfect warrant for the admission of Borodin to the ranks of modern symphonists. If the legacy which he left to the world when he died, a few years ago, before his fame had penetrated to these parts, contains any more compositions like this symphony, he deserves to share the attention now so largely monopolized by Tschaikowsky. The work is not at all revolutionary in form or manner, and only in parts does it employ some of the characteristic elements of Russian folk-music. Yet it has a most decided individuality, and its first two movements are not only original but beautiful. The first allegro is exceedingly energetic, and the distortion of rhythm by means of syncopation, puts a peculiar impress of eagerness on the first subject. The second subject is effectively contrasted in style and spirit, and, in spite of a tendency to bizarre effects in the instrumentation, the development of the themes in the free fantasia part of the movement, is full of ingenuity and beauty. The scherzo takes the second place in the symphony, and is vital with a lively, yet delicate humor, quite different from the mixture of ruggedness and melancholy so frequently found in the playful movements of Russian composers. In the trio there is a suggestion of national color, but nothing forced or unnatural. The andante and finale do not bear comparison with the other movements, either in their melodic material, or its employment. Mr. Nikisch has added materially to the interest of the musical season of New-York by bringing forward this symphony. Amateurs will be glad to hear other novelties from him.

Clipping from Tribune
New Haven Conn
Date 1/14

NIKISCH'S SECOND.

Another Excellent Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Herr Nikisch, passed off at the Hyperion last evening with as great eclat as any ever enjoyed by New Haven music-lovers. With the exception of the names of Schumann and Mendelssohn, the composers were somewhat unfamiliar to others than strictly musical people. The concert opened with the overture from the opera, "Genoveva," by Schumann. This, when first produced, was received with little enthusiasm, as Schumann's genius was too far in advance of his own time to obtain the immediate recognition which that of his illustrious contemporary Mendelssohn, received. The rendering was very fine; though the piece was not such as to arrest great attention. The Symphonie Espagnole, of modern character, by Lalo, was beautifully rendered by the violinist, C. M. Loeffler, whose sympathetic playing was best heard in the andante movement, but the naivete of the Scherzando and the bright cheerfulness of the Rondo were particularly appreciated by the audience. The orchestral effects in the latter part of the Rondo deserves special mention. The Norwegian Rhapsody of Svendsen contained the weird beauty and delightfully melodious arias of Northern music, and the abrupt termination after a succession of sweet harmonies was truly characteristic. Perhaps the feature of the evening was the beautiful flute solo rendered by Charles Mole, who deserves the world-wide fame he has won. It will be remembered that Gericke introduced him into this country a few years ago. He is from Paris. He received prolonged and hearty applause to which unfortunately he did not respond. The closing number was the Symphony in A (Italian) of Mendelssohn, of which the andante movement, the well-known Pilgrim's March was most enjoyed. The final movement, a regular Tarantelle, was full

[58]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 15th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH, Managers of Philadelphia Concerts.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Press New York Ny.

Date 1/15-

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch and his splendid band from Boston played a symphony new to our concert frequenters last evening at Steinway Hall, a symphony in E flat, No. 1, by Alexander Borodin, a Russian, who died a few years ago at the age of 50.

Borodin wrote only two symphonies, and they have rarely been played outside of Russia. Mr. Nikisch had the honor of conducting the one in E flat at the German Musical Festival, which was held in Leipzig in 1883, and his familiarity with it was illustrated by the fact that he conducted the composition last evening without the score—a custom that seems to be invariable with him.

A novelty of this importance—for the composer is unknown to local connoisseurs save through an orchestral piece called "On the Steppes" and some chamber music—lent great interest to the programme, and served to draw a large and cultured audience to the concert. The impression that the work leaves after a single hearing is, on the whole, favorable, but the composition is not all on the same plane of excellence.

The allegro movements show the composer at his best. The Slav temperament seems to be reflected in these portions of the symphony with more power, more directness of purpose and more vigorous spirit, than in the scherzo or in the andante. The subjects are treated with firmness and consistency, the scoring being full, rich and virile, and a just proportion between the several choirs being maintained throughout.

The work, in these movements especially, and also in the trio of the scherzo, is characterized by individuality, vitality and variety of color, and is well worthy of the attention of our local orchestras. The andante is ingenious and interesting, but not so impressive as the fast movements, while the scherzo loses something in clearness on account of the nature of the leading theme and the rapidity with which it is given.

The band played the symphony superbly, with a splendid body of tone and with a sympathetic appreciation of all of the beauties of the score. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark was masterly. We doubt if the composition has ever been played with finer effect in this city; all the dramatic, romantic and poetic meaning of the work being brought out with the utmost finish and power.

The other two numbers were Saint-Saens's concerto in A minor, opus 33, the solo part being admirably played by Anton Hekking, the successor of Fritz Giese, and Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56. The concert was a delightful one, and those that are to follow by the same orchestra should be largely patronized.

[59]

AMUSEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts. The four compositions that made up the programme of yesterday's concert, although as unlike to one another as could be wished, were capitally chosen to bring out the strongest points of Mr Nikisch's forces. They were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for violoncello in A minor, Opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, and (to New York audiences) a new symphony—No. 1, in E flat, by Alexander Borodin.

Of these four works, Goldmark's well-known overture is to be referred to as having emphasized most forcefully the excellences of the band and the emotional quality of its guiding spirit. Nothing more suavely beautiful can be imagined than its rendering of Goldmark's familiar tone-poem, a composition of rare loveliness and sensuous charm, albeit not wholly free from the somewhat lachrymose character of most of the musician's writings. As a medium through which the strength of the band in its different divisions was, if anything, still more vividly shown, Brahms's variations were yet more valuable, and whatever charm could be imparted to a series of technical tours de force by a rendering accurate, clear cut, and of all attainable tonal sweetness and muscularity, according as one or the other was required, was generously bestowed. Saint-Saëns's 'cello concerto is more interesting because of the daintiness and occasional vivacity of its scoring than through any other attributes. The solo part was assigned to Mr. Anton Hekking, who gets a good if not a particularly rich tone from his instrument, and whose execution is clean and unaffected, though neither very emotional nor brilliant.

The novelty on the programme was Borodin's symphony, which is fairly well known in Russia and in Germany, but which had last night its first hearing in this city. Borodin's name was brought before the local public two or three years ago in connection with a brief tone poem of exceptional eloquence and color, entitled, "On the Steppes." His symphony, which shows him to have acquired a mastery of the resources of modern instrumentation, is cast, of course, in a wholly different mould, and is of such proportions and elaborateness as to elude apprehension through a single performance. As a whole, its impression is vague, save in respect of its rhythmical vigor and rich instrumental color. Of its four movements—adagio—allegro, Scherzo, andante, and allegro molto vivo—The first and third are more Russian than the remainder. The scherzo prestissimo is marked by a graceful fancifulness, and by many dainty effects of sonority. The ultimate suggestion of the symphony, however, is that its composer was more ingenious than inspired, a reflection, in truth, that forced itself even upon the most delighted listener to "On the Steppes." The concert drew a large audience, and Mr. Mikisch had two recalls after each of the four pieces on the house-bill.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1890

Music.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

E. A. MacDowell, Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25.
(New, first time.)
Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54.
Gade.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor

The Schumann pianoforte concerto was played by Mrs. Steiniger Clark. Her interpretation of this immortal work was marked by earnestness and care; indeed, such minute attention was paid to detail that there were no salient points, no musical effects, legitimate or illegitimate. Instead of fire, passion, the sweetness arising from strength, was seen a correctness which was insipidity. Her technique enables her to play with remarkable clearness; on the other hand, her tone is small, and she seems to have but little sense of color or rhythm.

There is no disputing the fact that the first symphony of Gade is an applause-provoking work. The people like the charming scherzo and the sugary andantino. The hands are the hands of Gade, but the voice is the familiar voice of Mendelssohn. No wonder that the latter praised it so heartily and wrote to his sister that he wondered more and more with every bar, and yet felt more at home. For when Mendelssohn swung the censer, it was not simply to tickle the nostrils of another.

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions; and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine and at the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes; and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine "motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week. Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard, they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint-Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of construction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form or seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterwards identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself, "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say, "and when A, B, and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed program; and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind), that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or as Sir Thomas Browne puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer. But the modern school of sophist-musicians believe in program-music and "symphonic poems"; and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought. We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, towards that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive; and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day, the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell as he goes on and forward in his musical career will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "program music."

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 19, 1890.

BUFFALO WON'T HEAR ELIJAH.

Several Thousand Dollars Are Missing and Cannot be Found.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 18.—Buffalo was to have had a great musical festival in May, with a magnificent chorus, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Emil Fischer and other noted soloists. Perhaps it will have, but it is doubtful. The whyfore is that the money is gone; where, no one seems to know; why, no one knows. But gone it is.

A year ago, Rev. E. C. F. Ernst of the St. Jacob's church sought to give the oratorio of "Elijah" to raise funds for his church. His plans grew and developed until it became evident that it was a bigger thing than he could handle. Music Hall, with its 3000 seating capacity, was engaged for three nights, and tickets to fill the hall for two performances had already been sold. Mr. Ernst said at this time he sought the aid of a number of able musicians and others of this city, in order to perfect his arrangements in a proper manner. He said that there had been collected several thousand dollars, which were deposited in bank.

In the meantime a chorus, the best ever organized in this city, had been working on the oratorio, and most of the parts were mastered. A few weeks ago those who had consented to aid the enterprise found that there was no money in the bank. Ernst then said it had been used to pay notes against his church. Mr. Mischka, who has been drilling the chorus, withdrew, and the whole festival is apt to collapse. The statements given above are contained in a document prepared late tonight, and signed by John Lund, Joseph Mischka, H. E. Dudley, A. G. Bigelow, Anton Corvinus, Charlotte Mulligan and C. W. Wagner.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

8

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 15th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH, Managers of Philadelphia Concerts.

Clipping No.

Clipping from New York Ry.

Date 1/15-

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch and his splendid band from Boston played a symphony new to our concert frequenters last evening at Steinway Hall, a symphony in E flat, No. 1, by Alexander Borodin, a Russian, who died a few years ago at the age of 50.

Borodin wrote only two symphonies, and they have rarely been played outside of Russia. Mr. Nikisch had the honor of conducting the one in E flat at the German Musical Festival, which was held in Leipzig in 1883, and his familiarity with it was illustrated by the fact that he conducted the composition last evening without the score—a custom that seems to be invariable with him.

A novelty of this importance—for the composer is unknown to local connoisseurs save through an orchestral piece called "On the Steppes" and some chamber music—lent great interest to the programme, and served to draw a large and cultured audience to the concert. The impression that the work leaves after a single hearing is, on the whole, favorable, but the composition is not all on the same plane of excellence.

The allegro movements show the composer at his best. The Slav temperament seems to be reflected in these portions of the symphony with more power, more directness of purpose and more vigorous spirit, than in the scherzo or in the andante. The subjects are treated with firmness and consistency, the scoring being full, rich and virile, and a just proportion between the several choirs being maintained throughout.

The work, in these movements especially, and also in the trio of the scherzo, is characterized by individuality, vitality and variety of color, and is well worthy of the attention of our local orchestras. The andante is ingenious and interesting, but not so impressive as the fast movements, while the scherzo loses something in clearness on account of the nature of the leading theme and the rapidity with which it is given.

The band played the symphony superbly, with a splendid body of tone and with a sympathetic appreciation of all of the beauties of the score. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark was masterly. We doubt if the composition has ever been played with finer effect in this city; all the dramatic, romantic and poetic meaning of the work being brought out with the utmost finish and power.

The other two numbers were Saint-Saens's concerto in A minor, opus 33, the solo part being admirably played by Anton Hekking, the successor of Fritz Giese, and Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56. The concert was a delightful one, and those that are to follow by the same orchestra should be largely patronized.

59

AMUSEMENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts. The four compositions that made up the programme of yesterday's concert, although as unlike to one another as could be wished, were capitally chosen to bring out the strongest points of Mr Nikisch's forces. They were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for violoncello in A minor, Opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, and (to New York audiences) a new symphony—No. 1, in E flat, by Alexander Borodin.

Of these four works, Goldmark's well-known overture is to be referred to as having emphasized most forcefully the excellences of the band and the emotional quality of its guiding spirit. Nothing more suavely beautiful can be imagined than its rendering of Goldmark's familiar tone-poem, a composition of rare loveliness and sensuous charm, albeit not wholly free from the somewhat lachrymose character of most of the musician's writings. As a medium through which the strength of the band in its different divisions was, if anything, still more vividly shown, Brahms's variations were yet more valuable, and whatever charm could be imparted to a series of technical tours de force by a rendering accurate, clear cut, and of all attainable tonal sweetness and muscularity, according as one or the other was required, was generously bestowed. Saint-Saëns's 'cello concerto is more interesting because of the daintiness and occasional vivacity of its scoring than through anyother attributes. The solo part was assigned to Mr. Anton Hekking, who gets a good if not a particularly rich tone from his instrument, and whose execution is clean and unaffected, though neither very emotional nor brilliant.

The novelty on the programme was Borodin's symphony, which is fairly well known in Russia and in Germany, but which had last night its first hearing in this city. Borodin's name was brought before the local public two or three years ago in connection with a brief tone poem of exceptional elogunence and color, entitled, "On the Steppes." His symphony, which shows him to have acquired a mastery of the resources of modern instrumentation, is cast, of course, in a wholly different mould, and is of such proportions and elaborateness as to elude apprehension through a single performance. As a whole, its impression is vague, save in respect of its rhythmical vigor and rich instrumental color. Of its four movements—adagio—allegro, Scherzo, andante, and allegro molto vivo—The first and third are more Russian than the remainder. The scherzo prestissimo is marked by a graceful fancifulness, and by many dainty effects of sonority. The ultimate suggestion of the symphony, however, is that its composer was more ingenious than inspired, a reflection, in truth, that forced itself even upon the most delighted listener to "On the Steppes." The concert drew a large audience, and Mr. Mikisch had two recalls after each of the four pieces on the house-bill.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1890

Music.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

E. A. MacDowell, Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25.
(New, first time.)
Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54.
Gade.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor

The Schumann pianoforte concerto was played by Mrs. Steiniger Clark. Her interpretation of this immortal work was marked by earnestness and care; indeed, such minute attention was paid to detail that there were no salient points, no musical effects, legitimate or illegitimate. Instead of fire, passion, the sweetness arising from strength, was seen a correctness which was insipidity. Her technique enables her to play with remarkable clearness; on the other hand, her tone is small, and she seems to have but little sense of color or rhythm.

There is no disputing the fact that the first symphony of Gade is an applause-provoking work. The people like the charming scherzo and the sugary andantino. The hands are the hands of Gade, but the voice is the familiar voice of Mendelssohn. No wonder that the latter praised it so heartily and wrote to his sister that he wondered more and more with every bar, and yet felt more at home. For when Mendelssohn swung the censer, it was not simply to tickle the nostrils of another.

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions; and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine and at the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes; and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine "motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week. Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard, they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint-Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of construction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form or seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterwards identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself, "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say, "and when A, B, and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed program; and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind), that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or as Sir Thomas Browne puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer. But the modern school of sophist-musicians believe in program-music and "symphonic poems"; and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought. We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, towards that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive; and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day, the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell as he goes on and forward in his musical career will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "program music."

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 19, 1890.

BUFFALO WON'T HEAR ELIJAH.

Several Thousand Dollars Are Missing and Cannot be Found.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 18.—Buffalo was to have had a great musical festival in May, with a magnificent chorus, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Emil Fischer and other noted soloists. Perhaps it will have, but it is doubtful. The whyfore is that the money is gone; where, no one seems to know; why, no one knows. But gone it is.

A year ago, Rev. E. C. F. Ernst of the St. Jacob's church sought to give the oratorio of "Elijah" to raise funds for his church. His plans grew and developed until it became evident that it was a bigger thing than he could handle. Music Hall, with its 3000 seating capacity, was engaged for three nights, and tickets to fill the hall for two performances had already been sold. Mr. Ernst said at this time he sought the aid of a number of able musicians and others of this city, in order to perfect his arrangements in a proper manner. He said that there had been collected several thousand dollars, which were deposited in bank.

In the meantime a chorus, the best ever organized in this city, had been working on the oratorio, and most of the parts were mastered. A few weeks ago those who had consented to aid the enterprise found that there was no money in the bank. Ernst then said it had been used to pay notes against his church. Mr. Mischka, who has been drilling the chorus, withdrew, and the whole festival is apt to collapse. The statements given above are contained in a document prepared late tonight, and signed by John Lund, Joseph Mischka, H. E. Dudley, A. G. Bigelow, Anton Corvinus, Charlotte Mulligan and C. W. Wagner.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the thirteenth concert was:

MacDowell: Symphonic Poem; "Lancelot and Elaine."
Schumann: Pianoforte Concerto in A minor.
Gade: Symphony No. 1, in C minor.
Mme Anna Steiniger Clark was the pianist.

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine," heard here for the first time, is a work which gives one no little food for reflection. The work shows pretty plainly that the composer has passed through the tentative stage in his development, and that he can do as nearly what he wants to as most composers can. It bears no traces of indecision nor of executive weakness; one feels throughout that Mr. MacDowell did not write it as an experiment, to see whether he could do it or not; his mind seems to have been quite made up beforehand as to what he meant to do, and he evidently felt quite sure that he could do it. In his command over his material and over his executive means he shews a rare firmness of hand, and one feels quite safe in accepting the work as just what he meant to say. And one can recognize at once that it shows not only ability, but very conspicuous talent. One only wonders that he should have cared to write it. Mr. MacDowell has not yet passed the age at which a composer's ideals are not yet wholly his own, but are, to a great extent, embodied in the works and style of some older master. This symphonic poem of his suggests something that we have been thinking of a good deal lately, and this is that the agreement between young musicians of his generation and their older confrères who have reached middle life on the exact value of prominent composers of the modern school may not be quite so thorough as might appear at first sight. Take men like Raff or Brahms, take Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz: almost all musicians today, save some few remaining inveterate classicists who stop at Mendelssohn and Schumann, can agree in admiring them warmly, and in enjoying their works to a greater or less extent. And yet there is a shade of difference. We have often suspected, and Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" makes us surer of it than ever, that the rising generation of musicians, to which he belongs, often admire the great composers of the present era for certain traits that we, who are somewhat older, admire them in spite of. We admir and enjoy them, we recognize their genius, but not quite with the heart-wholeness that the younger men do. Mr. MacDowell, for instance, evidently has a warm sympathy with Raff and with Liszt men whom we all can agree in admiring to a certain extent; but, more than this, he plainly sympathizes with them in some of their tendencies which we are merely willing to endure. What seems to us like a blot on their talent, amply excused and compensated for by other finer traits, but still a blot, seems to him no blot at all, but an ornament. He is willing and anxious to go with them to all lengths, and perhaps even further than they. Take this symphonic poem of his; its brilliancy, its decision of style, the evenness with which the composer attains his ends are all admirable. But, with all these merits staring us in the face, we still find it utterly impossible to put ourselves in the place of a composer who wants to write music so amorphous, so lacking in consistency and coherence of form, so like a rhapsodical improvisation. We can not understand how that kind of thing can satisfy him, or seem to him worth while. It throws its whole weight upon certain traits which we are willing to endure in Liszt, but which we heartily wish he were free from, and which we can imagine no man's imitating.

Gade's admirable first symphony was most brilliantly played, and made an immense impression. We could not quite like the fluctuations in tempo in the slow movement; they were highly expressive, but they impaired the fine serenity of the music, and made it too consciously emotional. But, for the rest, the symphony was grandly played. Mme. Steiniger Clark played the Schumann concerto in a way that can be spoken of with respect; but she has not the physical strength necessary to make the work effective. The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Die schöne Melusine;" Weber, air from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt;" Dvorák, songs with pianoforte; Schumann, symphong No. 2 in E flat (Rhenish). Mr W. J. Winch will be the singer.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON:

SATURDAY ....Ja.. ary 18, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The work of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, has already been made known in Washington this winter, but last evening's appearance of Mr. Nikisch at the head of his "band of virtuosos," as the incomparable organization has aptly been styled, was to very many Washington music lovers the first. The program was distinctively modern and thus served to show some of the most characteristic points in Mr. Nikisch's thoroughly original methods. His performance of this "Freischuetz" overture must emphatically be called one of the most remarkable orchestral achievements that can well be thought of in its absolute realization of a very noble and splendid conception. It thoroughly represented the intensely romantic spirit of the overture and set it forth with a marvelous dramatic effectiveness and warm poetic spirit that filled the well-known work with a world of new meaning and subtle suggestiveness. Mr. Nikisch's reading is evidently based on Wagner's acute and enthusiastic analysis of it in his great essay on conducting, and many of its traits can be traced back to this inspiring treatise, especially the striking effects gained by almost imperceptible variations in the tempo, slight and gradual accelerations, the sudden return to the slower time at the recurrence of the cantabile melody; the long, momentous pause before the commencement of the final section, and the tremendous effectiveness of the two fortissimo chords with which it is introduced—both pause and chords so seldom held long enough to secure the overpowering effect intended by the composer.

Miss Clementine de Vere was the soloist and created an obviously deep impression by her beautifully sympathetic, round and full soprano voice and her fluent and extraordinarily brilliant singing of floriture. The favorite aria from "The Magic Flute" she gave with much spirit and sympathy; while so brilliant was her performance of the aria from David's "Perles de Brazil" that she was obliged to repeat it. Mr. Mole played the obligato most acceptably.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1890.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Borodine.....Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
(First time in America.)
Saint Saens.....
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61
(First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.....Festival Overture, in F, op. 50
(First time at these concerts.)

It is stated in the annotated program of this concert that the "only performance in Germany" of the Symphony in E-flat of Borodine was "at the Lower Rhine Festival of 1883, held at Wiesbaden, when it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch." This statement is not correct. The Symphony was also brought out in Berlin Feb. 11, 1884, by Franz Wüllner at the second concert of his second season. It was superbly played; and it provoked discussion; yet they who were not pleased with the work, admitted its strength and spoke of it respectfully. Nor indeed is it a composition to be idly passed over; to be carelessly dismissed with a jest.

It is safe to say that the originality, flavor, and characteristics of any national school of music can be seen in the folk-songs of the nation; now the greater number of Russian folk-songs handed down from one generation to the next were conceived in the "tonality" of plain song; and so the "tonality" of modern Russian music affects strangely our ears accustomed as they are to the modern major and minor. It is true that plain-song ruled formerly in Germany, Italy and France, and even now in the streets of Paris men and women hawk their wares in pure Gregorian: as, "voila l'plaisir, mesdames, voila l' plaisir!" But the modern tonality predominates generally throughout even the rural districts of these three countries, while in Russia plain-song has almost held its own, although Russian critics deplore the fact that by means of hand-organs and orchestrions and cheap editions of Western music, their people learn Italian and French melodies with "deplorable ease." Now the "tonality" of plain song if sparingly used is effective and beautiful in dramatic music of the present day; as for example Meyerbeer's use of it in "The Prophet" and Gounod's in "King of Thule." Unless it is discreetly employed, if it permeates the whole composition, it results in monotony, and that which at first attracted and charmed, soon repels and wearies. Take again an example, "On the Steppes," a short orchestral piece by Borodine, a composition extremely effective chiefly on account of its old tonality and singular instrumentation; the piece is not so long that the ear becomes accustomed to strange impressions and is sated.

The chief characteristics of pure Russian music, the music of Stcherbatcheff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Tschaikowsky and others are then a perhaps inevitable predilection for an old tonality, a consequent tendency toward profound melancholy, a sense of rhythm which at times degenerates into barbaric frenzy uncontrolled by form, a love of the grotesque. If the Russians have been influenced by any one, and have taken ideas from other nations (and in music there is no such word as Protection), they have looked towards France rather than Germany; and the deep and lasting impression made by the appearance of Hector Berlioz in Russia is seen to-day in all music coming from that country.

Now the national characteristics of a musical composition should not so predominate that its pure and cosmopolitan musical beauties take a second place and can not readily be appreciated by the hearers of another and far-removed nation. A musician should not write merely for his own people; he should write for the whole musical world. At the same time a Russian composer has a right to expect that the audience of a foreign country should not capriciously say, "This music differs from that which we have been in the habit of hearing; therefore it is not good and we do not like it. It is Russian, therefore it must be barbarous stuff." He has a right to reply, "It is true I am a Russian; I am necessarily influenced by my temperament, by traditions, by associations. Gogol and Dostoievsky were affected by the conditions under which they wrote, their habit of thought and mode of expression differed from the habit and mode of Fielding or Balzac or Hawthorne; do you therefore deny them a place in literature? Is there nothing in this work of mine except 'local color' or 'national eccentricity?'"

How is it then with this Symphony of Borodine presented to an orthodox Boston audience in Music Hall? Is it possible to judge of it after one hearing? Must not one condemn superficially or praise too suddenly? Is one not too apt to weigh a new work in a self-adjusted balance without stopping to think that this balance may be false? Let us then only put down impressions. And now let it be said that the first movement is most ingenious, curiously scored; at times fascinating in the extreme, particularly in the employment of the wood wind, occasionally almost ugly in the treatment of the strings; abounding in beautiful passages placed side by side with that which seems intentionally grotesque; there are strange and effective passages for the brass;—as a whole, this movement seems too long, and there is an almost painful reiteration of that which is in itself of little value,—as in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés" a trifling infirmity of Stépan is dwelt upon until it becomes a bore. The second movement suggests to some the "Queen Mab" music of Berlioz. The resemblance is not so striking that the word "plagiarism" can be used. On the contrary, both the Scherzo and the Andante, though certain measures may bring the great Frenchman to the mind, are, from many points of view, very original. And the instrumentation is striking and at the same time clear. It is true that Berlioz was fond of the English horn, and that Borodine uses it in this symphony as in other works of his. But are certain passages given by Wagner to divided strings any the less beautiful because in the "Caduta de 'Decemviri" of Alessandro Scarlatti nearly three centuries ago the first violins were divided into four parts. Others object to the "melancholy" nature of the andante just as others demand that the "ending" of all novels and plays should be cheerful. This is such a gay world, life is such a blessed thing, the gaining of enough meat to keep one's body and soul together and of sufficient clothing to cover one's nakedness is such a mere joke to thousands, that melancholy has no place among us; nor should music which gives rise to melancholy be any more encouraged than a lonely moor or the sinking of a ship in midocean.

The last movement of this strange symphony is Schumanesque and remarkable for its rhythmic difficulties. It is the least interesting part of the work. As a whole the composition is undeniably worthy of another hearing; for whether it is the work of a professional or an amateur, it is too strongly and earnestly written to be contemptuously passed by.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski played a new concerto for the violin by Saint Saens. It was written for Sarasate, and it is intentionally a concerto for violin, "with accompaniment of orchestra." It may be here remarked that the accompaniment was coarsely played; so that the exquisite instrumentation lost in effect, and the soloist at times was seen and not heard. Mr. Nikisch from the very start has been unfortunate in the matter of accompanying a soloist; here his experience as a theater director should help him. The moment however he accompanies pianist, violinist or singer, the soloist, Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra are at cross purposes. Since this is the rule and not the exception, it is evidently the fault of Mr. Nikisch. The concerto itself abounds in pleasing melodies, and it is a "grateful" composition for a soloist; though it cannot be placed among the best works of Saint Saens. Mr. Adamowski played it with taste, and it is pleasant to observe at his successive performances a steady gain in tone. He was very warmly applauded.

The Volkmann Overture, a pièce d'occasion, if cut down a little, would make a good "theater overture." It is well written and is an eminently respectable composition containing nothing which could offend the most sensitive hearer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1890.

The Soloist of the Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine."

Review of New Music—Paragraphs—Notes—News—Nuggets.

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert was:

E. A. MacDowell. Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine." op. 25, [New, first time.]
Schumann. Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54.
Gade. Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark was the soloist. Familiar as we are with the subjective attitude towards the composer habitual with this sincere and admirable artist, we are led to infer that the unusual repression of self apparent in her playing on Saturday night was due to some temporary cause. Though we do not disagree with Mme. Steiniger-Clark's reading—which is probably patterned after Mme. Clara Schumann's, who, contrary to the custom of many pianists, treats the work from its imaginative and poetic side, reducing to the minimum its "storm and stress"—yet to make entirely clear this conception requires a sturdier physical quality than in the present instance she could command. The spirit of the playing was eminently musical, and technically it lacked no important quality. Mme. Steiniger-Clark's regard for rhythm is a factor of importance in her interpretations. At the close of the work, which was carefully accompanied by the orchestra, the pianist was cordially recalled.

Gade's lovely symphony, which Mr. Nikisch conducted from score, was played exquisitely, and in the finale, whose brusque theme completely dominates, with surpassing vigor and sonority. The ever-welcome andante and the fascinating scherzo were perfect as regards finish, while the result of the care given the nuances in the former and the expression imparted to the latter will long be remembered as fine moments in Mr. Nikisch's first season. It may interest amateurs to know that Gade has just had performed at Copenhagen a work for three male, two female voices and chorus, entitled "Der Strom" (subject from Goethe's "Mahomet").

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" is to be judged not as abstract, but as programme music. Tennyson's idyl suggested certain things to the musician who has embodied them in the form invested by Liszt and accepted by Saint-Saëns. It is a fascinating form for the imaginative writer, and Mr. MacDowell's pictorial sense is so vivid and his command of the instruments so sure that he makes no mistake in utilizing it. The use of representative themes in "Lancelot and Elaine" is felicitous; the subjects themselves speak to us and their metamorphosis is accomplished most artistically. The scoring is for full orchestra, though the instruments of percussion are sparingly used. To single out for emphasis portions where the composer seems most successful is perhaps not necessary, yet the effective instrumentation of the "tournament" section and the impressively beautiful closing scene are features of especial note. In no work of Mr. MacDowell's played here is there evidence of so sure a knowledge of the orchestra and of the normal capacity of individual instruments as in the one under consideration. It is essentially poetic, and only an artist could have written it. The performance showed Mr. Nikisch's hearty interest in the work, and considering how well the horn player did under especially trying circumstances, was eminently effective. The audience enthusiastically applauded the work, and compelled the composer to bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the gallery. In this connection it is gratifying to friends of the American school to note the recent performance in Breslau of Mr. MacDowell's "Hamlet and Ophelia," and the intended presentation of his first pianoforte concerto in Berlin by Mme. Carreno on the 16th inst.

There will be no concert this week. On the 18th, with Mr. W. J. Winch as soloist, this programme will be performed; Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusine;" Weber, aria, "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt" (first time in these concerts); Dvorák, songs with piano, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter." (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge;" Schumann, symphony in E flat (Rhenish.)

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 18, 1890.

[60]

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the series was given on last Tuesday evening at Steinway Hall. The programme opened with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," that poetic conception which brought the composer into prominence. With the opening measures we felt that Mr. Nikisch certainly had control over his men for sudden swells and dimmuendos, which he knows so well how to bring forth, characterized this performance as they did the various numbers of the first concert.

The violoncello concerto by Saint Saëns was performed in a masterly manner by Mr. A. Hekking. This composition is both interesting and pleasing, but at the same time it gives us the impression, on a single hearing, that it fails to impress the audience with that degree of awe which might be excited by another composition of equal difficulty, but of a more "showy" character—what the Germans term more dankbar.

The "Variations Upon a Theme, by Haydn," composed by that double acrostician Brahms, were both characteristic of the composer and interesting. At one time we have double contrapuntal figures—triplets in a middle voice—wind—against four notes in the upper voice—string; then these figures are inverted, e. g., windy triplets in outer voice—versus stringy grouplets of four notes in middle voice. Who but Brahms could concoct these compound complexities and intricate contrapuntal tortuosities? Doubtless no one, and we accordingly drop a tribute at his shrine in the form of a sigh of admiration, not a tear of emotion.

The symphony by the Russian composer, Barodin, was a pleasing novelty. The thematic material was good throughout, and the interest was sustained to the end; in fact, the last movement, singularly enough, seemed the most satisfactory of all. It suggests, in rythm and working out, the last movements of Schumann's D minor symphony, same as the latter reminds one of the finale of Beethoven's D major symphony. A queer illustration of the interdependence of musical writers.

The scherzo movement is a charming thing and brings to mind a multitude of brownies chasing each other, so piquant and picturesque is it in character.

In some portions of this work, it seemed strange to see Mr. Nikisch beating one kind of time apparently and his orchestra playing in another; however, all went well, so if the orchestra does not object, and plays so admirably, we listeners ought not, certainly, to find fault. Like the man addressing his throbbing tooth: "Ache away, d—— it, will you? I can stand it as long as you can!"

MANHATTAN.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON JANUARY 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TOUR.

It is a cause for great local pride that the Boston Symphony orchestra has again made a most successful tour in the leading eastern cities, and Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, appears to have won as great a personal following in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore as he enjoys here. The record of the week just ended is a great credit to all concerned in the maintenance of this organization, and there is every reason to anticipate even more success for the further tours planned during the present season. Whatever differences of opinion there may have been as to the success attending the earlier efforts of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, no one can justly feel other than sincere admiration for his untiring zeal and conscientious efforts to make his organization the best in the country, and the position he now holds has been conquered by the most honest endeavor. Mr. Nikisch is, moreover, to be highly commended for identifying himself with America and its institutions in such a hearty fashion, and the future beneficial results of this tendency on his part cannot be overstated. The orchestra played in New Haven last Monday evening, Messrs. Loeffler and Mole, soloists; New York last Tuesday evening, Mr. Hekking, soloist; Philadelphia, Wednesday, Mlle. DeVere, soloist; Baltimore, Thursday, Mr. Kneisel, soloist; Washington, Friday, Mlle. DeVere, soloist, and again in Philadelphia last evening, Messrs. Adamowski and Mole, soloists, this last appearance being under the auspices of a committee of ladies, and in aid of the Hahnemann Hospital of that city. The business done on this tour has been very large, and in Philadelphia it was simply enormous.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1890.

Mr. William J. Winch is to be the soloist at the next symphony concert, and the programme is to be as follows: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts;) songs with piano, Dvorak, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter," (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge;" symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The Symphony Orchestra has met with another ovation in its second trip to New York and other cities in the South. At two concerts Miss Clementina De Vere was the soloist, a selection which will be extremely welcome in Boston.

Miss Gertrude Franklin is announced as a future soloist at the Symphony concerts.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the thirteenth concert was:

MacDowell: Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine."
Schumann: Pianoforte Concerto in A minor.
Gade: Symphony No. 1, in C minor.
Mme Anna Steiniger Clark was the pianist.

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine," heard here for the first time, is a work which gives one no little food for reflection. The work shows pretty plainly that the composer has passed through the tentative stage in his development, and that he can do as nearly what he wants to as most composers can. It bears no traces of indecision nor of executive weakness; one feels throughout that Mr. MacDowell did not write it as an experiment, to see whether he could do it or not; his mind seems to have been quite made up beforehand as to what he meant to do, and he evidently felt quite sure that he could do it. In his command over his material and over his executive means he shews a rare firmness of hand, and one feels quite safe in accepting the work as just what he meant to say. And one can recognize at once that it shows not only ability, but very conspicuous talent. One only wonders that he should have cared to write it. Mr. MacDowell has not yet passed the age at which a composer's ideals are not yet wholly his own, but are, to a great extent, embodied in the works and style of some older master. This symphonic poem of his suggests something that we have been thinking of a good deal lately, and this is that the agreement between young musicians of his generation and their older confrères who have reached middle life on the exact value of prominent composers of the modern school may not be quite so thorough as might appear at first sight. Take men like Raff or Brahms, take Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz: almost all musicians today, save some few remaining inveterate classicists who stop at Mendelssohn and Schumann, can agree in admiring them warmly, and in enjoying their works to a greater or less extent. And yet there is a shade of difference. We have often suspected, and Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" makes us surer of it than ever, that the rising generation of musicians, to which he belongs, often admire the great composers of the present era for certain traits that we, who are somewhat older, admire them in spite of. We admir and enjoy them, we recognize their genius, but not quite with the heart-wholeness that the younger men do. Mr. MacDowell, for instance, evidently has a warm sympathy with Raff and with Liszt men whom we all can agree in admiring to a certain extent; but, more than this, he plainly sympathizes with them in some of their tendencies which we are merely willing to endure. What seems to us like a blot on their talent, amply excused and compensated for by other finer traits, but still a blot, seems to him no blot at all, but an ornament. He is willing and anxious to go with them to all lengths, and perhaps even further than they. Take this symphonic poem of his; its brilliancy, its decision of style, the evenness with which the composer attains his ends are all admirable. But, with all these merits staring us in the face, we still find it utterly impossible to put ourselves in the place of a composer who wants to write music so amorphous, so lacking in consistency and coherence of form, so like a rhapsodical improvisation. We can not understand how that kind of thing can satisfy him, or seem to him worth while. It throws its whole weight upon certain traits which we are willing to endure in Liszt, but which we heartily wish he were free from, and which we can imagine no man's imitating.

Gade's admirable first symphony was most brilliantly played, and made an immense impression. We could not quite like the fluctuations in tempo in the slow movement; they were highly expressive, but they impaired the fine serenity of the music, and made it too consciously emotional. But, for the rest, the symphony was grandly played. Mme. Steiniger Clark played the Schumann concerto in a way that can be spoken of with respect; but she has not the physical strength necessary to make the work effective. The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Die schöne Melusine;" Weber, air from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt;" Dvorák, songs with pianoforte; Schumann, symphong No. 2 in E flat (Rhenish). Mr W. J. Winch will be the singer.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON:

SATURDAY ....Jan ·ary 18, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The work of the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, has already been made known in Washington this winter, but last evening's appearance of Mr. Nikisch at the head of his "band of virtuosos," as the incomparable organization has aptly been styled, was to very many Washington music lovers the first. The program was distinctively modern and thus served to show some of the most characteristic points in Mr. Nikisch's thoroughly original methods. His performance of this "Freischuetz" overture must emphatically be called one of the most remarkable orchestral achievements that can well be thought of in its absolute realization of a very noble and splendid conception. It thoroughly represented the intensely romantic spirit of the overture and set it forth with a marvelous dramatic effectiveness and warm poetic spirit that filled the well-known work with a world of new meaning and subtle suggestiveness. Mr. Nikisch's reading is evidently based on Wagner's acute and enthusiastic analysis of it in his great essay on conducting, and many of its traits can be traced back to this inspiring treatise, especially the striking effects gained by almost imperceptible variations in the tempo, slight and gradual accelerations, the sudden return to the slower time at the recurrence of the cantabile melody; the long, momentous pause before the commencement of the final section, and the tremendous effectiveness of the two fortissimo chords with which it is introduced—both pause and chords so seldom held long enough to secure the overpowering effect intended by the composer.

Miss Clementine de Vere was the soloist and created an obviously deep impression by her beautifully sympathetic, round and full soprano voice and her fluent and extraordinarily brilliant singing of fioriture. The favorite aria from "The Magic Flute" she gave with much spirit and sympathy; while so brilliant was her performance of the aria from David's "Perles de Brazil" that she was obliged to repeat it. Mr. Mole played the obligato most acceptably.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1890.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Borodine.....Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
(First time in America.)
Saint Saens.....
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61
(First time in Boston.)
Volkmann.....Festival Overture, in F, op. 50
(First time at these concerts.)

It is stated in the annotated program of this concert that the "only performance in Germany" of the Symphony in E-flat of Borodine was "at the Lower Rhine Festival of 1883, held at Wiesbaden, when it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch." This statement is not correct. The Symphony was also brought out in Berlin Feb. 11, 1884, by Franz Wüllner at the second concert of his second season. It was superbly played; and it provoked discussion; yet they who were not pleased with the work, admitted its strength and spoke of it respectfully. Nor indeed is it a composition to be idly passed over; to be carelessly dismissed with a jest.

It is safe to say that the originality, flavor, and characteristics of any national school of music can be seen in the folk-songs of the nation; now the greater number of Russian folk-songs handed down from one generation to the next were conceived in the "tonality" of plain song; and so the "tonality" of modern Russian music affects strangely our ears accustomed as they are to the modern major and minor. It is true that plain-song ruled formerly in Germany, Italy and France, and even now in the streets of Paris men and women hawk their wares in pure Gregorian: as, "voila l'plaisir, mesdames, voila l' plaisir!" But the modern tonality predominates generally throughout even the rural districts of these three countries, while in Russia plain-song has almost held its own, although Russian critics deplore the fact that by means of hand-organs and orchestrions and cheap editions of Western music, their people learn Italian and French melodies with "deplorable ease." Now the "tonality" of plain song if sparingly used is effective and beautiful in dramatic music of the present day; as for example Meyerbeer's use of it in "The Prophet" and Gounod's in "King of Thule." Unless it is discreetly employed, if it permeates the whole composition, it results in monotony, and that which at first attracted and charmed, soon repels and wearies. Take again an example, "On the Steppes," a short orchestral piece by Borodine, a composition extremely effective chiefly on account of its old tonality and singular instrumentation; the piece is not so long that the ear becomes accustomed to strange impressions and is sated.

The chief characteristics of pure Russian music, the music of Stcherbatcheff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Tschaikowsky and others are then a perhaps inevitable predilection for an old tonality, a consequent tendency toward profound melancholy, a sense of rhythm which at times degenerates into barbaric frenzy uncontrolled by form, a love of the grotesque. If the Russians have been influenced by any one, and have taken ideas from other nations (and in music there is no such word as Protection), they have looked towards France rather than Germany; and the deep and lasting impression made by the appearance of Hector Berlioz in Russia is seen to-day in all music coming from that country.

Now the national characteristics of a musical composition should not so predominate that its pure and cosmopolitan musical beauties take a second place and can not readily be appreciated by the hearers of another and far-removed nation. A musician should not write merely for his own people; he should write for the whole musical world. At the same time a Russian composer has a right to expect that the audience of a foreign country should not capriciously say, "This music differs from that which we have been in the habit of hearing; therefore it is not good and we do not like it. It is Russian, therefore it must be barbarous stuff." He has a right to reply, "It is true I am a Russian; I am necessarily influenced by my temperament, by traditions, by associations. Gogol and Dostoievsky were affected by the conditions under which they wrote, their habit of thought and mode of expression differed from the habit and mode of Fielding or Balzac or Hawthorne; do you therefore deny them a place in literature? Is there nothing in this work of mine except 'local color' or 'national eccentricity?'"

How is it then with this Symphony of Borodine presented to an orthodox Boston audience in Music Hall? Is it possible to judge of it after one hearing? Must not one condemn superficially or praise too suddenly? Is one not too apt to weigh a new work in a self-adjusted balance without stopping to think that this balance may be false? Let us then only put down impressions. And now let it be said that the first movement is most ingenious, curiously scored; at times fascinating in the extreme, particularly in the employment of the wood wind, occasionally almost ugly in the treatment of the strings; abounding in beautiful passages placed side by side with that which seems intentionally grotesque; there are strange and effective passages for the brass;—as a whole, this movement seems too long, and there is an almost painful reiteration of that which is in itself of little value,—as in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés" a trifling infirmity of Stépan is dwelt upon until it becomes a bore. The second movement suggests to some the "Queen Mab" music of Berlioz. The resemblance is not so striking that the word "plagiarism" can be used. On the contrary, both the Scherzo and the Andante, though certain measures may bring the great Frenchman to the mind, are, from many points of view, very original. And the instrumentation is striking and at the same time clear. It is true that Berlioz was fond of the English horn, and that Borodine uses it in this symphony as in other works of his. But are certain passages given by Wagner to divided strings any the less beautiful because in the "Caduta de 'Decemviri" of Alessandro Scarlatti nearly three centuries ago the first violins were divided into four parts. Others object to the "melancholy" nature of the andante just as others demand that the "ending" of all novels and plays should be cheerful. This is such a gay world, life is such a blessed thing, the gaining of enough meat to keep one's body and soul together and of sufficient clothing to cover one's nakedness is such a mere joke to thousands, that melancholy has no place among us; nor should music which gives rise to melancholy be any more encouraged than a lonely moor or the sinking of a ship in midocean.

The last movement of this strange symphony is Schumanesque and remarkable for its rhythmic difficulties. It is the least interesting part of the work. As a whole the composition is undeniably worthy of another hearing; for whether it is the work of a professional or an amateur, it is too strongly and earnestly written to be contemptuously passed by.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski played a new concerto for the violin by Saint Saens. It was written for Sarasate, and it is intentionally a concerto for violin, "with accompaniment of orchestra." It may be here remarked that the accompaniment was coarsely played; so that the exquisite instrumentation lost in effect, and the soloist at times was seen and not heard. Mr. Nikisch from the very start has been unfortunate in the matter of accompanying a soloist; here his experience as a theater director should help him. The moment however he accompanies pianist, violinist or singer, the soloist, Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra are at cross purposes. Since this is the rule and not the exception, it is evidently the fault of Mr. Nikisch. The concerto itself abounds in pleasing melodies, and it is a "grateful" composition for a soloist; though it cannot be placed among the best works of Saint Saens. Mr. Adamowski played it with taste, and it is pleasant to observe at his successive performances a steady gain in tone. He was very warmly applauded.

The Volkmann Overture, a pièce d'occasion, if cut down a little, would make a good "theater overture." It is well written and is an eminently respectable composition containing nothing which could offend the most sensitive hearer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1890.

The Soloist of the Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine."

Review of New Music—Paragraphs—Notes—News—Nuggets.

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert was:

E. A. MacDowell. Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," op. 25, [New, first time.]
Schumann. Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54.
Gade. Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

Mme. Anna Steiniger-Clark was the soloist. Familiar as we are with the subjective attitude towards the composer habitual with this sincere and admirable artist, we are led to infer that the unusual repression of self apparent in her playing on Saturday night was due to some temporary cause. Though we do not disagree with Mme. Steiniger-Clark's reading—which is probably patterned after Mme. Clara Schumann's, who, contrary to the custom of many pianists, treats the work from its imaginative and poetic side, reducing to the minimum its "storm and stress"—yet to make entirely clear this conception requires a sturdier physical quality than in the present instance she could command. The spirit of the playing was eminently musical, and technically it lacked no important quality. Mme. Steiniger-Clark's regard for rhythm is a factor of importance in her interpretations. At the close of the work, which was carefully accompanied by the orchestra, the pianist was cordially recalled.

Gade's lovely symphony, which Mr. Nikisch conducted from score, was played exquisitely, and in the finale, whose brusque theme completely dominates, with surpassing vigor and sonority. The ever-welcome andante and the fascinating scherzo were perfect as regards finish, while the result of the care given the nuances in the former and the expression imparted to the latter will long be remembered as fine moments in Mr. Nikisch's first season. It may interest amateurs to know that Gade has just had performed at Copenhagen a work for three male, two female voices and chorus, entitled "Der Strom" (subject from Goethe's "Mahomet").

Mr. MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" is to be judged not as abstract, but as programme music. Tennyson's idyl suggested certain things to the musician who has embodied them in the form invested by Liszt and accepted by Saint-Saëns. It is a fascinating form for the imaginative writer, and Mr. MacDowell's pictorial sense is so vivid and his command of the instruments so sure that he makes no mistake in utilizing it. The use of representative themes in "Lancelot and Elaine" is felicitous; the subjects themselves speak to us and their metamorphosis is accomplished most artistically. The scoring is for full orchestra, though the instruments of percussion are sparingly used. To single out for emphasis portions where the composer seems most successful is perhaps not necessary, yet the effective instrumentation of the "tournament" section and the impressively beautiful closing scene are features of especial note. In no work of Mr. MacDowell's played here is there evidence of so sure a knowledge of the orchestra and of the normal capacity of individual instruments as in the one under consideration. It is essentially poetic, and only an artist could have written it. The performance showed Mr. Nikisch's hearty interest in the work, and considering how well the horn player did under especially trying circumstances, was eminently effective. The audience enthusiastically applauded the work, and compelled the composer to bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the gallery. In this connection it is gratifying to friends of the American school to note the recent performance in Breslau of Mr. MacDowell's "Hamlet and Ophelia," and the intended presentation of his first pianoforte concerto in Berlin by Mme. Carreno on the 16th inst.

There will be no concert this week. On the 18th, with Mr. W. J. Winch as soloist, this programme will be performed; Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusine;" Weber, aria, "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt" (first time in these concerts); Dvorák, songs with piano, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter." (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge;" Schumann, symphony in E flat (Rhenish.)

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 18, 1890.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the series was given on last Tuesday evening at Steinway Hall. The programme opened with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," that poetic conception which brought the composer into prominence. With the opening measures we felt that Mr. Nikisch certainly had control over his men for sudden swells and dimmuendos, which he knows so well how to bring forth, characterized this performance as they did the various numbers of the first concert.

The violoncello concerto by Saint Saëns was performed in a masterly manner by Mr. A. Hekking. This composition is both interesting and pleasing, but at the same time it gives us the impression, on a single hearing, that it fails to impress the audience with that degree of awe which might be excited by another composition of equal difficulty, but of a more "showy" character—what the Germans term more dankbar.

The "Variations Upon a Theme, by Haydn," composed by that double acrostician Brahms, were both characteristic of the composer and interesting. At one time we have double contrapuntal figures—triplets in a middle voice—wind—against four notes in the upper voice—string; then these figures are inverted, e. g., windy triplets in outer voice—versus stringy grouplets of four notes in middle voice. Who but Brahms could concoct these compound complexities and intricate contrapuntal tortuosities? Doubtless no one, and we accordingly drop a tribute at his shrine in the form of a sigh of admiration, not a tear of emotion.

The symphony by the Russian composer, Barodin, was a pleasing novelty. The thematic material was good throughout, and the interest was sustained to the end; in fact, the last movement, singularly enough, seemed the most satisfactory of all. It suggests, in rythm and working out, the last movements of Schumann's D minor symphony, same as the latter reminds one of the finale of Beethoven's D major symphony. A queer illustration of the interdependence of musical writers.

The scherzo movement is a charming thing and brings to mind a multitude of brownies chasing each other, so piquant and picturesque is it in character.

In some portions of this work, it seemed strange to see Mr. Nikisch beating one kind of time apparently and his orchestra playing in another; however, all went well, so if the orchestra does not object, and plays so admirably, we listeners ought not, certainly, to find fault. Like the man addressing his throbbing tooth: "Ache away, d—— it, will you? I can stand it as long as you can!"

MANHATTAN.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON JANUARY 19, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TOUR.

It is a cause for great local pride that the Boston Symphony orchestra has again made a most successful tour in the leading eastern cities, and Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, appears to have won as great a personal following in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore as he enjoys here. The record of the week just ended is a great credit to all concerned in the maintenance of this organization, and there is every reason to anticipate even more success for the further tours planned during the present season. Whatever differences of opinion there may have been as to the success attending the earlier efforts of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, no one can justly feel other than sincere admiration for his untiring zeal and conscientious efforts to make his organization the best in the country, and the position he now holds has been conquered by the most honest endeavor. Mr. Nikisch is, moreover, to be highly commended for identifying himself with America and its institutions in such a hearty fashion, and the future beneficial results of this tendency on his part cannot be overstated. The orchestra played in New Haven last Monday evening, Messrs. Loeffler and Mole, soloists; New York last Tuesday evening, Mr. Hekking, soloist; Philadelphia, Wednesday, Mlle. De Vere, soloist; Baltimore, Thursday, Mr. Kneisel, soloist; Washington, Friday, Mlle. De Vere, soloist, and again in Philadelphia last evening, Messrs. Adamowski and Mole, soloists, this last appearance being under the auspices of a committee of ladies, and in aid of the Hahnemann Hospital of that city. The business done on this tour has been very large, and in Philadelphia it was simply enormous.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1890.

Mr. William J. Winch is to be the soloist at the next symphony concert, and the programme is to be as follows: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts;) songs with piano, Dvorak, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter." (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge;" symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The Symphony Orchestra has met with another ovation in its second trip to New York and other cities in the South. At two concerts Miss Clementina De Vere was the soloist, a selection which will be extremely welcome in Boston.

Miss Gertrude Franklin is announced as a future soloist at the Symphony concerts.

[60]

[61]

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Criticism, in the sense that the short-sighted and unreasoning employ the term, has little to do with performances like that of the Boston Symphony Society, at Steinway Hall last night. Indeed, it has little to do it in the true sense, which suggests as its province the separation of excellence from defect. It is chiefly that sublimated criticism which is all praise that is challenged by Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi; for the things that were excellent last night so greatly outnumbered those that were defective that it would be a waste of time to attempt to draw the line between them. The sound, healthy, beautiful grain hid the chaff from view. If musical New-York were disposed to petty feelings, there would be a chance for envy.

Mr. Nikisch's programme contained two compositions that have frequently been heard with admiration and two that were novel. In the overture to "Sakuntala" and Brahms's variations on a choral melody by Haydn (op. 56), the audience (an ample one by the way, but a little less exuberant in its tributes of applause than the first) was permitted to enjoy the brilliancy of the band's performance and the tastefulness, warmth and intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's readings without division of attention. In the other numbers, a concerto for violoncello (in A minor, op. 33), by Saint-Saens, and a symphony in E flat, by the Russian composer, Borodin, a two-fold exercise of judgment was asked, for the music was unfamiliar, as well as the performance. The concerto, a serious composition, which aims at artistic expression, and not at display of the solo instrument, was played by Mr. Anton Hekking, who came from Berlin to join the orchestra at the beginning of the season. Mr. Hekking is an artist of fine quality, reposeful in manner, correct in feeling, though we should say not very warm, and technically a master. His playing gave great pleasure. Russian music forcing itself upon the notice of the world almost as persistently as Russian literature, and it is quite as worthy of attention. One-half of the symphony played last night is a perfect warrant for the admission of Borodin to the ranks of modern symphonists. If the legacy which he left to the world when he died, a few years ago, before his fame had penetrated to these parts, contains any more compositions like this symphony, he deserves to share the attention now so largely monopolized by Tschaikowsky. The work is not at all revolutionary in form or manner, and only in parts does it employ some of the characteristic elements of Russian folk-music. Yet it has a most decided individuality, and its first two movements are not only original but beautiful. The first allegro is exceedingly energetic, and the distortion of rhythm by means of syncopation, puts a peculiar impress of eagerness on the first subject. The second subject is effectively contrasted in style and spirit, and, in spite of a tendency to bizarre effects in the instrumentation, the development of the themes in the free fantasia part of the movement, is full of ingenuity and beauty. The scherzo takes the second place in the symphony, and is vital with a lively, yet delicate humor, quite different from the mixture of ruggedness and melancholy so frequently found in the playful movements of Russian composers. In the trio there is a suggestion of national color, but nothing forced or unnatural. The andante and finale do not bear comparison with the other movements, either in their melodic material, or its employment. Mr. Nikisch has added materially to the interest of the musical season of New-York by bringing forward this symphony. Amateurs will be glad to hear other novelties from him.

Philadelphia Inquirer.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Second Concert Is Attended by a Greatly Enlarged and Sympathetic Audience.

Last evening at the Academy of Music Herr Nikisch found a much larger and more sympathetic audience to hear him than the one which assembled a few weeks ago. It may be said indeed that very few audiences evince so much respect, attention and interest as the very large one which listened last evening to the Boston Orchestra under its new leader.

Of course there were numbers which some of the audience would have been satisfied to see substituted. The opening "Sakuntala" overture which Thomas introduced many years ago, is a nondescript sort of affair. In the hands of Mr. Thomas, who is always repressive in his leading, it is a menagerie; but when Mr. Nikisch takes it in his hand it becomes a circus. It may be good of its kind, but it is not of a kind to compare with the remainder of the concert. The new leader made for himself an excellent record in the rendition of Brahms' variations on one of the almost infinite themes of Hayden. There has been a great deal said and written about the leading of Mr. Nikisch, and it is now a very good time to say that the most part of such writing is ignorance or clap-trap. Mr. Nikisch leads his band of eighty very much as that great musician, Carl Zerrahn, led the great Gilmore Jubilee in 1872. Usually he beats by the measure, but when passages occur of particular significance, he abandons the measured beat, and his baton expresses the phases of the composition. Nothing could have been more satisfactory than the whole fourth movement of the Fifth Symphony by Beethoven. There was no beat which interfered with any of its glorious beauty. In the first movement, on the contrary, there were several differences which we were obliged to take with him, chiefly in certain holds which he made unduly long for the theme. The great andante has been more written about than perhaps anything else which Beethoven every wrote, but one the man who wrote best about it is he who lies as dead as the once famous "Star Papers" in which it appears, Henry Ward Beecher. Mr. Nikisch led it splendidly, and what is particularly worthy of praise is the way in which he conveyed the full meaning in the second movement of the change from andante to andante con moto. Too few of our most thoughtful leaders remember this very important distinction. When Thomas does it he overdoes it.

The vocalist of the evening was Mlle. Clementine de Vere. She sang the aria of the "Queen of Night," from Mozart's "Magic Fluto," as her opening performance and later the aria from "Perles de Brazil," which Emma Nevada once made pleasing here. Both of these airs were warmly applauded and the latter had to be repeated.

Baltimore American and Commercial Advertiser

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Given Last Night at the Lyceum Theater.

The program for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Lyceum Theater last evening, was far superior to the first one of the season, and one in every way worthy of that remarkably fine organization of musicians. It consisted entirely of modern works, Goldmark, Brahms, Wagner and Schumann being the list of composers. At the last concert there were but one or two works that required the full power of the organization, while last evening all parts of the orchestra found sufficient employment.

The works of composers of the classical school can be readily performed by our own home organizations, and, therefore, when we are visited by larger bodies of musicians, it is but fair to expect the fullest modern orchestrial work.

The program opened with Goldmark's overture to Sakuntola, a Hindu drama, by Kalidasa, the Hindu Shakspeare, dated somewhere between two and three thousand years ago. It is one of the finest dramas that was ever written, and when first presented in an English translation it created a taste and desire for the study of Sanscrit literature that has been increasing ever since.

The hero of the story is Dashmonto, a Hindoo king, who, while hunting, discovers a modest and beautiful maiden, to whom he marries himself by the Ghondorva ceremony of giving a ring. Afterward, by a spell put on by evil spirits, he forgets her, and when she presents herself at his court he ignorantly repudiates her. She is about to remind of the ring, when she discovers that she has lost it.

In her disgrace she is spirited away by her mythological parents. A fisherman discovers the ring in a fish he has caught. It has the king's name and is taken to him. The evil spell is broken. He remembers Sacontala, and is distracted at his own cruel denial and desertion of her. He puts on the garments of a penitent, and while in a life of hardship is spirited away to the other world, where he first meets his son, who shows his royal courage by counting the teeth of full-grown lions and punishing them, and is finally introduced again to the mother, who has had no feeling for her husband but of devotion and tenderness. Indra's charioteer returns the family to the earth again, where the royal family of Puru obtains a new lease of life through the king's son. As a merely human play the dialogue, plot and action are superb, and as fresh as if written yesterday, and it has an allegorical meaning besides.

The Goldmark overture is not an introduction, but a concert overture, or symphonic poem, on the entire work, in which deftly woven melodies present the various persons of the drama. It could hardly have had a better presentation than that given by the Boston Orchestra last evening.

The second number was the Brahms concerto for violin, opus 77, written for Joachim, and first performed by him in Leipzig, New Year's Day, 1879. It is in strict classic form, although the subjects are treated in modern fashion. The cadenza was left, as in old-time customs, to the ability of the performer, and Mr. Kneisel used the opportunity by composing a wonderfully fine specimen, skilfully employing the themes of the work, and rendering the entire composition with marvelous effectiveness. At the end of the cadenza the audience seemed to stop breathing, while the skilful artist glided back into the original theme of the composition, and the whole orchestra came in pianissimo with another subject, which had been already heard. The second movement is delicious, and the finally joyful and triumphant Mr. Kneisel was enthusically recalled.

Like the prelude to Lohengrin, the introduction to "Tristan and Isolt" is an epitome of the whole opera, putting the listener in the mood to appreciate and enjoy all that happens in the tragic love story that follows. It is one of the few things that does not suffer seriously in being presented apart from the opera itself. It was beautifully played, the perfection of the orchestra showing itself more in this, perhaps, than in any other number.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in the order of publication, but No. 2 in the order of its composition. It is in D minor. It is undoubtedly the least effective of the Schumann symphonies, and for this reason not so often heard as his other orchestral works. It is not strictly in symphonic form, which was never quite suited to Schumann's erratic nature. He calls the work by a peculiar title, "Symphony No. 4, D minor; introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo and finale in one piece," and it might as well be called a grand fantasia for orchestra, which it nearly is, and but for the mental tension which it produces, would be more effective if played as intended without pauses between the several parts.

Several of the subjects are not very original, but the treatment is Schumann's own in every way, from beginning to end. The romance is the gem of the work, and the finale is effective and fine.

Altogether, the concert was a rare, artistic treat, which was highly appreciated by the very musical audience gathered to hear it. Mr. Nikisch was heartily applauded at his entrance, as well as at the end of the concert.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a representative musical audience to Steinway Hall last night on the occasion of their second subscription concert. The interest in Col. Higgenson's musical organization seems in nowise to have abated since the first concert this season. The reception of Herr Arthur Nikisch was cordial, and the favorable impression he created on his first appearance was strengthened by the work he did last night. The orchestra was in fine form, and the same smoothness and finish which were the chief characteristics of their playing under Mr. Gericke are still noticeable features, but Mr. Nikisch has infused a more vigorous style, without loss of finish, and it must be noted as an improvement. The concert opened with a bright and beautiful rendition of Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala." This was followed by Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and a novelty, a symphony in E flat, the first work of the Russian composer Alexander Borodin. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, violinist, who played Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor.

The Washington [illegible]

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 16, 1890.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

Altogether delightful was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New Lincoln Music Hall last night, and noticeable as demonstrating in every way Mr. Nikisch's genius as a conductor. For the programme apparently promised no novelties—simply the "Freischutz" and "Tannhauser" overtures, and the beautiful Italian symphony of Mendelssohn—and yet it must have been the universal verdict when the last note was sounded that even these familiar numbers had been clothed anew by the power of intelligence, insight, and sympathy. The concert at the opening of the hall afforded some opportunity to judge of Mr. Nikisch. Last night's performance revealed in fuller measure his artistic quality, dominating thought and personality, and the catholicity of his musical taste and knowledge.

It is hard to imagine a band of musicians nearer perfection than the company which Mr. Nikisch controls. In solidity of the tutti passages, in beautiful balance and quality of tone, and in exquisite finish it presents the highest possible achievement of instrumental endeavor. It contrasts robustness with delicacy, sentiment with dramatic expression, and brilliancy with poetic interpretation. The fears which may have been entertained regarding the loss of precision in the strings by Mr. Gericke's departure are now shown to have been utterly groundless, while sonority and strength have been gained by the fuller development of the brass and wood-winds. If we miss the exact adherence to metronomic marks in which Mr. Gericke's precise soul delighted, we have gained a glowing warmth, a wealth of dynamic effects, an originality, and a radiancy that affords the supremest pitch of musical enjoyment.

The beautiful coloring of the Freischutz overture was admirably portrayed. Just before the brilliant coda the orchestra paused for at least half a minute and then with a sudden descending motion of the conductor's baton attacked the finale with great power and velocity. The effect was electrifying. The first movement of the symphony was almost limpid in its clearness and joyous in its delightful rhythm; the andante charming in its sentiment, delicacy and grace; the moderato was equally captivating while the finale, the saltarello which pictures carnival days under Italian skies, was bright with fancy and spirited in the highest degree.

The climax of the evening was reached, however, in the Tannhauser overture. Mr. Nikisch interpreted this as a whole at a slower tempo than even Wagner prescribes, but this seemed to give him an opportunity to contrast with more nobility and statelliness its poetic themes with the ardent, passionate music which pictures the delights and temptations of the Venus mountain. One can hardly imagine more elevated, dignified, impressive, and even inspired work than that which marked the execution of this overture.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementina de Vere. The disappointment which her first number, the aria from Mozart's Magic Flute, may have caused was fully atoned for in the brilliant vocalization of David's florid aria from "Les Perles de Brazil." This number created the first really genuine ovation which has occurred within the new music hall, and its repetition was rewarded with applause almost as prolonged. The audience, which, by the way, filled the entire house, also testified its appreciation of Mr. Nikisch by a demonstration after the close of the concert, which he acknowledged by a graceful bow.

THE MORNING HERALD

PUB[illegible] BALTIMORE, [illegible]EAR

THE H[illegible]PANY.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch Achieves Another Success—Mr. Kneisel, the Violinist.

For the second time Mr. Arthur Nikisch wielded the baton in Baltimore last night, and directed that excellent aggregation of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience was a cultured one and listened to the work of the artists from the Hub with evident satisfaction. The opinion was more firmly established that the Bostonians are by far the most evenly-balanced and best-disciplined organization on the American continent. More vivid effects may perhaps now and then have been attained in the interpretation of dramatic music, often at the expense of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution and absolute precision, no work that has been done in years, even by the celebrated Mapleson band, has approached its happiest efforts. The programme offered last night, while not altogether new, nevertheless offered some things that have not been heard here before and others that may be heard a number of times without losing the charm that would belong ordinarily only to novelty.

Among the best-known works on the programme may be mentioned Schumann's symphony in D minor. Its style differs in many respects from the form observed by other masters. The lack of intermissions and the peculiar accentuation in the introductory and scherzo movements commanded close attention. The symphony was rendered with all the warmth of coloring and instrumental effects it is capable of, and met with an enthusiastic reception.

The concert opened with Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." This work is quite well-known here and served like none of the others to emphasize the excellencies of the band and the emotional qualities of its leader. The composition is one of rare loveliness and sensuous charm, although not wholly free from the somewhat tearful, sad character of many of that musician's works. It was rendered with rare delicacy and captured the audience completely.

Other numbers were the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and Brahms' concerto. This latter is for solo, violin and orchestra, and is entirely new here, and was looked forward to with considerable interest. It is a fair example of Brahms' work, and created a favorable impression, without calling forth much enthusiasm.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Kneisel, who has been heard here before. He played in excellent taste, and particularly in the adagio movement he handled his instrument in an admirable way. The solo part is not as prominent as in other concerts. Mr. Kneisel played a cadenza of his own composition which netted him a double recall.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 15, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a large audience together in Steinway Hall last evening. The entertainment was one of more than ordinary interest. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for 'cello in A minor, opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and Alexander Borodin's first symphony in E flat. The last work was recently produced in Boston for the first time in America, and the 'cello concerto served to introduce a new artist, Mr. Anton Hekking, lately first 'cello of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borodin was a Russian composer, who, like Berlioz, was originally intended for the medical profession. He died at the age of 50 a few years ago, leaving behind him two symphonies, some smaller orchestral compositions, some chamber music, and an unfinished opera. Judging by the work heard last night, Borodin had a decided talent for orchestral exposition of the characteristic melody of his native land, and though it is not probable that he would have left any imperishable monument to his memory, he might have produced more work worthy of the general acquaintance of music lovers.

His symphony is a short one, and, excepting the placing of the scherzo before the andante, follows the classical model both in the character and sequence of its movements as well as in the internal structure of the movements themselves. The composition, however, is modern and romantic in spirit and distinctly northern in character. Its thematic material is borrowed from Russian folk melodies, and the harmonic background is full of sombre and weird tints. The first movement is, without much doubt, the strongest. The first theme is one of abrupt, nervous character and the second a flowing melody of sad meaning. The two are well worked one against the other, the force and incisiveness of the first giving a generally rugged and aggressive feeling to the movement. The scoring is full of extremely well-managed contrasting solos and the climax is admirably written.

The scherzo is the brightest and prettiest movement, but is less charged with matter than the opening allegro. It contains some brilliant and difficult passages for the wood, which were cleverly disposed of by Mr. Nikisch's men. The andante is very dark and gloomy, being a faithful reflection of that deep undercurrent of sadness which is found in the northern nations of Europe, and which some writers, with good reason, regard as a result of their national environment. The last movement of the symphony is a somewhat boisterous allegro, very ingeniously handled. One of its features is a passage of fine breadth, built on the first theme, and richly scored. Taken as a whole, the symphony is a good though not a great composition, well worthy of a place on one of Mr. Nikisch's programmes, and a decidedly interesting novelty. It was performed superbly, the conductor bringing out its varied effects with magnificent dramatic force and electrical precision.

The Saint-Saëns concerto was very well played by Mr. Hekking, who proved to be a valuable addition to the orchestral virtuosi of this country. His tone is full, and his style warm and sympathetic. He was not at his best in the more rapid passages, but in the broader cantabile measures he played with great feeling. The orchestral performance of the Brahms and Goldmark compositions was worthy of the very highest praise. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Goldmark overture was superb, the dramatic vigor and intensity of this excellent piece of writing being revealed in the finest possible style. Altogether the concert was one of rare excellence, and demonstrated anew that in Arthur Nikisch the Bostonians have acquired a conductor who can preserve their marvellous precision in ensemble playing, and impart to their work a keen and penetrative dramatic power which it formerly lacked.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Academy. It was in every respect a great musical treat. The playing of his grand band was exquisite throughout. The dramatic feeling evinced in the rendition of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" (which has already been heard here) lent new beauties to this melodious tone poem. Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn is less known. While interesting enough it is scarcely impressive, although the final variation is marked by real power. Its treatment by Ms. Nikisch was, however, delightful in the extreme, and it thus obtained a somewhat fictitious value.

The symphony was Beethoven's Fifth. Repetition cannot stale the infinite variety of pleasure to be derived from this glorious work. The intellectual aspect of the work, especially in the slow movement was almost oppressively exemplified. The work of the orchestra was simply superb throughout. The solidity of its work, the wonderful sweet and delicate effects produced, the tremendous power displayed in the crescendo passages—all combined to affect the audience most profoundly. The occasion will be a memorable one to every one who could appreciate wonderful music superbly played.

The soloist of the evening was Mlle. de Vere who was heard here in concert a couple of seasons ago. Her first number was the "Queen of Nights" song, from Mozart's "Zauberflote." It seemed as if Mlle. de Vere's voice had not improved since she last sang here. One received the impression that it lacked sweetness. In the second selection—from David's "Les Perles de Bresil" this impression was happily, to a certain extent, dispelled. The music is even more florid than Mozart's famous aria and the artist's phrasing and vocalization readily made up for any lack of tonal sweetness. In a long cadenza with flute accompaniment she was charming, and M. Mole, the flutist, undoubtedly deserved a full share of the enthusiastic applause with which the effort was greeted. After being recalled four or five times Mlle. de Vere good-naturedly repeated the aria, singing even better than before.

The audience was very large; there were in fact very few vacant seats anywhere in the house.

[61]

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Criticism, in the sense that the short-sighted and unreasoning employ the term, has little to do with performances like that of the Boston Symphony Society, at Steinway Hall last night. Indeed, it has little to do it in the true sense, which suggests as its province the separation of excellence from defect. It is chiefly that sublimated criticism which is all praise that is challenged by Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi; for the things that were excellent last night so greatly outnumbered those that were defective that it would be a waste of time to attempt to draw the line between them. The sound, healthy, beautiful grain hid the chaff from view. If musical New-York were disposed to petty feelings, there would be a chance for envy.

Mr. Nikisch's programme contained two compositions that have frequently been heard with admiration and two that were novel. In the overture to "Sakuntala" and Brahms's variations on a choral melody by Haydn (op. 56), the audience (an ample one by the way, but a little less exuberant in its tributes of applause than the first) was permitted to enjoy the brilliancy of the band's performance and the tastefulness, warmth and intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's readings without division of attention. In the other numbers, a concerto for violoncello (in A minor, op. 33), by Saint-Saens, and a symphony in E flat, by the Russian composer, Borodin, a two-fold exercise of judgment was asked, for the music was unfamiliar, as well as the performance. The concerto, a serious composition, which aims at artistic expression, and not at display of the solo instrument, was played by Mr. Anton Hekking, who came from Berlin to join the orchestra at the beginning of the season. Mr. Hekking is an artist of fine quality, reposeful in manner, correct in feeling, though we should say not very warm, and technically a master. His playing gave great pleasure. Russian music forcing itself upon the notice of the world almost as persistently as Russian literature, and it is quite as worthy of attention. One-half of the symphony played last night is a perfect warrant for the admission of Borodin to the ranks of modern symphonists. If the legacy which he left to the world when he died, a few years ago, before his fame had penetrated to these parts, contains any more compositions like this symphony, he deserves to share the attention now so largely monopolized by Tschaikowsky. The work is not at all revolutionary in form or manner, and only in parts does it employ some of the characteristic elements of Russian folk-music. Yet it has a most decided individuality, and its first two movements are not only original but beautiful. The first allegro is exceedingly energetic, and the distortion of rhythm by means of syncopation, puts a peculiar impress of eagerness on the first subject. The second subject is effectively contrasted in style and spirit, and, in spite of a tendency to bizarre effects in the instrumentation, the development of the themes in the free fantasia part of the movement, is full of ingenuity and beauty. The scherzo takes the second place in the symphony, and is vital with a lively, yet delicate humor, quite different from the mixture of ruggedness and melancholy so frequently found in the playful movements of Russian composers. In the trio there is a suggestion of national color, but nothing forced or unnatural. The andante and finale do not bear comparison with the other movements, either in their melodic material, or its employment. Mr. Nikisch has added materially to the interest of the musical season of New-York by bringing forward this symphony. Amateurs will be glad to hear other novelties from him.

Philadelphia Inquirer.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Second Concert Is Attended by a Greatly Enlarged and Sympathetic Audience.

Last evening at the Academy of Music Herr Nikisch found a much larger and more sympathetic audience to hear him than the one which assembled a few weeks ago. It may be said indeed that very few audiences evince so much respect, attention and interest as the very large one which listened last evening to the Boston Orchestra under its new leader.

Of course there were numbers which some of the audience would have been satisfied to see substituted. The opening "Sakuntala" overture which Thomas introduced many years ago, is a nondescript sort of affair. In the hands of Mr. Thomas, who is always repressive in his leading, it is a menagerie; but when Mr. Nikisch takes it in his hand it becomes a circus. It may be good of its kind, but it is not of a kind to compare with the remainder of the concert. The new leader made for himself an excellent record in the rendition of Brahms' variations on one of the almost infinite themes of Hayden. There has been a great deal said and written about the leading of Mr. Nikisch, and it is now a very good time to say that the most part of such writing is ignorance or clap-trap. Mr. Nikisch leads his band of eighty very much as that great musician, Carl Zerrahn, led the great Gilmore Jubilee in 1872. Usually he beats by the measure, but when passages occur of particular significance, he abandons the measured beat, and his baton expresses the phases of the composition. Nothing could have been more satisfactory than the whole fourth movement of the Fifth Symphony by Beethoven. There was no beat which interfered with any of its glorious beauty. In the first movement, on the contrary, there were several differences which we were obliged to take with him, chiefly in certain holds which he made unduly long for the theme. The great andante has been more written about than perhaps anything else which Beethoven every wrote, but one the man who wrote best about it is he who lies as dead as the once famous "Star Papers" in which it appears, Henry Ward Beecher. Mr. Nikisch led it splendidly, and what is particularly worthy of praise is the way in which he conveyed the full meaning in the second movement of the change from andante to andante con moto. Too few of our most thoughtful leaders remember this very important distinction. When Thomas does it he overdoes it.

The vocalist of the evening was Mlle. Clementine de Vere. She sang the aria of the "Queen of Night," from Mozart's "Magic Flute," as her opening performance and later the aria from "Perles de Brasil," which Emma Nevada once made pleasing here. Both of these airs were warmly applauded and the latter had to be repeated.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Given Last Night at the Lyceum Theater.

The program for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Lyceum Theater last evening, was far superior to the first one of the season, and one in every way worthy of that remarkably fine organization of musicians. It consisted entirely of modern works, Goldmark, Brahms, Wagner and Schumann being the list of composers. At the last concert there were but one or two works that required the full power of the organization, while last evening all parts of the orchestra found sufficient employment.

The works of composers of the classical school can be readily performed by our own home organizations, and, therefore, when we are visited by larger bodies of musicians, it is but fair to expect the fullest modern orchestrial work.

The program opened with Goldmark's overture to Sakuntola, a Hindu drama, by Kalidasa, the Hindu Shakspeare, dated somewhere between two and three thousand years ago. It is one of the finest dramas that was ever written, and when first presented in an English translation it created a taste and desire for the study of Sanscrit literature that has been increasing ever since.

The hero of the story is Dashmonto, a Hindoo king, who, while hunting, discovers a modest and beautiful maiden, to whom he marries himself by the Ghondorva ceremony of giving a ring. Afterward, by a spell put on by evil spirits, he forgets her, and when she presents herself at his court he ignorantly repudiates her. She is about to remind of the ring, when she discovers that she has lost it.

In her disgrace she is spirited away by her mythological parents. A fisherman discovers the ring in a fish he has caught. It has the king's name and is taken to him. The evil spell is broken. He remembers Sacontala, and is distracted at his own cruel denial and desertion of her. He puts on the garments of a penitent, and while in a life of hardship is spirited away to the other world, where he first meets his son, who shows his royal courage by counting the teeth of full-grown lions and punishing them, and is finally introduced again to the mother, who has had no feeling for her husband but of devotion and tenderness. Indra's charioteer returns the family to the earth again, where the royal family of Puru obtains a new lease of life through the king's son. As a merely human play the dialogue, plot and action are superb, and as fresh as it written yesterday, and it has an allegorical meaning besides.

The Goldmark overture is not an introduction, but a concert overture, or symphonic poem, on the entire work, in which deftly woven melodies present the various persons of the drama. It could hardly have had a better presentation than that given by the Boston Orchestra last evening.

The second number was the Brahms concerto for violin, opus 77, written for Joachim, and first performed by him in Leipzig, New Year's Day, 1879. It is in strict classic form, although the subjects are treated in modern fashion. The cadenza was left, as in old-time customs, to the ability of the performer, and Mr. Kneisel used the opportunity by composing a wonderfully fine specimen, skilfully employing the themes of the work, and rendering the entire composition with marvelous effectiveness. At the end of the cadenza the audience seemed to stop breathing, while the skilful artist glided back into the original theme of the composition, and the whole orchestra came in pianissimo with another subject, which had been already heard. The second movement is delicious, and the finally joyful and triumphant Mr. Kneisel was enthusically recalled.

Like the prelude to Lohengrin, the introduction to "Tristan and Isolt" is an epitome of the whole opera, putting the listener in the mood to appreciate and enjoy all that happens in the tragic love story that follows. It is one of the few things that does not suffer seriously in being presented apart from the opera itself. It was beautifully played, the perfection of the orchestra showing itself more in this, perhaps, than in any other number.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in the order of publication, but No. 2 in the order of its composition. It is in D minor. It is undoubtedly the least effective of the Schumann symphonies, and for this reason not so often heard as his other orchestral works. It is not strictly in symphonic form, which was never quite suited to Schumann's erratic nature. He calls the work by a peculiar title, "Symphony No. 4, D minor; introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo and finale in one piece," and it might as well be called a grand fantasia for orchestra, which it nearly is, and but for the mental tension which it produces, would be more effective if played as intended without pauses between the several parts.

Several of the subjects are not very original, but the treatment is Schumann's own in every way, from beginning to end. The romance is the gem of the work, and the finale is effective and fine.

Altogether, the concert was a rare, artistic treat, which was highly appreciated by the very musical audience gathered to hear it. Mr. Nikisch was heartily applauded at his entrance, as well as at the end of the concert.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a representative musical audience to Steinway Hall last night on the occasion of their second subscription concert. The interest in Col. Higgenson's musical organization seems in nowise to have abated since the first concert this season. The reception of Herr Arthur Nikisch was cordial, and the favorable impression he created on his first appearance was strengthened by the work he did last night. The orchestra was in fine form, and the same smoothness and finish which were the chief characteristics of their playing under Mr. Geriche are still noticeable features, but Mr. Nikisch has infused a more vigorous style, without loss of finish, and it must be noted as an improvement. The concert opened with a bright and beautiful rendition of Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala." This was followed by Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and a novelty, a symphony in E flat, the first work of the Russian composer Alexander Borodin. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, violinist, who played Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor.

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 18, 1890.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

Altogether delightful was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New Lincoln Music Hall last night, and noticeable as demonstrating in every way Mr. Nikisch's genius as a conductor. For the programme apparently promised no novelties—simply the "Freischutz" and "Tannhauser" overtures, and the beautiful Italian symphony of Mendelssohn—and yet it must have been the universal verdict when the last note was sounded that even these familiar numbers had been clothed anew by the power of intelligence, insight, and sympathy. The concert at the opening of the hall afforded some opportunity to judge of Mr. Nikisch. Last night's performance revealed in fuller measure his artistic quality, dominating thought and personality, and the catholicity of his musical taste and knowledge.

It is hard to imagine a band of musicians nearer perfection than the company which Mr. Nikisch controls. In solidity of the tutti passages, in beautiful balance and quality of tone, and in exquisite finish it presents the highest possible achievement of instrumental endeavor. It contrasts robustness with delicacy, sentiment with dramatic expression, and brilliancy with poetic interpretation. The fears which may have been entertained regarding the loss of precision in the strings by Mr. Gericke's departure are now shown to have been utterly groundless, while sonority and strength have been gained by the fuller development of the brass and wood-winds. If we miss the exact adherence to metronomic marks in which Mr. Gericke's precise soul delighted, we have gained a glowing warmth, a wealth of dynamic effects, an originality, and a radiancy that affords the supremest pitch of musical enjoyment.

The beautiful coloring of the Freischutz overture was admirably portrayed. Just before the brilliant coda the orchestra paused for at least half a minute and then with a sudden descending motion of the conductor's baton attacked the finale with great power and velocity. The effect was electrifying. The first movement of the symphony was almost limpid in its clearness and joyous in its delightful rhythm; the andante charming in its sentiment, delicacy and grace; the moderato was equally captivating while the finale, the saltarello which pictures carnival days under Italian skies, was bright with fancy and spirited in the highest degree.

The climax of the evening was reached, however, in the Tannhauser overture. Mr. Nikisch interpreted this as a whole at a slower tempo than even Wagner prescribes, but this seemed to give him an opportunity to contrast with more nobility and stateliness its poetic themes with the ardent, passionate music which pictures the delights and temptations of the Venus mountain. One can hardly imagine more elevated, dignified, impressive, and even inspired work than that which marked the execution of this overture.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Clementina de Vere. The disappointment which her first number, the aria from Mozart's Magic Flute, may have caused was fully atoned for in the brilliant vocalization of David's florid aria from "Les Perles de Brazil." This number created the first really genuine ovation which has occurred within the new music hall, and its repetition was rewarded with applause almost as prolonged. The audience, which, by the way, filled the entire house, also testified its appreciation of Mr. Nikisch by a demonstration after the close of the concert, which he acknowledged by a graceful bow.

THE MORNING HERALD

PUB[illegible] BALTIMORE, [illegible]EAR

THE H[illegible]IPANY.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch Achieves Another Success—Mr. Kneisel, the Violinist.

For the second time Mr. Arthur Nikisch wielded the baton in Baltimore last night, and directed that excellent aggregation of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience was a cultured one and listened to the work of the artists from the Hub with evident satisfaction. The opinion was more firmly established that the Bostonians are by far the most evenly-balanced and best-disciplined organization on the American continent. More vivid effects may perhaps now and then have been attained in the interpretation of dramatic music, often at the expense of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution and absolute precision, no work that has been done in years, even by the celebrated Mapleson band, has approached its happiest efforts. The programme offered last night, while not altogether new, nevertheless offered some things that have not been heard here before and others that may be heard a number of times without losing the charm that would belong ordinarily only to novelty.

Among the best-known works on the programme may be mentioned Schumann's symphony in D minor. Its style differs in many respects from the form observed by other masters. The lack of intermissions and the peculiar accentuation in the introductory and scherzo movements commanded close attention. The symphony was rendered with all the warmth of coloring and instrumental effects it is capable of, and met with an enthusiastic reception.

The concert opened with Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." This work is quite well-known here and served like none of the others to emphasize the excellencies of the band and the emotional qualities of its leader. The composition is one of rare loveliness and sensuous charm, although not wholly free from the somewhat tearful, sad character of many of that musician's works. It was rendered with rare delicacy and captured the audience completely.

Other numbers were the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and Brahms' concerto. This latter is for solo, violin and orchestra, and is entirely new here, and was looked forward to with considerable interest. It is a fair example of Brahms' work, and created a favorable impression, without calling forth much enthusiasm.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Kneisel, who has been heard here before. He played in excellent taste, and particularly in the adagio movement he handled his instrument in an admirable way. The solo part is not as prominent as in other concerts. Mr. Kneisel played a cadenza of his own composition which netted him a double recall.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 15, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a large audience together in Steinway Hall last evening. The entertainment was one of more than ordinary interest. The programme consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns's concerto for 'cello in A minor, opus 33, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and Alexander Borodin's first symphony in E flat. The last work was recently produced in Boston for the first time in America, and the 'cello concerto served to introduce a new artist, Mr. Anton Hekking, lately first 'cello of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borodin was a Russian composer, who, like Berlioz, was originally intended for the medical profession. He died at the age of 50 a few years ago, leaving behind him two symphonies, some smaller orchestral compositions, some chamber music, and an unfinished opera. Judging by the work heard last night, Borodin had a decided talent for orchestral exposition of the characteristic melody of his native land, and though it is not probable that he would have left any imperishable monument to his memory, he might have produced more work worthy of the general acquaintance of music lovers.

His symphony is a short one, and, excepting the placing of the scherzo before the andante, follows the classical model both in the character and sequence of its movements as well as in the internal structure of the movements themselves. The composition, however, is modern and romantic in spirit and distinctly northern in character. Its thematic material is borrowed from Russian folk melodies, and the harmonic background is full of sombre and weird tints. The first movement is, without much doubt, the strongest. The first theme is one of abrupt, nervous character and the second a flowing melody of sad meaning. The two are well worked one against the other, the force and incisiveness of the first giving a generally rugged and aggressive feeling to the movement. The scoring is full of extremely well-managed contrasting solos and the climax is admirably written.

The scherzo is the brightest and prettiest movement, but is less charged with matter than the opening allegro. It contains some brilliant and difficult passages for the wood, which were cleverly disposed of by Mr. Nikisch's men. The andante is very dark and gloomy, being a faithful reflection of that deep undercurrent of sadness which is found in the northern nations of Europe, and which some writers, with good reason, regard as a result of their national environment. The last movement of the symphony is a somewhat boisterous allegro, very ingeniously handled. One of its features is a passage of fine breadth, built on the first theme, and richly scored. Taken as a whole, the symphony is a good though not a great composition, well worthy of a place on one of Mr. Nikisch's programmes, and a decidedly interesting novelty. It was performed superbly, the conductor bringing out its varied effects with magnificent dramatic force and electrical precision.

The Saint-Saëns concerto was very well played by Mr. Hekking, who proved to be a valuable addition to the orchestral virtuosi of this country. His tone is full, and his style warm and sympathetic. He was not at his best in the more rapid passages, but in the broader cantabile measures he played with great feeling. The orchestral performance of the Brahms and Goldmark compositions was worthy of the very highest praise. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Goldmark overture was superb, the dramatic vigor and intensity of this excellent piece of writing being revealed in the finest possible style. Altogether the concert was one of rare excellence, and demonstrated anew that in Arthur Nikisch the Bostonians have acquired a conductor who can preserve their marvellous precision in ensemble playing, and impart to their work a keen and penetrative dramatic power which it formerly lacked.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Academy. It was in every respect a great musical treat. The playing of his grand band was exquisite throughout. The dramatic feeling evinced in the rendition of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" (which has already been heard here) lent new beauties to this melodious tone poem. Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn is less known. While interesting enough it is scarcely impressive, although the final variation is marked by real power. Its treatment by Ms. Nikisch was, however, delightful in the extreme, and it thus obtained a somewhat fictitious value.

The symphony was Beethoven's Fifth. Repetition cannot stale the infinite variety of pleasure to be derived from this glorious work. The intellectual aspect of the work, especially in the slow movement was almost oppressively exemplified. The work of the orchestra was simply superb throughout. The solidity of its work, the wonderful sweet and delicate effects produced, the tremendous power displayed in the crescendo passages—all combined to affect the audience most profoundly. The occasion will be a memorable one to every one who could appreciate wonderful music superbly played.

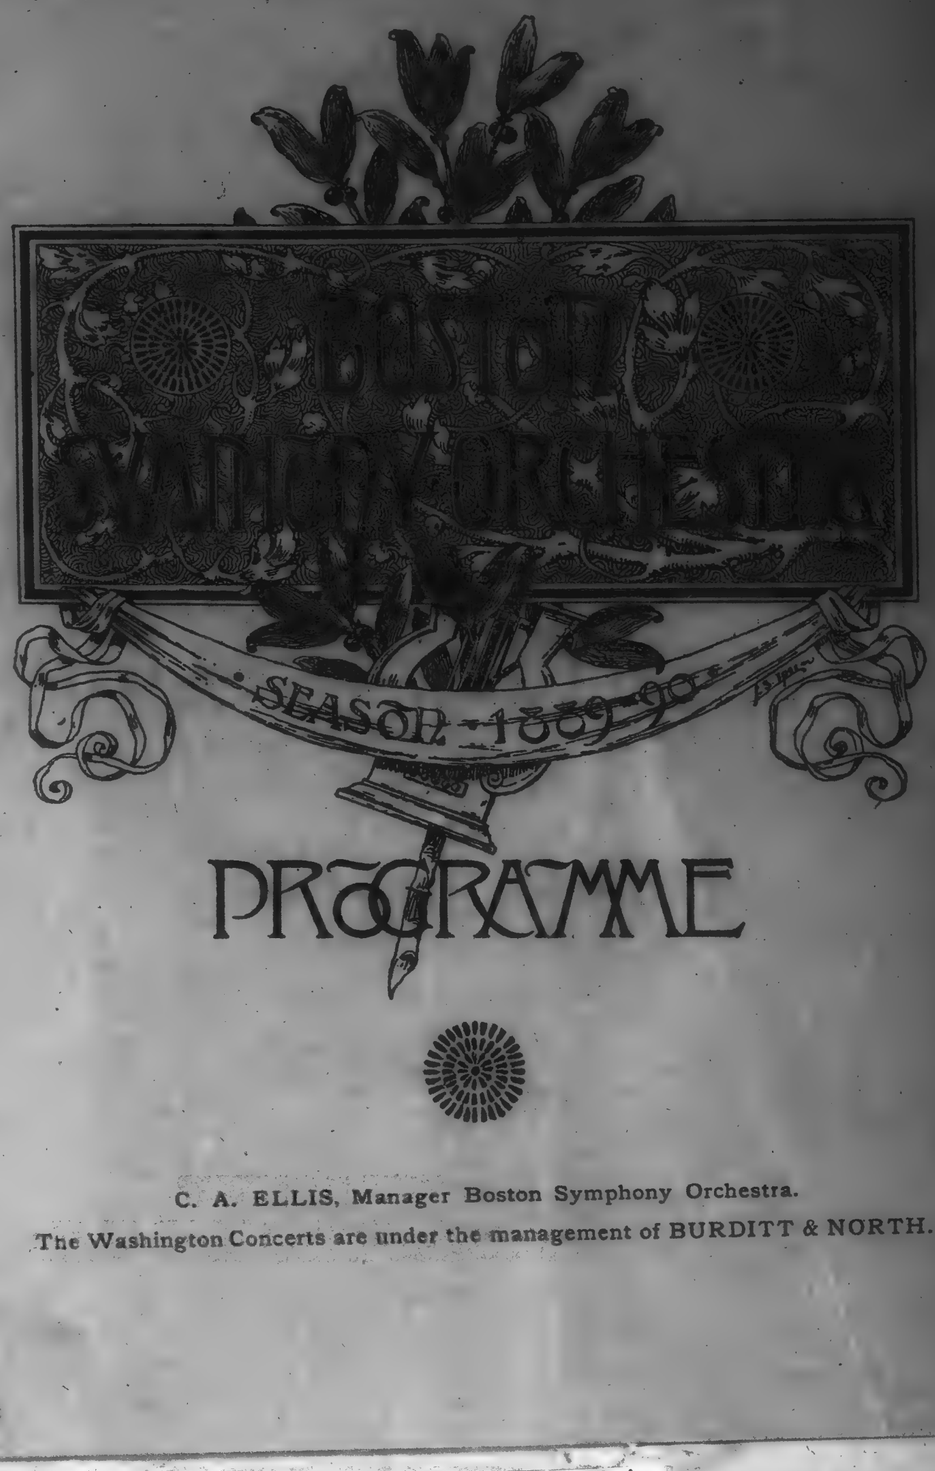
The soloist of the evening was Mlle. de Vere who was heard here in concert a couple of seasons ago. Her first number was the "Queen of Nights" song, from Mozart's "Zauberflote." It seemed as if Mlle. de Vere's voice had not improved since she last sang here. One received the impression that it lacked sweetness. In the second selection—from David's "Les Perles de Bresil" this impression was happily, to a certain extent, dispelled. The music is even more florid than Mozart's famous aria and the artist's phrasing and vocalization readily made up for any lack of tonal sweetness. In a long cadenza with flute accompaniment she was charming, and M. Mole, the flutist, undoubtedly deserved a full share of the enthusiastic applause with which the effort was greeted. After being recalled four or five times Mlle. de Vere good-naturedly repeated the aria, singing even better than before.

The audience was very large; there were in act very few vacant seats anywhere in the house.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL. - - WASHINGTON.

Friday Evening, Jan. 17th, at 8.



PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1890.

A NEW RUSSIAN SYMPHONY.

Brought Forward by Herr Nikisch at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

The most interesting feature of the excellent concert given before a large and enthusiastic audience by the Boston Orchestra in Steinway Hall last night under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was unquestionably a symphony by the Russian composer, Alexander Borodin, who has heretofore been represented in our concert rooms solely by a short suite entitled, "On the Steppes."

Borodin is, however, the author of much music, although he composed chiefly as a relaxation from his regular work as professor of chemistry at the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg. He died a few years ago, leaving an unfinished opera, two symphonies and many miscellaneous compositions.

The symphony heard last night—that in E flat—is the only one known outside of Russia, its first performance in Germany having been due to Mr. Nikisch, who had it played at a music festival held in Leipsic in 1888. It is in the usual four movements, and gives one more proof that if Russian music lacks something of form and polish according to Western standards it is by no means devoid of musical ideas.

It is also to be noted that the orchestral treatment is always interesting and often masterly. There are seeming crudities, endless reiteration of insignificant phrases, for instance, which are saved only by a really brilliant musical handling, of which Berlioz need not have been ashamed.

It was a matter of personal pride with Mr. Nikisch to have this symphony well given, and its interpretation did him and his fine orchestra credit.

Next in interest on the programme was Saint-Saëns' 'cello concerto in A minor, a beautiful, if somewhat long-drawn-out work, which was well played by Mr. Anton Hekking, a regular member of the orchestra.

The rest of the evening was given up to a masterly performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and to Braham's interesting but too extended variations upon a Haydn theme.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Wednesday, Jan. 15, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

An audience that left few vacant seats in the house attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert series at the Academy of Music last night. There were but three orchestral numbers on the programme, the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, eight sets of variations by Brahms on themes by Haydn and the Fifth (C minor) Symphony of Beethoven, which would have been more keenly enjoyed had it been heard at the opening instead of at the close of the concert. Mr. Nikisch conducted all without glancing at a note for guidance, and even without a score of any of them within reach, had he needed it. And the execution of his splendid organization, as well as many evidences furnished by himself, showed that he was intimately familiar with the minutest characteristics of each of them. It will not be necessary to enter into detail as to the work of the orchestra. Its tone was admirably balanced, with extremes of power or delicacy as either was required, and its playing was marked by a general virtuosity that has been unsurpassed here and is probably unsurpassable anywhere. In the lovely andante of the Beethoven symphony it was made particularly apparent that Mr. Nikisch reads below the surface of the master of symphony writing. No finer example of tenderness of feeling in connection with sensuous beauty of tone could be desired. The audience, not unmindful of these things, showered applause upon him and the orchestra.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening, however, was evoked by the singing of the soloist, Miss Clementine De Vere, a soprano whom the LEDGER warmly commended last season when she made her first appearance here with Gilmore. She has notably gained since that time both in vocal development and in technical attainments. She sang one of the shorter arias from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and the well-known grand aria from Felicien David's "Pearl of Brazil." In response to a nearly unanimous redemand she repeated the latter aria, and then retired amid applause that any artist might have been proud of.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 16, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch Gives His Interpretation of the Fifth Symphony.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last night, opened with an exquisite presentation of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. The elaborate instrumentation of this rich and beautiful work displayed the quality of the orchestra to fine advantage, and its warm, Oriental color and delicious poetry were wonderfully expressed under Mr. Nikisch's sympathetic direction. Miss De Vere sang the aria of the "Queen of Night" and the "Charmant Oiseau," the latter very sweetly and with such effect that she was compelled to repeat it, though her voice was not as fresh and sure as it was in the summer, and the orchestra played Brahms' tedious variations upon an unfortunate theme by Haydn. Finally came the C minor symphony.

This is one of those standard works that everybody knows so well and has heard so often that it is not in need of any new interpretation by modern analysis, and unless a conductor can impart some unusual power to his treatment of it, his search after novelties can hardly meet with immediate acceptation. Mr. Nikisch's treatment of the symphony was imaginative to a degree that seemed affected and far-fetched, and both the opening movement and the andante lost more than they gained by bizarre readings and curiously accented contrasts. Yet there was no lack of feeling or of virility in his conducting, and when he yielded to his natural fervor he made his climaxes superbly and carried the final movement with magnificent effect.

The audience was large and very attentive and its applause was bestowed cordially, but with discrimination.

Sarasate and D'Albert will make their farewell appearance this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The pianist will play some notable solos, including a suite of his own, and Sarasate will give the Saint-Saëns concerto and other interesting selections. This will be the last opportunity to hear two of the greatest executants of their time. In the evening the concert of the Philadelphia Chorus occurs at the Academy, when the "Elijah" will be performed.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, FRIDAY, JAN. 17, 1890.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Mr. Arthur Nikisch is establishing surely his reputation in Baltimore as a leader of unusual power, and his direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theatre last night won him many new admirers. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra and first violinist of the now celebrated Kneisel Quartette. He rendered last night Brahms's concerto for violin, with orchestra, in D, which was presented for the first time in Baltimore.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, Thursday, January 16, 1890.

CLASSICAL MUSIC.

An Excellent Programme Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music brought out a notable audience of music-lovers, and the great band has never been heard here to better advantage. The instrumental numbers were Goldmark's romantic "Sakuntala" overture, Brahms' opus 56—the Haydn variations—and Beethoven's magnificent fifth symphony. The best work of the orchestra was, of course, heard in the symphony, of which the dramatic scherzo was given with extraordinary power and effect. Herr Nikisch certainly knows his Beethoven thoroughly. The ingenious variations by Brahms were rendered with delightful lucidity, and Goldmark's sensuous measures were interpreted with a warmth and breadth to which the listeners had hitherto been unaccustomed in the playing of this orchestra.

The soloist of the occasion was a soprano singer, Mlle. Clementina De Vere, who possesses a fluent, well-cultivated voice, of very high range but not much power. Her selections were the famous aria for soprano from Mozart's "Zauberfloete" and the almost equally well-known aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." These florid compositions were rendered in excellent style by Mlle. De Vere, even to the taking of the sensational high notes.

M'lle De Vere gave a finished and artistic rendering of the lovely cantabile passages of the "Pearl of Brazil" aria; and the applause was so persistent that she was induced to repeat the number.

THE AMERICAN MUSICIAN

NEW YORK, JANUARY 18, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Steinway Hall, Tuesday evening, January 14; the following was the program:

1. Overture—"Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
2. Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, op. 33.. Saint-Saens
   Allegro non troppo. Allegretto con moto. Allegro non troppo.
3. Variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56..... Brahms
4. Symphony in E flat, No. 1..... Alexander Borodin
   Adagio; allegro. Scherzo. Andante. Allegro molto vivo. (First time.)

An admirable feature of this program was its eclecticism; four different schools of composers were represented, and for once we were spared the too-familiar classic symphony, without which an orchestral concert now-a-days seems to be an impracticable desideratum. Not that I object to the classic symphony—far from it; what I wish is that our conductors would vary their selections and not give us over and over again the self-same, oft-heard stock symphonies and overtures and neglect to present works of merit that are less popular ones because they are less evidently known.

The most interesting work presented on the occasion under consideration was without doubt Borodine's symphony, an exceedingly well-conceived and well-constructed composition; it contains an abundance of thematic material, much of it decidedly original and characteristically Russian, though not as pronouncedly so as a great part of that which forms the basis of the symphonic creations of Tchaikoffsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mussorgsky, and the other lights of the neo-Slavo school; the melodic ideas are clearly expressed and are developed in an exceedingly clever manner with a directness and frank sincerity which leave no doubt as to the author's purpose. The scoring is masterly and effective, there being a great variety of instrumental tone-colors without the bewildering intricacies of conflicting rhythmic designs which render appreciation of many symphonic works a fatiguing and thankless task; the various imitations of the principal themes, now entrusted to one instrument and then to another, appear in easily distinguishable relief without being obtrusive; the rhythms, many of them rather erratic, are maintained with sufficient and well-adjusted continuity, giving the hearer leisure to seize their peculiarities before they are abandoned and new figures taken up. In a word, it is a composition which can be followed and enjoyed without undue mental effort; at the same time it is neither vulgar nor commonplace, each page giving evidence of the writer's seriousness of purpose and elevated ideals.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture opened the concert very brilliantly; its passionate fire and vivid instrumental coloring make it an attractive and showy tone-picture, while the deep feeling which pervades the less animated passages appeal to the emotions of the contemplative hearer.

Saint-Saens' violoncello concerto is bright and pleasing, and affords the solo performer ample opportunities for the display of the resources of his instrument; many details of the orchestration are exceedingly dainty, and the elegance and grace which distinguish Saint-Saens' work in general are not wanting in the present instance.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played this concerto with excellent technique, good phrasing and careful attention to mechanical execution; his interpretation was an eminently correct one. But his tone, though full and sonorous, was somewhat crude and lacked warmth and feeling. The rapid passages in the last movement were not very clear, and at times seemed to be confused; with this exception, Mr. Hekking's work was very creditable and called forth the warm applause of the audience.

The execution of the orchestra was characterized by the defects which I commented upon in reviewing the first concert of the series, the want of precision in attack, occasioned by Mr. Nikisch's uncertain beat, was particularly noticeable in Goldmark's overture; in Borodine's symphony and notably in the difficult last movement, the virtuosity of the orchestra was triumphantly displayed. The enormously complicated Brahms' variations were given in a monotonous though conscientious manner.

AMERICO GORI.

[62]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1890.

A NEW RUSSIAN SYMPHONY.

Brought Forward by Herr Nikisch at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

The most interesting feature of the excellent concert given before a large and enthusiastic audience by the Boston Orchestra in Steinway Hall last night under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was unquestionably a symphony by the Russian composer, Alexander Borodin, who has heretofore been represented in our concert rooms solely by a short suite entitled, "On the Steppes."

Borodin is, however, the author of much music, although he composed chiefly as a relaxation from his regular work as professor of chemistry at the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg. He died a few years ago, leaving an unfinished opera, two symphonies and many miscellaneous compositions.

The symphony heard last night—that in E flat—is the only one known outside of Russia, its first performance in Germany having been due to Mr. Nikisch, who had it played at a music festival held in Leipsic in 1883. It is in the usual four movements, and gives one more proof that if Russian music lacks something of form and polish according to Western standards it is by no means devoid of musical ideas.

It is also to be noted that the orchestral treatment is always interesting and often masterly. There are seeming crudities, endless reiteration of insignificant phrases, for instance, which are saved only by a really brilliant musical handling, of which Berlioz need not have been ashamed.

It was a matter of personal pride with Mr. Nikisch to have this symphony well given, and its interpretation did him and his fine orchestra credit.

Next in interest on the programme was Saint-Saëns' 'cello concerto in A minor, a beautiful, if somewhat long-drawn-out work, which was well played by Mr. Anton Hekking, a regular member of the orchestra.

The rest of the evening was given up to a masterly performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and to Braham's interesting but too extended variations upon a Haydn theme.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.
Philadelphia, Thursday, Jan. 16, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

An audience that left few vacant seats in the house attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert series at the Academy of Music last night. There were but three orchestral numbers on the programme, the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, eight sets of variations by Brahms on themes by Haydn and the Fifth (C minor) Symphony of Beethoven, which would have been more keenly enjoyed had it been heard at the opening instead of at the close of the concert. Mr. Nikisch conducted all without glancing at a note for guidance, and even without a score of any of them within reach, had he needed it. And the execution of his splendid organization, as well as many evidences furnished by himself, showed that he was intimately familiar with the minutest characteristics of each of them. It will not be necessary to enter into detail as to the work of the orchestra. Its tone was admirably balanced, with extremes of power or delicacy as either was required, and its playing was marked by a general virtuosity that has been unsurpassed here and is probably unsurpassable anywhere. In the lovely andante of the Beethoven symphony it was made particularly apparent that Mr. Nikisch reads below the surface of the master of symphony writing. No finer example of tenderness of feeling in connection with sensuous beauty of tone could be desired. The audience, not unmindful of these things, showered applause upon him and the orchestra.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening, however, was evoked by the singing of the soloist, Miss Clementine De Vere, a soprano whom the LEDGER warmly commended last season when she made her first appearance here with Gilmore. She has notably gained since that time both in vocal development and in technical attainments. She sang one of the shorter arias from Mozart's "Magic Flute," and the well-known grand aria from Felicien David's "Pearl of Brazil." In response to a nearly unanimous redemand she repeated the latter aria, and then retired amid applause that any artist might have been proud of.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL. - - WASHINGTON.
Friday Evening, Jan. 17th, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.
The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

The Times
PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 16, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch Gives His Interpretation of the Fifth Symphony.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last night, opened with an exquisite presentation of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. The elaborate instrumentation of this rich and beautiful work displayed the quality of the orchestra to fine advantage, and its warm, Oriental color and delicious poetry were wonderfully expressed under Mr. Nikisch's sympathetic direction. Miss De Vere sang the aria of the "Queen of Night" and the "Charmant Oiseau," the latter very sweetly and with such effect that she was compelled to repeat it, though her voice was not as fresh and sure as it was in the summer, and the orchestra played Brahms' tedious variations upon an unfortunate theme by Haydn. Finally came the C minor symphony.

This is one of those standard works that everybody knows so well and has heard so often that it is not in need of any new interpretation by modern analysis, and unless a conductor can impart some unusual power to his treatment of it, his search after novelties can hardly meet with immediate acceptation. Mr. Nikisch's treatment of the symphony was imaginative to a degree that seemed affected and far-fetched, and both the opening movement and the andante lost more than they gained by bizarre readings and curiously accented contrasts. Yet there was no lack of feeling or of virility in his conducting, and when he yielded to his natural fervor he made his climaxes superbly and carried the final movement with magnificent effect.

The audience was large and very attentive and its applause was bestowed cordially, but with discrimination.

Sarasate and D'Albert will make their farewell appearance this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The pianist will play some notable solos, including a suite of his own, and Sarasate will give the Saint-Saëns concerto and other interesting selections. This will be the last opportunity to hear two of the greatest executants of their time. In the evening the concert of the Philadelphia Chorus occurs at the Academy, when the "Elijah" will be performed.

THE SUN.
BALTIMORE, FRIDAY, JAN. 17, 1890.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Mr. Arthur Nikisch is establishing surely his reputation in Baltimore as a leader of unusual power, and his direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum Theatre last night won him many new admirers. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra and first violinist of the now celebrated Kneisel Quartette. He rendered last night Brahms's concerto for violin, with orchestra, in D, which was presented for the first time in Baltimore.

THE RECORD.
Philadelphia, Thursday, January 16, 1890.

CLASSICAL MUSIC.

An Excellent Programme Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music brought out a notable audience of music-lovers, and the great band has never been heard here to better advantage. The instrumental numbers were Goldmark's romantic "Sakuntala" overture, Brahms' opus 56—the Haydn variations—and Beethoven's magnificent fifth symphony. The best work of the orchestra was, of course, heard in the symphony, of which the dramatic scherzo was given with extraordinary power and effect. Herr Nikisch certainly knows his Beethoven thoroughly. The ingenious variations by Brahms were rendered with delightful lucidity, and Goldmark's sensuous measures were interpreted with a warmth and breadth to which the listeners had hitherto been unaccustomed in the playing of this orchestra.

The soloist of the occasion was a soprano singer, Mlle. Clementina De Vere, who possesses a fluent, well-cultivated voice, of very high range but not much power. Her selections were the famous aria for soprano from Mozart's "Zauberfloete" and the almost equally well-known aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." These florid compositions were rendered in excellent style by Mlle. De Vere, even to the taking of the sensational high notes.

M'lle De Vere gave a finished and artistic rendering of the lovely cantabile passages of the "Pearl of Brazil" aria; and the applause was so persistent that she was induced to repeat the number.

THE AMERICAN MUSICIAN
NEW YORK, JANUARY 18, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Steinway Hall, Tuesday evening, January 14; the following was the program:

1. Overture—"Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
2. Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, op. 33..Saint-Saens
   Allegro non troppo. Allegretto con moto. Allegro non troppo.
3. Variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56..... Brahms
4. Symphony in E flat, No. 1.....Alexander Borodin
   Adagio; allegro. Scherzo. Andante. Allegro molto vivo. (First time.)

An admirable feature of this program was its eclecticism; four different schools of composers were represented, and for once we were spared the too-familiar classic symphony, without which an orchestral concert now-a-days seems to be an impracticable desideratum. Not that I object to the classic symphony—far from it; what I wish is that our conductors would vary their selections and not give us over and over again the self-same, oft-heard stock symphonies and overtures and neglect to present works of merit that are less popular ones because they are less evidently known.

The most interesting work presented on the occasion under consideration was without doubt Borodine's symphony, an exceedingly well-conceived and well-constructed composition; it contains an abundance of thematic material, much of it decidedly original and characteristically Russian, though not as pronouncedly so as a great part of that which forms the basis of the symphonic creations of Tchaikoffsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mussorgsky, and the other lights of the neo-Slavo school; the melodic ideas are clearly expressed and are developed in an exceedingly clever manner with a directness and frank sincerity which leave no doubt as to the author's purpose. The scoring is masterly and effective, there being a great variety of instrumental tone-colors without the bewildering intricacies of conflicting rhythmic designs which render appreciation of many symphonic works a fatiguing and thankless task; the various imitations of the principal themes, now entrusted to one instrument and then to another, appear in easily distinguishable relief without being obtrusive; the rhythms, many of them rather erratic, are maintained with sufficient and well-adjusted continuity, giving the hearer leisure to seize their peculiarities before they are abandoned and new figures taken up. In a word, it is a composition which can be followed and enjoyed without undue mental effort; at the same time it is neither vulgar nor commonplace, each page giving evidence of the writer's seriousness of purpose and elevated ideals.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture opened the concert very brilliantly; its passionate fire and vivid instrumental coloring make it an attractive and showy tone-picture, while the deep feeling which pervades the less animated passages appeal to the emotions of the contemplative hearer.

Saint-Saens' violoncello concerto is bright and pleasing, and affords the solo performer ample opportunities for the display of the resources of his instrument; many details of the orchestration are exceedingly dainty, and the elegance and grace which distinguish Saint-Saens' work in general are not wanting in the present instance.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played this concerto with excellent technique, good phrasing and careful attention to mechanical execution; his interpretation was an eminently correct one. But his tone, though full and sonorous, was somewhat crude and lacked warmth and feeling. The rapid passages in the last movement were not very clear, and at times seemed to be confused; with this exception, Mr. Hekking's work was very creditable and called forth the warm applause of the audience.

The execution of the orchestra was characterized by the defects which I commented upon in reviewing the first concert of the series, the want of precision in attack, occasioned by Mr. Nikisch's uncertain beat, was particularly noticeable in Goldmark's overture; in Borodine's symphony and notably in the difficult last movement, the virtuosity of the orchestra was triumphantly displayed. The enormously complicated Brahms' variations were given in a monotonous though conscientious manner.

AMERICO GORI.

[62]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - - Baltimore.

Thursday Evening, Jan. 16th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18TH
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

[63]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH
Conductor

Soloists
MR. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

Programme

OVERTURE, "Freischutz," ..... Weber

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN IN B MINOR
No. 3 op. 61 ..... Saint-Säens

Allegro non troppo

Andante quasi allegretto

Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo

[First time]

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, ... Schumann

FANTASIE FOR FLUTE, ... Demerssermann

MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser," ..... Wagner

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The soloist at next Saturday evening's Symphony concert will be Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor, and the programme: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts); songs with piano, Dvorák, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter," (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge"; symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The second outing of the orchestra was in every respect as successful as the first. Mr. Nikisch made admirable programmes for each of the five cities visited. New York thanked him for a hearing of the Borodin symphony, in which it found much to admire. Philadelphia is simply wild over the orchestra; an enormous audience heard the concert of the 15th. An extra concert was given in Philadelphia on Saturday night under the auspices of the Hahnemann Hospital; Messrs. Adamowski and Molé were the soloists. The soloists on the trip were Mr. Loeffler (Symphonie Espagnole, Lalo), and Mr. Molé in New Haven; Mr. Hekking (St. Saens's 'cello concerto) in New York; Miss Clementine DeVere in Philadelphia and Washington; Mr. Kneisel (Brahms's violin concerto) in Baltimore. Both the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets give series concerts while the orchestra peregrinate; the former in Baltimore, the latter in Philadelphia.

REFERRING to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York last Tuesday, the Sun of the following morning gives this unequivocal praise: "Last evening's performance once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of their new conductor, Arthur Nikisch, which occurred at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening of last week, strengthened and intensified the good opinion which their first concert had evoked. No more brilliant, concise and artistically satisfying orchestral performances have been heard here for many years than are those now being given by the Boston organization under their new leader, and the enthusiasm with which each number was received by a large and cultured audience showed that New York has none of that petty local jealousy which is apt to be displayed on such occasions in smaller cities where pride predominates over culture and knowledge.

The program was constituted of four entirely modern works, one of which was a novelty to New York and proved a most interesting and important composition. The opening number was Goldmark's richly colored and spicily harmonized "Sakuntala" overture—a work which is well known to local concert goers through numerous performances, both under the late Dr. Damrosch, with whom it was quite a favorite, and Theodore Thomas. Their readings, however, remained far behind Mr. Nikisch's for dramatic fervor and intensity, as well as fine dynamic shadings and well marked rhythmic accentuation, and a more brilliant and sonorous as well as precise performance of this overture has never before been heard in this city.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Hekking, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and formerly Bilse's first violoncellist, who performed Saint-Saëns' beautiful A minor 'cello concerto, which has not been heard here in public since the ill fated virtuoso Adolph Fischer played it some ten years ago. Mr. Hekking displayed a perfect technical command of his instrument and a beautiful tone quality in the B flat cantilene portion of the concerto. His performance was received with well deserved applause.

Brahms' "Choral St. Anthony" orchestral variations, one of Theodore Thomas' chevaux de bataille, was next on the program, and Mr. Nikisch's band gave it a performance in no way inferior to that to which our Nestor conductor has accustomed us, which is bestowing ample praise.

The last work on the program proved the most pretentious and also most interesting number. It was Alexander Borodin's symphony in E flat, which curiously enough had so far never been produced in New York. It is the first of the Russian composer's two only symphonies and was brought out through the influence of Franz Liszt, Borodin's friend and admirer, at the Wiesbaden meeting of the "Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein" in 1880. The work shows the characteristics of the modern Russian school, one of the foremost representatives of which Borodin, despite the comparatively small number of his published compositions, remained up to the time of his death at the age of fifty-four. It has in three of its movements (in all but the slow movement) some of that elementary power, but also some of the eccentricities in rhythmic and harmonic structure, as well as the dark orchestral coloring and general ruggedness which distinguish the ultra Russian musical writers and which seem the echoes of their literature and find their probable origin in the political and social circumstances of the country. The slow movement, however, is vastly disappointing, as it lacks both originality and spontaneity of invention, breadth and development. A most striking peculiarity of this andante, moreover, is the fact that it is written in D major, a key not at all related to that of E flat, in which the other three movements are composed. The scherzo, which curiously enough precedes instead of, as is usual, follows the slow movement, is to our mind the most original portion of the symphony, and the trio of the same is decidedly beautiful. The finale bears so close a resemblance in invention, rhythm and general structure to the last movement of Schumann's D minor symphony that it seemed almost a paraphrase of the latter, which is most astonishing in a writer otherwise so original and which makes us think that the imitation was not an unconscious, but a well planned and intended one.

The performance was, despite the great technical, more especially rhythmical, difficulties of the work, on the same high artistic level as that of the preceding numbers and was received with enthusiastic applause, which augmented in intensity from movement to movement.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - - Baltimore.

Thursday Evening, Jan. 16th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18TH
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

[63]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH
Conductor

Soloists
MR. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

Programme

OVERTURE, "Freischutz," ..... Weber

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN IN B MINOR
No. 3 op. 61 ..... Saint-Säens

Allegro non troppo

Andante quasi allegretto

Molto moderato e maestoso: allegro non troppo

[First time

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, ... Schumann

FANTASIE FOR FLUTE, ... Demerssermann

MR. CHAS. MOLE

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser," ..... Wagner

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The soloist at next Saturday evening's Symphony concert will be Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor, and the programme: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts); songs with piano, Dvorák, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter," (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge"; symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The second outing of the orchestra was in every respect as successful as the first. Mr. Nikisch made admirable programmes for each of the five cities visited. New York thanked him for a hearing of the Borodin symphony, in which it found much to admire. Philadelphia is simply wild over the orchestra; an enormous audience heard the concert of the 15th. An extra concert was given in Philadelphia on Saturday night under the auspices of the Hahnemann Hospital; Messrs. Adamowski and Molé were the soloists. The soloists on the trip were Mr. Loeffler (Symphonie Espagnole, Lalo), and Mr. Molé in New Haven; Mr. Hekking (St. Saens's 'cello concerto) in New York; Miss Clementine DeVere in Philadelphia and Washington; Mr. Kneisel (Brahms's violin concerto) in Baltimore. Both the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets give series concerts while the orchestra peregrinate; the former in Baltimore, the latter in Philadelphia.

REFERRING to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York last Tuesday, the Sun of the following morning gives this unequivocal praise: "Last evening's performance once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of their new conductor, Arthur Nikisch, which occurred at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening of last week, strengthened and intensified the good opinion which their first concert had evoked. No more brilliant, concise and artistically satisfying orchestral performances have been heard here for many years than are those now being given by the Boston organization under their new leader, and the enthusiasm with which each number was received by a large and cultured audience showed that New York has none of that petty local jealousy which is apt to be displayed on such occasions in smaller cities where pride predominates over culture and knowledge.

The program was constituted of four entirely modern works, one of which was a novelty to New York and proved a most interesting and important composition. The opening number was Goldmark's richly colored and spicily harmonized "Sakuntala" overture—a work which is well known to local concert goers through numerous performances, both under the late Dr. Damrosch, with whom it was quite a favorite, and Theodore Thomas. Their readings, however, remained far behind Mr. Nikisch's for dramatic fervor and intensity, as well as fine dynamic shadings and well marked rhythmic accentuation, and a more brilliant and sonorous as well as precise performance of this overture has never before been heard in this city.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Hekking, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and formerly Bilse's first violoncellist, who performed Saint-Saëns' beautiful A minor 'cello concerto, which has not been heard here in public since the ill fated virtuoso Adolph Fischer played it some ten years ago. Mr. Hekking displayed a perfect technical command of his instrument and a beautiful tone quality in the B flat cantilene portion of the concerto. His performance was received with well deserved applause.

Brahms' "Choral St. Anthony" orchestral variations, one of Theodore Thomas' chevaux de bataille, was next on the program, and Mr. Nikisch's band gave it a performance in no way inferior to that to which our Nestor conductor has accustomed us, which is bestowing ample praise.

The last work on the program proved the most pretentious and also most interesting number. It was Alexander Borodin's symphony in E flat, which curiously enough had so far never been produced in New York. It is the first of the Russian composer's two only symphonies and was brought out through the influence of Franz Liszt, Borodin's friend and admirer, at the Wiesbaden meeting of the "Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein" in 1880. The work shows the characteristics of the modern Russian school, one of the foremost representatives of which Borodin, despite the comparatively small number of his published compositions, remained up to the time of his death at the age of fifty-four. It has in three of its movements (in all but the slow movement) some of that elementary power, but also some of the eccentricities in rhythmic and harmonic structure, as well as the dark orchestral coloring and general ruggedness which distinguish the ultra Russian musical writers and which seem the echoes of their literature and find their probable origin in the political and social circumstances of the country. The slow movement, however, is vastly disappointing, as it lacks both originality and spontaneity of invention, breadth and development. A most striking peculiarity of this andante, moreover, is the fact that it is written in D major, a key not at all related to that of E flat, in which the other three movements are composed. The scherzo, which curiously enough precedes instead of, as is usual, follows the slow movement, is to our mind the most original portion of the symphony, and the trio of the same is decidedly beautiful. The finale bears so close a resemblance in invention, rhythm and general structure to the last movement of Schumann's D minor symphony that it seemed almost a paraphrase of the latter, which is most astonishing in a writer otherwise so original and which makes us think that the imitation was not an unconscious, but a well planned and intended one.

The performance was, despite the great technical, more especially rhythmical, difficulties of the work, on the same high artistic level as that of the preceding numbers and was received with enthusiastic applause, which augmented in intensity from movement to movement.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch gives the central position on his programme tonight to a work which will be new to the majority of his audience, but of which Mr. Neuendorff, ever alert and enterprising, gave Boston people their first hearing at one of last summer's promenade concerts. This is the suite composed by Grieg to accompany the "Peer Gynt" of Ibsen. This dramatic poem represents the wanderings and the fortunes of a romantic legendary hero, who is so devoted to the temptations of his fancy and his imagination, and so fond of exploits and experiences in foreign lands that he is sure to come to a bad end unless the faithful love of some good woman shall prevail and endure to save him. He does various rash and daring deeds he is in his time fascinated by Anitra, a Bedouin girl, is pestered by imps, falls in love with a king's daughter, romps with dairy-maids, and so on through many phases of adventure. Now and then he returns home, and it is during one of these visits that his adored mother, Aase, his confidant and counsellor, dies. He ultimately becomes n rich man, and in his elder years, reformed, purified and calmed, he marries the sweetheart of his youth, Solveig, whose tender and gracious character is so beautifully hinted in the "Sunshine" song. Grieg, profoundly attached to the folk-lore of his country, and often inspired by it, wrote a good deal of music to round out and accompany the stage presentation of this poem, from which the four pieces now presented are selected. The first is a quiet and grateful "Daybreak," delicately wrought out from a soft phrase first given by the wooden wind, and swelling up calmly under a pulsating atmosphere, as it were, of the strings. The second is the funeral march for the dead mother's burial, consisting of four strophes, as we might call them, each simple but weighted with the stress of pain and grief; this is for the muted strings alone, and a notable feature of its construction is the gradual increase of its woe to a full outburst, which then slowly sinks away until it is lost in a few long-drawn, and faint but heavy sobs. The third, the dance of Anitra, is also confined to the strings, which are now touched with pizzicato and again with the bow, giving out strains alternately piquant and languorous; a few bright jinglings of the triangle emphasize it. The fourth is a scene of imps tormenting Peer Gynt, written for full orchestra and often thoroughly quaint and humorous. It opens with a clanging call from the horn, and then the bassoon pops out with an odd little tune which makes the substance of the whole. This is rapidly worked up and pointed here and there with horn-calls or with snappy clashes of cymbals or sudden short rumbles of the drum. The playing of these movements yesterday afternoon was charmingly fresh and clean throughout, and nobody could have complained reasonably that in the second and third the strings did not show all their old finish and sentiment of style, while the oddities of the last were capitally indicated. An admirably reserved and steady rendering of Mendelssohn's poetic "Melusine" overture began the rehearsal yesterday, and Schumann's third, or "Rhenish" symphony, which we could not wait to hear, stood at the end of the programme. The soloist is Mr. W. J. Winch, who has chosen Adolar's romance (in Euryanthe) and a group of four Dvorak songs. He was in fine voice yesterday, and gave the romance with frank, clear and fine phrasings, and the songs with the taste and understanding which he, more than any other of our singers, brings to the music of their author. For Saturday next the programme will be: the Back-Abert prelude and fugue, Raff's "Fatherland" symphony new to Boston, and Wagner's "Huldizung's" march.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening the programme was: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina"; Weber, romance from "Euryanthe"; Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46; Dvorak, songs with piano; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish) op. 97.

The singing of the Weber "Romance," by Mr. Winch and of the Dvorak songs was one of the most praiseworthy and interesting features of the concert. Otherwise the programme was a somewhat mixed-up affair, of no especial merit. Mr. Winch was as usual the true artist, with the Weber aria, his conceptive ability, his musical intelligence, and refined feeling being all that could have been wished. The Dvorak songs were charmingly sung, and the able artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Mr. Nikisch at the piano as accompanist was so admirable that he rendered it simply inexplicable how he could have been responsible, as he really was, for the very inadaquate, clumsy and unsympathic accompaniment of the Weber selection. The Grieg "Suite" was enthusiastically received by the audience, but it is a very ill-made composition, the chief characteristic of which is its ear-tickling, vulgar and shallow tuneliness. That the audience applauded it so boisterously was by no means creditable to the prevailing taste. The overture, suite and symphony were all well played.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine."

The production of this work at the thirteenth Symphony Concert in Boston, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, is another evidence that our conductors are lending their ears to what will soon be a popular cry in behalf of native composers being given a hearing in the programmes of our orchestral societies. As we were not in Boston to hear this new work and desire to keep our readers au courant with the progress of the American movement, we quote the following critical essay from the able and independent pen of Philip Hale:

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions, and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine and at the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes, and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine 'motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week? Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of contruction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form of seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty Queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterward identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself: "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say: "and when A, B and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed programme, and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind) that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or, as Sir Thomas Browns puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer." But the modern school of sophist musicians believe in programme music and "symphonic poems;" and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought.

We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, toward that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive, and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell, as he goes on and forward in his musical career, will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "programme music."

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

A programme in which the semi-popular as well as the classical tastes of the audience were catered to, was presented Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. If the audience was a trifle cold in its welcome of the conductor after his second successful tour to New York and other cities, that coldness was speedily dispelled, and a more enthusiastic acknowledgment of the performance of the Suite by Grieg has not been heard since the celebrated three symphony night. This was the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina;" Weber, romance from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (first time at these concerts); Dvorak, songs with piano, (a) "I chant my lay," (b) "Hark, how my triangle," (c) "Songs my mother taught me," (d) "Cloudy hights of Tatra daring Falcon haunteth;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), op. 97.

The numbers by the orchestra were all finely rendered. The Schumann symphony, despite the fact that it was a symphony and developed by the composer with all the richness of color characteristic of him, was listened to with almost as much pleasure apparently as the Grieg suite. It was a marvel of clear technique, and of the excellent command of Mr. Nikisch over his musicians. His very beauty of rendering could not fail to command attention, and the murmur of approbation which followed each movement was so apparent as to show the unmeasured appreciation of the audience.

The Grieg suite had been heard at the summer promenades, but this would hardly be a test of its beauties, though the fact that it was selected for the promenades would indicate that it would find response in the musical instincts of the people who attended those concerts. Yet the contrasts in the numbers, the careful manner in which it was rendered, particularly by the divided strings, disclosed new beauties, and it was an evident pleasure even to the severely classical. There is no reason why, occasionally, such a selection is not appropriately made, and nothing more fitting could have been chosen. So enthusiastic was the audience that Mr. Nikisch consented to a repetition of the closing movement, something very exceptional in a Symphony concert, and the first time it has been allowed this season.

The soloist was William J. Winch, whose pleasant face and fine stage presence is probably better known than that of any musician in Boston. Mr. Winch's appearances in public have not been very frequent this season, and his greeting was all the more cordial. His delivery of the aria was scholarly and artistic, and there are few who can interpret the songs of Dvorak as can Mr. Winch. He was recalled several times after each number, and the accompaniments to his songs were played on the piano by Mr. Nikisch in a masterly manner, to the evident pleasure of the artist as well as the audience. The following is the programme for the next concert: Bach-Albert, Prelude and Fugue; Raff, symphony, "An das Vaterland," (first time in Boston); Wagner, Huldizungs March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

[64]

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Winch as Soloist.

Mendelssohn has, in his overtures, given two cold water tone pictures that seem almost companion pieces; at all events, the kinship between the "Fingal's Cave" overture and the "Melusina" will be apparent to musicians, although the former is by far the greater work. Nevertheless, the beauty of the themes and the delicacy of their treatment was so well brought out in the performance of Saturday night that "Die Schoene Melusina" never sounded better to my ears. Yet the success lay more in the poetic reading than in the ensemble attained. In this overture, as also in the third movement of the Schumann symphony, the attacks were sometimes a trifle rough and irregular. There is scarcely any doubt that we are gaining in one direction and losing in another; there is no longer the absolute precision that the orchestra once possessed, but there is so much of true poetic inspiration in the interpretations of Mr. Nikisch that even the most captious auditor is moved as never before. This was peculiarly the case with the "Cologne" symphony with which the concert closed. In this there was all the contemplative character of Schumann, and the second movement became almost a revelation. There is a wealth of exaltation in Schumann's expression of joy whether we seek it in such songs as "Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben," "Du Ring an meinem Finger," or "Im wunderschoenen monat Mai," in the fantasie for piano, or in the scherzo movements of his symphonies; with this composer a scherzo never becomes purely fun, or an expression of animal spirits. This point is well understood by Mr. Nikisch, and the sympathetic vein in which the Molto moderato was given calls for enthusiastic praise. The fourth movement also was an inspiration, for the broad imitation of organ effects was superbly effective. The chattering finale, picturing the people pouring out of the cathedral into the streets of Cologne in holiday attire and mood, was given with appropriate boldness, and is probably as near to the joking vein as Schumann ever came in any of his larger works. The symphony is a double delight to the thoughtful auditor, for it shows us the composer once more free from the pall of his melancholia, rejoicing in the happy Rhine life and approaching in mood to the blissful contentment which he experienced and which he wrote into his works (for Schumann, more than any other composer portrayed himself and his moods in his music) in the untroubled epoch of 1840.

One feels like expressing especial thanks to Mr. Nikisch for having placed such a work as Grieg's "Peer Gynt" on the programme, for it means that he is free from the exaggerated idea of the educational character of these concerts, which in past seasons has proved such a barrier to the performance of many a characteristic work, because "it was not up to the dignity of the symphonic concert." More of such works will not be amiss, for anything that has a distinctly national flavor is both dignified and educational. But the ready acceptance of an encore was, I think, unwise, for these concerts have hitherto been the one series sacred from the horny hands of the encore fiend. It would be better to continue to apply old Weller's apothegm about letter-writing to the concert programmes. The performance of this work left nothing to be desired, for the sturdy style, occasionally becoming even roughness, was entirely in place. What an adept in the use of sombre tints Grieg is! and he catches up the folks-tone better than any other of the Scandinavian composers. The breath of the early morning was in the first movement, the darkness of the long winter night in the picture of Death in the second. "Anitra's Dance," although not so truly Oriental as the dances which Rubinstein has given us in "Feramors," was yet very attractive. But the finale, a strange picture of gnomes and imps, was effective from beginning to end. It began boldly enough with a hideous tone on the horn, muted, awkward and lumbering progressions, reminding of Pierrot in Schumann's "Carnival," followed, only this was a spectral carnival, a saturnalia of sprites "paa Dovre-fjeld i Norge." All kinds of percussive effects were in the movement, and bass-drum and cymbals added the clangor to the spectral revelry, and the very abrupt end was peculiarly effective.

Men may come and men may go, but Mr. W. J. Winch will sing Dvorak's Gypsy songs forever, nor shall I enter any protest, so long as he sings them as well as he did at this concert. It is not too much to say that he never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. His voice has broadened considerably, yet has not lost its peculiarly sweet timbre, and Weber's romantic music as represented by the romance of Adolar in "Euryanthe" suited him to perfection. Mr. Nikisch himself was the accompanist, and although at times he made the piano a little too prominent, the elasticity and grace of the work was only what one would have expected from so thorough and enthusiastic a musician.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch gives the central position on his programme tonight to a work which will be new to the majority of his audience, but of which Mr. Neuendorff, ever alert and enterprising, gave Boston people their first hearing at one of last summer's promenade concerts. This is the suite composed by Grieg to accompany the "Peer Gynt" of Ibsen. This dramatic poem represents the wanderings and the fortunes of a romantic legendary hero, who is so devoted to the temptations of his fancy and his imagination, and so fond of exploits and experiences in foreign lands that he is sure to come to a bad end unless the faithful love of some good woman shall prevail and endure to save him. He does various rash and daring deeds he is in his time fascinated by Anitra, a Bedouin girl, is pestered by imps, falls in love with a king's daughter, romps with dairy-maids, and so on through many phases of adventure. Now and then he returns home, and it is during one of these visits that his adored mother, Aase, his confidant and counsellor, dies. He ultimately becomes n rich man, and in his elder years, reformed, purified and calmed, he marries the sweetheart of his youth, Solveig, whose tender and gracious character is so beautifully hinted in the "Sunshine" song. Grieg, profoundly attached to the folk-lore of his country, and often inspired by it, wrote a good deal of music to round out and accompany the stage presentation of this poem, from which the four pieces now presented are selected. The first is a quiet and grateful "Daybreak," delicately wrought out from a soft phrase first given by the wooden wind, and swelling up calmly under a pulsating atmosphere, as it were, of the strings. The second is the funeral march for the dead mother's burial, consisting of four strophes, as we might call them, each simple but weighted with the stress of pain and grief; this is for the muted strings alone, and a notable feature of its construction is the gradual increase of its woe to a full outburst, which then slowly sinks away until it is lost in a few long-drawn, and faint but heavy sobs. The third, the dance of Anitra, is also confined to the strings, which are now touched with pizzicato and again with the bow, giving out strains alternately piquant and languorous; a few bright jinglings of the triangle emphasize it. The fourth is a scene of imps tormenting Peer Gynt, written for full orchestra and often thoroughly quaint and humorous. It opens with a clanging call from the horn, and then the bassoon pops out with an odd little tune which makes the substance of the whole. This is rapidly worked up and pointed here and there with horn-calls or with snappy clashes of cymbals or sudden short rumbles of the drum. The playing of these movements yesterday afternoon was charmingly fresh and clean throughout, and nobody could have complained reasonably that in the second and third the strings did not show all their old finish and sentiment of style, while the oddities of the last were capitally indicated. An admirably reserved and steady rendering of Mendelssohn's poetic "Melusine" overture began the rehearsal yesterday, and Schumann's third, or "Rhenish" symphony, which we could not wait to hear, stood at the end of the programme. The soloist is Mr. W. J. Winch, who has chosen Adolar's romance (in Euryanthe) and a group of four Dvorak songs. He was in fine voice yesterday, and gave the romance with frank, clear and fine phrasings, and the songs with the taste and understanding which he, more than any other of our singers, brings to the music of their author. For Saturday next the programme will be: the Back-Abert prelude and fugue, Raff's "Fatherland" symphony new to Boston, and Wagner's "Huldizung's" march.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening the programme was: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina"; Weber, romance from "Euryanthe"; Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46; Dvorak, songs with piano; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish) op. 97.

The singing of the Weber "Romance," by Mr. Winch and of the Dvorak songs was one of the most praiseworthy and interesting features of the concert. Otherwise the programme was a somewhat mixed-up affair, of no especial merit. Mr. Winch was as usual the true artist, with the Weber aria, his conceptive ability, his musical intelligence, and refined feeling being all that could have been wished. The Dvorak songs were charmingly sung, and the able artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Mr. Nikisch at the piano as accompanist was so admirable that he rendered it simply inexplicable how he could have been responsible, as he really was, for the very inadaquate, clumsy and unsympathic accompaniment of the Weber selection. The Grieg "Suite" was enthusiastically received by the audience, but it is a very ill-made composition, the chief characteristic of which is its ear-tickling, vulgar and shallow tuneliness. That the audience applauded it so boisterously was by no means creditable to the prevailing taste. The overture, suite and symphony were all well played.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine."

The production of this work at the thirteenth Symphony Concert in Boston, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, is another evidence that our conductors are lending their ears to what will soon be a popular cry in behalf of native composers being given a hearing in the programmes of our orchestral societies. As we were not in Boston to hear this new work and desire to keep our readers au courant with the progress of the American movement, we quote the following critical essay from the able and independent pen of Philip Hale:

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions, and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine andat the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes, and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine "motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week? Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of construction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form of seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty Queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterward identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself: "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say: "and when A, B and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed programme, and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind) that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or, as Sir Thomas Browns puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer." But the modern school of sophist musicians believe in programme music and "symphonic poems;" and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought.

We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, toward that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive, and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell, as he goes on and forward in his musical career, will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "programme music."

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

A programme in which the semi-popular as well as the classical tastes of the audience were catered to, was presented Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. If the audience was a trifle cold in its welcome of the conductor after his second successful tour to New York and other cities, that coldness was speedily dispelled, and a more enthusiastic acknowledgment of the performance of the Suite by Grieg has not been heard since the celebrated three symphony night. This was the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina;" Weber, romance from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (first time at these concerts); Dvorak, songs with piano, (a) "I chant my lay," (b) "Hark, how my triangle," (c) "Songs my mother taught me," (d) "Cloudy hights of Tatra daring Falcon haunteth;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), op. 97.

The numbers by the orchestra were all finely rendered. The Schumann symphony, despite the fact that it was a symphony and developed by the composer with all the richness of color characteristic of him, was listened to with almost as much pleasure apparently as the Grieg suite. It was a marvel of clear technique, and of the excellent command of Mr. Nikisch over his musicians. His very beauty of rendering could not fail to command attention, and the murmur of approbation which followed each movement was so apparent as to show the unmeasured appreciation of the audience.

The Grieg suite had been heard at the summer promenades, but this would hardly be a test of its beauties, though the fact that it was selected for the promenades would indicate that it would find response in the musical instincts of the people who attended those concerts. Yet the contrasts in the numbers, the careful manner in which it was rendered, particularly by the divided strings, disclosed new beauties, and it was an evident pleasure even to the severely classical. There is no reason why, occasionally, such a selection is not appropriately made, and nothing more fitting could have been chosen. So enthusiastic was the audience that Mr. Nikisch consented to a repetition of the closing movement, something very exceptional in a Symphony concert, and the first time it has been allowed this season.

The soloist was William J. Winch, whose pleasant face and fine stage presence is probably better known than that of any musician in Boston. Mr. Winch's appearances in public have not been very frequent this season, and his greeting was all the more cordial. His delivery of the aria was scholarly and artistic, and there are few who can interpret the songs of Dvorak as can Mr. Winch. He was recalled several times after each number, and the accompaniments to his songs were played on the piano by Mr. Nikisch in a masterly manner, to the evident pleasure of the artist as well as the audience. The following is the programme for the next concert: Bach-Albert, Prelude and Fugue; Raff, symphony, "An das Vaterland," (first time in Boston); Wagner, Huldigungs March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

[64]

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Winch as Soloist.

Mendelssohn has, in his overtures, given two cold water tone pictures that seem almost companion pieces; at all events, the kinship between the "Fingal's Cave" overture and the "Melusina" will be apparent to musicians, although the former is by far the greater work. Nevertheless, the beauty of the themes and the delicacy of their treatment was so well brought out in the performance of Saturday night that "Die Schoene Melusina" never sounded better to my ears. Yet the success lay more in the poetic reading than in the ensemble attained. In this overture, as also in the third movement of the Schumann symphony, the attacks were sometimes a trifle rough and irregular. There is scarcely any doubt that we are gaining in one direction and losing in another; there is no longer the absolute precision that the orchestra once possessed, but there is so much of true poetic inspiration in the interpretations of Mr. Nikisch that even the most captious auditor is moved as never before. This was peculiarly the case with the "Cologne" symphony with which the concert closed. In this there was all the contemplative character of Schumann, and the second movement became almost a revelation. There is a wealth of exaltation in Schumann's expression of joy whether we seek it in such songs as "Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben," "Du Ring an meinem Finger," or "Im wunderschoenen monat Mai," in the fantasie for piano, or in the scherzo movements of his symphonies; with this composer a scherzo never becomes purely fun, or an expression of animal spirits. This point is well understood by Mr. Nikisch, and the sympathetic vein in which the Molto moderato was given calls for enthusiastic praise. The fourth movement also was an inspiration, for the broad imitation of organ effects was superbly effective. The chattering finale, picturing the people pouring out of the cathedral into the streets of Cologne in holiday attire and mood, was given with appropriate boldness, and is probably as near to the joking vein as Schumann ever came in any of his larger works. The symphony is a double delight to the thoughtful auditor, for it shows us the composer once more free from the pall of his melancholia, rejoicing in the happy Rhine life and approaching in mood to the blissful contentment which he experienced and which he wrote into his works (for Schumann, more than any other composer portrayed himself and his moods in his music) in the untroubled epoch of 1840.

One feels like expressing especial thanks to Mr. Nikisch for having placed such a work as Grieg's "Peer Gynt" on the programme, for it means that he is free from the exaggerated idea of the educational character of these concerts, which in past seasons has proved such a barrier to the performance of many a characteristic work, because "it was not up to the dignity of the symphonic concert." More of such works will not be amiss, for anything that has a distinctly national flavor is both dignified and educational. But the ready acceptance of an encore was, I think, unwise, for these concerts have hitherto been the one series sacred from the horny hands of the encore fiend. It would be better to continue to apply old Weller's apothegm about letter-writing to the concert programmes. The performance of this work left nothing to be desired, for the sturdy style, occasionally becoming even roughness, was entirely in place. What an adept in the use of sombre tints Grieg is! and he catches up the folks-tone better than any other of the Scandinavian composers. The breath of the early morning was in the first movement, the darkness of the long winter night in the picture of Death in the second. "Anitra's Dance," although not so truly Oriental as the dances which Rubinstein has given us in "Feramors," was yet very attractive. But the finale, a strange picture of gnomes and imps, was effective from beginning to end. It began boldly enough with a hideous tone on the horn, muted, awkward and lumbering progressions, reminding of Pierrot in Schumann's "Carnival," followed, only this was a spectral carnival, a saturnalia of sprites "paa Dovre-fjeld i Norge." All kinds of percussive effects were in the movement, and bass-drum and cymbals added the clangor to the spectral revelry, and the very abrupt end was peculiarly effective.

Men may come and men may go, but Mr. W. J. Winch will sing Dvorak's Gypsy songs forever, nor shall I enter any protest, so long as he sings them as well as he did at this concert. It is not too much to say that he never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. His voice has broadened considerably, yet has not lost its peculiarly sweet timbre, and Weber's romantic music as represented by the romance of Adolar in "Euryanthe" suited him to perfection. Mr. Nikisch himself was the accompanist, and although at times he made the piano a little too prominent, the elasticity and grace of the work was only what one would have expected from so thorough and enthusiastic a musician.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - - Baltimore.

Thursday Evening, Jan. 16th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18TH
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

[63]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH
Conductor

Soloists
MR. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

Programme

OVERTURE, "Freischutz," ..... Weber

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN IN B MINOR
No. 3 op. 61 ..... Saint-Saëns

Allegro non troppo

Andante quasi allegretto

Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo

[First time]

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, ... Schumann

FANTASIE FOR FLUTE, ... Demerssermann

MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser," ..... Wagner

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The soloist at next Saturday evening's Symphony concert will be Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor, and the programme: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts); songs with piano, Dvorák, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter," (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge"; symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The second outing of the orchestra was in every respect as successful as the first. Mr. Nikisch made admirable programmes for each of the five cities visited. New York thanked him for a hearing of the Borodin symphony, in which it found much to admire. Philadelphia is simply wild over the orchestra; an enormous audience heard the concert of the 15th. An extra concert was given in Philadelphia on Saturday night under the auspices of the Hahnemann Hospital; Messrs. Adamowski and Molé were the soloists. The soloists on the trip were Mr. Loeffler (Symphonie Espagnole, Lalo), and Mr. Molé in New Haven; Mr. Hekking (St. Saens's 'cello concerto) in New York; Miss Clementine DeVere in Philadelphia and Washington; Mr. Kneisel (Brahms's violin concerto) in Baltimore. Both the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets give series concerts while the orchestra peregrinate; the former in Baltimore, the latter in Philadelphia.

REFERRING to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York last Tuesday, the Sun of the following morning gives this unequivocal praise: "Last evening's performance once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

— A WEEKLY PAPER —

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of their new conductor, Arthur Nikisch, which occurred at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening of last week, strengthened and intensified the good opinion which their first concert had evoked. No more brilliant, concise and artistically satisfying orchestral performances have been heard here for many years than are those now being given by the Boston organization under their new leader, and the enthusiasm with which each number was received by a large and cultured audience showed that New York has none of that petty local jealousy which is apt to be displayed on such occasions in smaller cities where pride predominates over culture and knowledge.

The program was constituted of four entirely modern works, one of which was a novelty to New York and proved a most interesting and important composition. The opening number was Goldmark's richly colored and spicily harmonized "Sakuntala" overture—a work which is well known to local concert goers through numerous performances, both under the late Dr. Damrosch, with whom it was quite a favorite, and Theodore Thomas. Their readings, however, remained far behind Mr. Nikisch's for dramatic fervor and intensity, as well as fine dynamic shadings and well marked rhythmic accentuation, and a more brilliant and sonorous as well as precise performance of this overture has never before been heard in this city.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Hekking, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and formerly Bilse's first violoncellist, who performed Saint-Saëns' beautiful A minor 'cello concerto, which has not been heard here in public since the ill fated virtuoso Adolph Fischer played it some ten years ago. Mr. Hekking displayed a perfect technical command of his instrument and a beautiful tone quality in the B flat cantilene portion of the concerto. His performance was received with well deserved applause.

Brahms' "Choral St. Anthony" orchestral variations, one of Theodore Thomas' chevaux de bataille, was next on the program, and Mr. Nikisch's band gave it a performance in no way inferior to that to which our Nestor conductor has accustomed us, which is bestowing ample praise.

The last work on the program proved the most pretentious and also most interesting number. It was Alexander Borodin's symphony in E flat, which curiously enough had so far never been produced in New York. It is the first of the Russian composer's two only symphonies and was brought out through the influence of Franz Liszt, Borodin's friend and admirer, at the Wiesbaden meeting of the "Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein" in 1880. The work shows the characteristics of the modern Russian school, one of the foremost representatives of which Borodin, despite the comparatively small number of his published compositions, remained up to the time of his death at the age of fifty-four. It has in three of its movements (in all but the slow movement) some of that elementary power, but also some of the eccentricities in rhythmic and harmonic structure, as well as the dark orchestral coloring and general ruggedness which distinguish the ultra Russian musical writers and which seem the echoes of their literature and find their probable origin in the political and social circumstances of the country. The slow movement, however, is vastly disappointing, as it lacks both originality and spontaneity of invention, breadth and development. A most striking peculiarity of this andante, moreover, is the fact that it is written in D major, a key not at all related to that of E flat, in which the other three movements are composed. The scherzo, which curiously enough precedes instead of, as is usual, follows the slow movement, is to our mind the most original portion of the symphony, and the trio of the same is decidedly beautiful. The finale bears so close a resemblance in invention, rhythm and general structure to the last movement of Schumann's D minor symphony that it seemed almost a paraphrase of the latter, which is most astonishing in a writer otherwise so original and which makes us think that the imitation was not an unconscious, but a well planned and intended one.

The performance was, despite the great technical, more especially rhythmical, difficulties of the work, on the same high artistic level as that of the preceding numbers and was received with enthusiastic applause, which augmented in intensity from movement to movement.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - - Baltimore.

Thursday Evening, Jan. 16th, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.
The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18TH
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

[63]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH
Conductor

Soloists
MR. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
MR. CHAS. MOLÉ

Programme

OVERTURE, "Freischutz," ..... Weber

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN IN B MINOR
No. 3 op. 61 ..... Saint-Saëns

Allegro non troppo

Andante quasi allegretto

Molto moderato e maestoso; allegro non troppo

[First time

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, ... Schumann

FANTASIE FOR FLUTE, ... Demerssermann

MR. CHAS. MOLE

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser," ..... Wagner

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

The soloist at next Saturday evening's Symphony concert will be Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor, and the programme: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg (first time at these concerts); songs with piano, Dvorák, (a) "Mein Lied ertont," (b) "Ei wie mein Triangel," (c) "Als die alte Mutter," (d) "Darf des Falcon Schwinge"; symphony in E flat (Rhenish), Schumann.

The second outing of the orchestra was in every respect as successful as the first. Mr. Nikisch made admirable programmes for each of the five cities visited. New York thanked him for a hearing of the Borodin symphony, in which it found much to admire. Philadelphia is simply wild over the orchestra; an enormous audience heard the concert of the 15th. An extra concert was given in Philadelphia on Saturday night under the auspices of the Hahnemann Hospital; Messrs. Adamowski and Molé were the soloists. The soloists on the trip were Mr. Loeffler (Symphonie Espagnole, Lalo), and Mr. Molé in New Haven; Mr. Hekking (St. Saens's 'cello concerto) in New York; Miss Clementine DeVere in Philadelphia and Washington; Mr. Kneisel (Brahms's violin concerto) in Baltimore. Both the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets give series concerts while the orchestra peregrinate; the former in Baltimore, the latter in Philadelphia.

REFERRING to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York last Tuesday, the Sun of the following morning gives this unequivocal praise: "Last evening's performance once more established the fact that the band, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, is far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic. In the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish, but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution, and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest efforts."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of their new conductor, Arthur Nikisch, which occurred at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening of last week, strengthened and intensified the good opinion which their first concert had evoked. No more brilliant, concise and artistically satisfying orchestral performances have been heard here for many years than are those now being given by the Boston organization under their new leader, and the enthusiasm with which each number was received by a large and cultured audience showed that New York has none of that petty local jealousy which is apt to be displayed on such occasions in smaller cities where pride predominates over culture and knowledge.

The program was constituted of four entirely modern works, one of which was a novelty to New York and proved a most interesting and important composition. The opening number was Goldmark's richly colored and spicily harmonized "Sakuntala" overture—a work which is well known to local concert goers through numerous performances, both under the late Dr. Damrosch, with whom it was quite a favorite, and Theodore Thomas. Their readings, however, remained far behind Mr. Nikisch's for dramatic fervor and intensity, as well as fine dynamic shadings and well marked rhythmic accentuation, and a more brilliant and sonorous as well as precise performance of this overture has never before been heard in this city.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Hekking, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and formerly Bilse's first violoncellist, who performed Saint-Saëns' beautiful A minor 'cello concerto, which has not been heard here in public since the ill fated virtuoso Adolph Fischer played it some ten years ago. Mr. Hekking displayed a perfect technical command of his instrument and a beautiful tone quality in the B flat cantilene portion of the concerto. His performance was received with well deserved applause.

Brahms' "Choral St. Anthony" orchestral variations, one of Theodore Thomas' chevaux de bataille, was next on the program, and Mr. Nikisch's band gave it a performance in no way inferior to that to which our Nestor conductor has accustomed us, which is bestowing ample praise.

The last work on the program proved the most pretentious and also most interesting number. It was Alexander Borodin's symphony in E flat, which curiously enough had so far never been produced in New York. It is the first of the Russian composer's two only symphonies and was brought out through the influence of Franz Liszt, Borodin's friend and admirer, at the Wiesbaden meeting of the "Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein" in 1880. The work shows the characteristics of the modern Russian school, one of the foremost representatives of which Borodin, despite the comparatively small number of his published compositions, remained up to the time of his death at the age of fifty-four. It has in three of its movements (in all but the slow movement) some of that elementary power, but also some of the eccentricities in rhythmic and harmonic structure, as well as the dark orchestral coloring and general ruggedness which distinguish the ultra Russian musical writers and which seem the echoes of their literature and find their probable origin in the political and social circumstances of the country. The slow movement, however, is vastly disappointing, as it lacks both originality and spontaneity of invention, breadth and development. A most striking peculiarity of this andante, moreover, is the fact that it is written in D major, a key not at all related to that of E flat, in which the other three movements are composed. The scherzo, which curiously enough precedes instead of, as is usual, follows the slow movement, is to our mind the most original portion of the symphony, and the trio of the same is decidedly beautiful. The finale bears so close a resemblance in invention, rhythm and general structure to the last movement of Schumann's D minor symphony that it seemed almost a paraphrase of the latter, which is most astonishing in a writer otherwise so original and which makes us think that the imitation was not an unconscious, but a well planned and intended one.

The performance was, despite the great technical, more especially rhythmical, difficulties of the work, on the same high artistic level as that of the preceding numbers and was received with enthusiastic applause, which augmented in intensity from movement to movement.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch gives the central position on his programme tonight to a work which will be new to the majority of his audience, but of which Mr. Neuendorff, ever alert and enterprising, gave Boston people their first hearing at one of last summer's promenade concerts. This is the suite composed by Grieg to accompany the "Peer Gynt" of Ibsen. This dramatic poem represents the wanderings and the fortunes of a romantic legendary hero, who is so devoted to the temptations of his fancy and his imagination, and so fond of exploits and experiences in foreign lands that he is sure to come to a bad end unless the faithful love of some good woman shall prevail and endure to save him. He does various rash and daring deeds he is in his time fascinated by Anitra, a Bedouin girl, is pestered by imps, falls in love with a king's daughter, romps with dairy-maids, and so on through many phases of adventure. Now and then he returns home, and it is during one of these visits that his adored mother, Aase, his confidant and counsellor, dies. He ultimately becomes n rich man, and in his elder years, reformed, purified and calmed, he marries the sweetheart of his youth, Solveig, whose tender and gracious character is so beautifully hinted in the "Sunshine" song. Grieg, profoundly attached to the folk-lore of his country, and often inspired by it, wrote a good deal of music to round out and accompany the stage presentation of this poem, from which the four pieces now presented are selected. The first is a quiet and grateful "Daybreak," delicately wrought out from a soft phrase first given by the wooden wind, and swelling up calmly under a pulsating atmosphere, as it were, of the strings. The second is the funeral march for the dead mother's burial, consisting of four strophes, as we might call them, each simple but weighted with the stress of pain and grief; this is for the muted strings alone, and a notable feature of its construction is the gradual increase of its woe to a full outburst, which then slowly sinks away until it is lost in a few long-drawn, and faint but heavy sobs. The third, the dance of Anitra, is also confined to the strings, which are now touched with pizzicato and again with the bow, giving out strains alternately piquant and languorous; a few bright jinglings of the triangle emphasize it. The fourth is a scene of imps tormenting Peer Gynt, written for full orchestra and often thoroughly quaint and humorous. It opens with a clanging call from the horn, and then the bassoon pops out with an odd little tune which makes the substance of the whole. This is rapidly worked up and pointed here and there with horn-calls or with snappy clashes of cymbals or sudden short rumbles of the drum. The playing of these movements yesterday afternoon was charmingly fresh and clean throughout, and nobody could have complained reasonably that in the second and third the strings did not show all their old finish and sentiment of style, while the oddities of the last were capitally indicated. An admirably reserved and steady rendering of Mendelssohn's poetic "Melusine" overture began the rehearsal yesterday, and Schumann's third, or "Rhenish" symphony, which we could not wait to hear, stood at the end of the programme. The soloist is Mr. W. J. Winch, who has chosen Adolar's romance (in Euryanthe) and a group of four Dvorak songs. He was in fine voice yesterday, and gave the romance with frank, clear and fine phrasings, and the songs with the taste and understanding which he, more than any other of our singers, brings to the music of their author. For Saturday next the programme will be: the Back-Abert prelude and fugue, Raff's "Fatherland" symphony new to Boston, and Wagner's "Huldizung's" march.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening the programme was: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina"; Weber, romance from "Euryanthe"; Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46; Dvorak, songs with piano; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish) op. 97.

The singing of the Weber "Romance," by Mr. Winch and of the Dvorak songs was one of the most praiseworthy and interesting features of the concert. Otherwise the programme was a somewhat mixed-up affair, of no especial merit. Mr. Winch was as usual the true artist, with the Weber aria, his conceptive ability, his musical intelligence, and refined feeling being all that could have been wished. The Dvorak songs were charmingly sung, and the able artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Mr. Nikisch at the piano as accompanist was so admirable that he rendered it simply inexplicable how he could have been responsible, as he really was, for the very inadaquate, clumsy and unsympathic accompaniment of the Weber selection. The Grieg "Suite" was enthusiastically received by the audience, but it is a very ill-made composition, the chief characteristic of which is its ear-tickling, vulgar and shallow tuneliness. That the audience applauded it so boisterously was by no means creditable to the prevailing taste. The overture, suite and symphony were all well played.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine."

The production of this work at the thirteenth Symphony Concert in Boston, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, is another evidence that our conductors are lending their ears to what will soon be a popular cry in behalf of native composers being given a hearing in the programmes of our orchestral societies. As we were not in Boston to hear this new work and desire to keep our readers au courant with the progress of the American movement, we quote the following critical essay from the able and independent pen of Philip Hale:

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions, and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine andat the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes, and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine 'motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week? Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of construction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form of seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty Queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterward identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself: "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say: "and when A, B and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed programme, and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind) that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or, as Sir Thomas Browns puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer." But the modern school of sophist musicians believe in programme music and "symphonic poems;" and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought.

We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, toward that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive, and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell, as he goes on and forward in his musical career, will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "programme music."

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

A programme in which the semi-popular as well as the classical tastes of the audience were catered to, was presented Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. If the audience was a trifle cold in its welcome of the conductor after his second successful tour to New York and other cities, that coldness was speedily dispelled, and a more enthusiastic acknowledgment of the performance of the Suite by Grieg has not been heard since the celebrated three symphony night. This was the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina;" Weber, romance from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (first time at these concerts); Dvorak, songs with piano, (a) "I chant my lay." (b) "Hark, how my triangle," (c) "Songs my mother taught me," (d) "Cloudy hights of Tatra daring Falcon haunteth;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), op. 97.

The numbers by the orchestra were all finely rendered. The Schumann symphony, despite the fact that it was a symphony and developed by the composer with all the richness of color characteristic of him, was listened to with almost as much pleasure apparently as the Grieg suite. It was a marvel of clear technique, and of the excellent command of Mr. Nikisch over his musicians. His very beauty of rendering could not fail to command attention, and the murmur of approbation which followed each movement was so apparent as to show the unmeasured appreciation of the audience.

The Grieg suite had been heard at the summer promenades, but this would hardly be a test of its beauties, though the fact that it was selected for the promenades would indicate that it would find response in the musical instincts of the people who attended those concerts. Yet the contrasts in the numbers, the careful manner in which it was rendered, particularly by the divided strings, disclosed new beauties, and it was an evident pleasure even to the severely classical. There is no reason why, occasionally, such a selection is not appropriately made, and nothing more fitting could have been chosen. So enthusiastic was the audience that Mr. Nikisch consented to a repetition of the closing movement, something very exceptional in a Symphony concert, and the first time it has been allowed this season.

The soloist was William J. Winch, whose pleasant face and fine stage presence is probably better known than that of any musician in Boston. Mr. Winch's appearances in public have not been very frequent this season, and his greeting was all the more cordial. His delivery of the aria was scholarly and artistic, and there are few who can interpret the songs of Dvorak as can Mr. Winch. He was recalled several times after each number, and the accompaniments to his songs were played on the piano by Mr. Nikisch in a masterly manner, to the evident pleasure of the artist as well as the audience. The following is the programme for the next concert: Bach-Albert, Prelude and Fugue; Raff, symphony, "An das Vaterland," (first time in Boston); Wagner, Huldigungs March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

[64]

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Winch as Soloist.

Mendelssohn has, in his overtures, given two cold water tone pictures that seem almost companion pieces; at all events, the kinship between the "Fingal's Cave" overture and the "Melusina" will be apparent to musicians, although the former is by far the greater work. Nevertheless, the beauty of the themes and the delicacy of their treatment was so well brought out in the performance of Saturday night that "Die Schoene Melusina" never sounded better to my ears. Yet the success lay more in the poetic reading than in the ensemble attained. In this overture, as also in the third movement of the Schumann symphony, the attacks were sometimes a trifle rough and irregular. There is scarcely any doubt that we are gaining in one direction and losing in another; there is no longer the absolute precision that the orchestra once possessed, but there is so much of true poetic inspiration in the interpretations of Mr. Nikisch that even the most captious auditor is moved as never before. This was peculiarly the case with the "Cologne" symphony with which the concert closed. In this there was all the contemplative character of Schumann, and the second movement became almost a revelation. There is a wealth of exaltation in Schumann's expression of joy whether we seek it in such songs as "Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben," "Du Ring an meinem Finger," or "Im wunderschoenen monat Mai," in the fantasie for piano, or in the scherzo movements of his symphonies; with this composer a scherzo never becomes purely fun, or an expression of animal spirits. This point is well understood by Mr. Nikisch, and the sympathetic vein in which the Molto moderato was given calls for enthusiastic praise. The fourth movement also was an inspiration, for the broad imitation of organ effects was superbly effective. The chattering finale, picturing the people pouring out of the cathedral into the streets of Cologne in holiday attire and mood, was given with appropriate boldness, and is probably as near to the joking vein as Schumann ever came in any of his larger works. The symphony is a double delight to the thoughtful auditor, for it shows us the composer once more free from the pall of his melancholia, rejoicing in the happy Rhine life and approaching in mood to the blissful contentment which he experienced and which he wrote into his works (for Schumann, more than any other composer portrayed himself and his moods in his music) in the untroubled epoch of 1840.

One feels like expressing especial thanks to Mr. Nikisch for having placed such a work as Grieg's "Peer Gynt" on the programme, for it means that he is free from the exaggerated idea of the educational character of these concerts, which in past seasons has proved such a barrier to the performance of many a characteristic work, because "it was not up to the dignity of the symphonic concert." More of such works will not be amiss, for anything that has a distinctly national flavor is both dignified and educational. But the ready acceptance of an encore was, I think, unwise, for these concerts have hitherto been the one series sacred from the horny hands of the encore fiend. It would be better to continue to apply old Weller's apothegm about letter-writing to the concert programmes. The performance of this work left nothing to be desired, for the sturdy style, occasionally becoming even roughness, was entirely in place. What an adept in the use of sombre tints Grieg is! and he catches up the folks-tone better than any other of the Scandinavian composers. The breath of the early morning was in the first movement, the darkness of the long winter night in the picture of Death in the second. "Anitra's Dance," although not so truly Oriental as the dances which Rubinstein has given us in "Feramors," was yet very attractive. But the finale, a strange picture of gnomes and imps, was effective from beginning to end. It began boldly enough with a hideous tone on the horn, muted, awkward and lumbering progressions, reminding of Pierrot in Schumann's "Carnival," followed, only this was a spectral carnival, a saturnalia of sprites "paa Dovre-fjeld i Norge." All kinds of percussive effects were in the movement, and bass-drum and cymbals added the clangor to the spectral revelry, and the very abrupt end was peculiarly effective.

Men may come and men may go, but Mr. W. J. Winch will sing Dvorak's Gipsy songs forever, nor shall I enter any protest, so long as he sings them as well as he did at this concert. It is not too much to say that he never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. His voice has broadened considerably, yet has not lost its peculiarly sweet timbre, and Weber's romantic music as represented by the romance of Adolar in "Euryanthe" suited him to perfection. Mr. Nikisch himself was the accompanist, and although at times he made the piano a little too prominent, the elasticity and grace of the work was only what one would have expected from so thorough and enthusiastic a musician.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch gives the central position on his programme tonight to a work which will be new to the majority of his audience, but of which Mr. Neuendorff, ever alert and enterprising, gave Boston people their first hearing at one of last summer's promenade concerts. This is the suite composed by Grieg to accompany the "Peer Gynt" of Ibsen. This dramatic poem represents the wanderings and the fortunes of a romantic legendary hero, who is so devoted to the temptations of his fancy and his imagination, and so fond of exploits and experiences in foreign lands that he is sure to come to a bad end unless the faithful love of some good woman shall prevail and endure to save him. He does various rash and daring deeds he is in his time fascinated by Anitra, a Bedouin girl, is pestered by imps, falls in love with a king's daughter, romps with dairy-maids, and so on through many phases of adventure. Now and then he returns home, and it is during one of these visits that his adored mother, Aase, his confidant and counsellor, dies. He ultimately becomes n rich man, and in his elder years, reformed, purified and calmed, he marries the sweetheart of his youth, Solveig, whose tender and gracious character is so beautifully hinted in the "Sunshine" song. Grieg, profoundly attached to the folk-lore of his country, and often inspired by it, wrote a good deal of music to round out and accompany the stage presentation of this poem, from which the four pieces now presented are selected. The first is a quiet and grateful "Daybreak," delicately wrought out from a soft phrase first given by the wooden wind, and swelling up calmly under a pulsating atmosphere, as it were, of the strings. The second is the funeral march for the dead mother's burial, consisting of four strophes, as we might call them, each simple but weighted with the stress of pain and grief; this is for the muted strings alone, and a notable feature of its construction is the gradual increase of its woe to a full outburst, which then slowly sinks away until it is lost in a few long-drawn, and faint but heavy sobs. The third, the dance of Anitra, is also confined to the strings, which are now touched with pizzicato and again with the bow, giving out strains alternately piquant and languorous; a few bright jinglings of the triangle emphasize it. The fourth is a scene of imps tormenting Peer Gynt, written for full orchestra and often thoroughly quaint and humorous. It opens with a clanging call from the horn, and then the bassoon pops out with an odd little tune which makes the substance of the whole. This is rapidly worked up and pointed here and there with horn-calls or with snappy clashes of cymbals or sudden short rumbles of the drum. The playing of these movements yesterday afternoon was charmingly fresh and clean throughout, and nobody could have complained reasonably that in the second and third the strings did not show all their old finish and sentiment of style, while the oddities of the last were capitally indicated. An admirably reserved and steady rendering of Mendelssohn's poetic "Melusine" overture began the rehearsal yesterday, and Schumann's third, or "Rhenish" symphony, which we could not wait to hear, stood at the end of the programme. The soloist is Mr. W. J. Winch, who has chosen Adolar's romance (in Euryanthe) and a group of four Dvorak songs. He was in fine voice yesterday, and gave the romance with frank, clear and fine phrasings, and the songs with the taste and understanding which he, more than any other of our singers, brings to the music of their author. For Saturday next the programme will be: the Back-Abert prelude and fugue, Raff's "Fatherland" symphony new to Boston, and Wagner's "Huldizung's" march.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening the programme was: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina"; Weber, romance from "Euryanthe"; Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46; Dvorak, songs with piano; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish) op. 97.

The singing of the Weber "Romance," by Mr. Winch and of the Dvorak songs was one of the most praiseworthy and interesting features of the concert. Otherwise the programme was a somewhat mixed-up affair, of no especial merit. Mr. Winch was as usual the true artist, with the Weber aria, his conceptive ability, his musical intelligence, and refined feeling being all that could have been wished. The Dvorak songs were charmingly sung, and the able artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Mr. Nikisch at the piano as accompanist was so admirable that he rendered it simply inexplicable how he could have been responsible, as he really was, for the very inadaquate, clumsy and unsympathic accompaniment of the Weber selection. The Grieg "Suite" was enthusiastically received by the audience, but it is a very ill-made composition, the chief characteristic of which is its ear-tickling, vulgar and shallow tuneliness. That the audience applauded it so boisterously was by no means creditable to the prevailing taste. The overture, suite and symphony were all well played.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 25, 1890.

E. A. MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine."

The production of this work at the thirteenth Symphony Concert in Boston, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, is another evidence that our conductors are lending their ears to what will soon be a popular cry in behalf of native composers being given a hearing in the programmes of our orchestral societies. As we were not in Boston to hear this new work and desire to keep our readers au courant with the progress of the American movement, we quote the following critical essay from the able and independent pen of Philip Hale:

"Lancelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by Mr. MacDowell, is "program-music." Let us consider the music itself without any reference to the title or accompanying text. It is written by a man of imagination who is keenly sensitive to musical impressions, and when he comes to the expression of his thoughts, his style is fluent yet not verbose, polished without being finical, masculine and at the same time refined. With him strength does not run into brutality, sentiment is free from sickliness. And although, as is natural, he has been influenced by certain modern composers, notably Wagner, he is original both in his thoughts and in the manner of expressing them. (As to the intrinsic value of the motives in this particular work—that is another question.) He is then a musician by birth, fully equipped for what he undertakes, and his compositions therefore demand serious and respectful attention. And first let it be said that the instrumentation of this "poem" is admirable; it would have been even more striking, had not the horn-quartet last Saturday evening been excusably weak. It is clear, well contrasted, cunningly written for the various instruments. It is brilliant but never bombastic; striking, without the taint of bizarrerie. But however effectively instrumentation may force the composer's thoughts upon you, the question is, are the thoughts themselves of real and abiding value? Looking at the themes known as the Lancelot and Elaine 'motives," are they either of them to-day in the minds of the hearers of last week? Do they haunt during the day? Are they heard during the watches of the night? Let it be admitted that when heard they gave rise to pleasurable emotions; were either of the themes of striking, native beauty? And were they so treated throughout the composition that even if they were insignificant in themselves, they nevertheless, like the famous Phaéton motive of Saint Saëns, appeared to be of irresistible force? This work of Mr. MacDowell may be compared to a succession of rapidly dissolving views, where one view seems charming to the eye and he who sees would fain look closer; it remains but for a moment and fades away and is forgotten in another; until at last the looker-on is conscious merely of a vague and fleeting pleasure.

To put it bluntly, this "poem" is not firmly knit together; episode succeeds episode, and though motives are brought together, there is no central point, no climax, no general summing up. No deep impression is made, though the ear welcomes the instrumentation and the mind applauds the technical skill displayed by the composer.

But perhaps the apparent looseness of construction and episodic character of this composition is necessary from the very form of seemingly necessary lack of form of a "symphonic poem." A composer says to himself: "Come now, I shall put the story of Arthur and Guinevere into music; I shall express by means of music the finding of Arthur, the meeting of Lancelot and Guinevere, the scene at the tournament, the flight of the guilty Queen, the passing of the King." Necessarily then the composition must be merely a collection of sketches; and we are called upon to admire the faithfulness with which these scenes are presented. We are asked to recognize Arthur by a few measures of music which are fixed upon him wherever he goes, as a tag upon a parcel. Guinevere is distinguished by sundry other measures, and so each figure is introduced and afterward identified. But so far as the music itself is concerned, if it be without explanatory diagrams, to one person it may call to mind Hero and Leander, or Abelard and Heloise; or to another it may merely serve as a stimulant for thoughts which during the performance run zigzag; while to a third person the music serves as a mild narcotic. For how can a composer express by music that which is concrete? How can he express in music any ideas but musical ideas?

Extraordinary qualities have been attributed to music in all ages. Peter Lichtenthal at the beginning of this century claimed that the gout, sciatica, fever and ague, the plague, and even stupidity itself could be cured by music judiciously administered to the patient; and Baptista Porta gravely urged upon sufferers from dropsy the importance of listening to a flute-player, whose instrument had been made out of the hellebore plant. Is it any more absurd to say with a straight face that certain strains of music can portray the taking and consequent effect of a love potion, or that other strains represent light overcoming darkness? The composer may say to himself: "I may express despair by a peculiar use of the bassoons and kettle-drums;" but he may not say: "and when A, B and C hear this combination, they will at once be overcome by that feeling of despair." For people who hear the same music are affected in different ways, unless they follow blindly a printed programme, and even then they wander from the path in which they should walk. Listen to De Quincey: "Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure, according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so; it is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the senses, the form from the mind) that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another." Or, as Sir Thomas Browns puts it, "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer." But the modern school of sophist musicians believe in programme music and "symphonic poems;" and as in America we are sadly superficial in nearly all which pertains to Art, many of us believe implicitly in music as a vehicle of thought.

We learn by heart all the diagrams which accompany the later works of Wagner and court a thorough examination. When we hear new music we ask, "What does it mean?" and we add another "motiv" to our collection. To-day more than ever perhaps do we deserve the sneer of Henry Fothergill Chorley: "The Americans have shown a marvelous proclivity, in instrumental music, toward that which is occult and incomprehensible; and to judge from what reaches the old country in the shape of printed opinion, are already far in advance of us in comprehending that which seems full of darkness and doubt to our eyes. Whether in this they are not beginning at the end of music, may be reserved for others to decide."

To a man of the imagination of Mr. MacDowell the "symphonic poem" must appear peculiarly attractive, and perhaps they are right who claim that ultimately the "poem" will supplant the symphony. But after the sophists have had their day the musicians will come back and drive them out of the temple. Nor do I believe that Mr. MacDowell, as he goes on and forward in his musical career, will stand with metaphysicians and spend his strength upon "programme music."

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

A programme in which the semi-popular as well as the classical tastes of the audience were catered to, was presented Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. If the audience was a trifle cold in its welcome of the conductor after his second successful tour to New York and other cities, that coldness was speedily dispelled, and a more enthusiastic acknowledgment of the performance of the Suite by Grieg has not been heard since the celebrated three symphony night. This was the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Melusina;" Weber, romance from "Euryanthe;" Grieg, suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (first time at these concerts); Dvorak, songs with piano, (a) "I chant my lay," (b) "Hark, how my triangle," (c) "Songs my mother taught me," (d) "Cloudy hights of Taira daring Falcon haunteth;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), op. 97.

The numbers by the orchestra were all finely rendered. The Schumann symphony, despite the fact that it was a symphony and developed by the composer with all the richness of color characteristic of him, was listened to with almost as much plessure apparently as the Grieg suite. It was a marvel of clear technique, and of the excellent command of Mr. Nikisch over his musicians. His very beauty of rendering could not fail to command attention, and the murmur of approbation which followed each movement was so apparent as to show the unmeasured appreciation of the audience.

The Grieg suite had been heard at the summer promenades, but this would hardly be a test of its beauties, though the fact that it was selected for the promenades would indicate that it would find response in the musical instincts of the people who attended those concerts. Yet the contrasts in the numbers, the careful manner in which it was rendered, particularly by the divided strings, disclosed new beauties, and it was an evident pleasure even to the severely classical. There is no reason why, occasionally, such a selection is not appropriately made, and nothing more fitting could have been chosen. So enthusiastic was the audience that Mr. Nikisch consented to a repetition of the closing movement, something very exceptional in a Symphony concert, and the first time it has been allowed this season.

The soloist was William J. Winch, whose pleasant face and fine stage presence is probably better known than that of any musician in Boston. Mr. Winch's appearances in public have not been very frequent this season, and his greeting was all the more cordial. His delivery of the aria was scholarly and artistic, and there are few who can interpret the songs of Dvorak as can Mr. Winch. He was recalled several times after each number, and the accompaniments to his songs were played on the piano by Mr. Nikisch in a masterly manner, to the evident pleasure of the artist as well as the audience. The following is the programme for the next concert: Bach-Albert, Prelude and Fugue; Raff, symphony, "An das Vaterland," (first time in Boston); Wagner, Huldigungs March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890.

[64]

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Winch as Soloist.

Mendelssohn has, in his overtures, given two cold water tone pictures that seem almost companion pieces; at all events, the kinship between the "Fingal's Cave" overture and the "Melusina" will be apparent to musicians, although the former is by far the greater work. Nevertheless, the beauty of the themes and the delicacy of their treatment was so well brought out in the performance of Saturday night that "Die Schoene Melusina" never sounded better to my ears. Yet the success lay more in the poetic reading than in the ensemble attained. In this overture, as also in the third movement of the Schumann symphony, the attacks were sometimes a trifle rough and irregular. There is scarcely any doubt that we are gaining in one direction and losing in another; there is no longer the absolute precision that the orchestra once possessed, but there is so much of true poetic inspiration in the interpretations of Mr. Nikisch that even the most captious auditor is moved as never before. This was peculiarly the case with the "Cologne" symphony with which the concert closed. In this there was all the contemplative character of Schumann, and the second movement became almost a revelation. There is a wealth of exaltation in Schumann's expression of joy whether we seek it in such songs as "Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben," "Du Ring an meinem Finger," or "Im wunderschoenen monat Mai," in the fantasie for piano, or in the scherzo movements of his symphonies; with this composer a scherzo never becomes purely fun, or an expression of animal spirits. This point is well understood by Mr. Nikisch, and the sympathetic vein in which the Molto moderato was given calls for enthusiastic praise. The fourth movement also was an inspiration, for the broad imitation of organ effects was superbly effective. The chattering finale, picturing the people pouring out of the cathedral into the streets of Cologne in holiday attire and mood, was given with appropriate boldness, and is probably as near to the joking vein as Schumann ever came in any of his larger works. The symphony is a double delight to the thoughtful auditor, for it shows us the composer once more free from the pall of his melancholia, rejoicing in the happy Rhine life and approaching in mood to the blissful contentment which he experienced and which he wrote into his works (for Schumann, more than any other composer portrayed himself and his moods in his music) in the untroubled epoch of 1840.

One feels like expressing especial thanks to Mr. Nikisch for having placed such a work as Grieg's "Peer Gynt" on the programme, for it means that he is free from the exaggerated idea of the educational character of these concerts, which in past seasons has proved such a barrier to the performance of many a characteristic work, because "it was not up to the dignity of the symphonic concert." More of such works will not be amiss, for anything that has a distinctly national flavor is both dignified and educational. But the ready acceptance of an encore was, I think, unwise, for these concerts have hitherto been the one series sacred from the horny hands of the encore fiend. It would be better to continue to apply old Weller's apothegm about letter-writing to the concert programmes. The performance of this work left nothing to be desired, for the sturdy style, occasionally becoming even roughness, was entirely in place. What an adept in the use of sombre tints Grieg is! and he catches up the folks-tone better than any other of the Scandinavian composers. The breath of the early morning was in the first movement, the darkness of the long winter night in the picture of Death in the second. "Anitra's Dance," although not so truly Oriental as the dances which Rubinstein has given us in "Feramors," was yet very attractive. But the finale, a strange picture of gnomes and imps, was effective from beginning to end. It began boldly enough with a hideous tone on the horn, muted, awkward and lumbering progressions, reminding of Pierrot in Schumann's "Carnival," followed, only this was a spectral carnival, a saturnalia of sprites "paa Dovre-fjeld i Norge." All kinds of percussive effects were in the movement, and bass-drum and cymbals added the clangor to the spectral revelry, and the very abrupt end was peculiarly effective.

Men may come and men may go, but Mr. W. J. Winch will sing Dvorak's Gypsy songs forever, nor shall I enter any protest, so long as he sings them as well as he did at this concert. It is not too much to say that he never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. His voice has broadened considerably, yet has not lost its peculiarly sweet timbre, and Weber's romantic music as represented by the romance of Adolar in "Euryanthe" suited him to perfection. Mr. Nikisch himself was the accompanist, and although at times he made the piano a little too prominent, the elasticity and grace of the work was only what one would have expected from so thorough and enthusiastic a musician.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[65]

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890

MUSIC.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch has returned from the second trip along the Atlantic coast, crowned with new honors, and with the orchestra in a better condition than ever. The disastrous effect of la grippe seemed to have wholly passed away, as the following programme was most superbly played on Saturday evening:

Overture—"Melusina".....Mendelssohn
Romance—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Suite—"Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
(First time at these concerts.)
Songs with piano—a. "I Chant My Lay."
b. "Hark How My Triangle." c. "Songs My Mother Taught Me." d. "Cloudy Heights of Tatra Daring Falcon Haunteth".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in E flat (Rhenish), op. 97.....Schumann

The Melusina overture is by no means one of Mendelssohn's greater works, but Mr. Nikisch gave it a smooth, artistic and interesting reading. Mr. Winch has perhaps never sung better in his life: his rendering of both the romance and the songs was little short of perfect. It is a liberal education in the evasive art of musical phrasing to hear such really beautiful singing. The fact that Mr. Winch can sing so well makes it all the more regrettable that one should so seldom hear him, and also that when he does sing he should so persistently confine himself to these same gypsy songs. It is probably true that no one—certainly in this country—can sing them so well as he does: but that is no reason that he should sing them over and over again. Mr. Winch was warmly applauded, and small wonder, for there can hardly have been a dissenting voice as to the unusual pleasure which he gave. Mr. Nikisch appeared at this concert in a new light, and won fresh laurels. He accompanied the Dvorak songs, and his work was a perfect revelation in the immensely difficult art of accompaniment. He has a fine piano technique, and of course his sympathetic musical nature is a great help to the singer. Certain it is that the Symphony audience has seldom if ever had opportunity to listen to such artistic and interesting accompaniments. The Grieg suite was played here last summer at the popular concerts, and it must be confessed that it belongs rather to that class of musical entertainment than to the more elevated atmosphere of the Symphony concerts. It is skilfully scored, in fact at times both original and brilliant effects are obtained from the orchestra, but its subject matter is decidedly vulgar and trivial. This is especially true of the last movements, which bears the title, "The Imps Are Chasing Peer Gynt." This movement is a specimen of the popular style of theatrical entr'acte music, and yet it pleased the public and mirabile dictu! Mr. Nikisch gave way and repeated it! This is certainly an unfortunate precedent, and the fact that so vulgar a "tune" should have been so boisterously redemanded gives disastrous indications as to the real taste of our much lauded Symphony audience. The Rhenish symphony was most beautifully played. Mr. Nikisch as a Schumann interpreter is almost perfect. The beautiful first movement, the noble and elevated fourth (religioso) and the brilliantly final vivace were interpreted, read and played in such a manner that any criticism would be absurdly captious. The orchestra also seemed imbued with great fervor, and the whole symphony was grandly performed.

These concerts themselves and the methods and ideas of our new conductor have given rise to a great deal of criticism, some of which has been bitter and acrimonious. Not only the critics and musicians but pretty well the whole public has taken part in the discussion on one side or the other, irrespective of whether they knew anything about music or not. The last number of the Musikalische Rundschau, published in Vienna, contains a fine criticism of the fourth Philharmonic concert in that city. It is from the pen of the distinguished composer and critic, Richard von Perger, and its closing paragraphs are offered here in literal translation as being particularly applicable to the present situation in Boston:

"As has often been said, conductors and musicians are not—God be praised—machines, but artists with heads, hearts and nerves. Such an evident ennui and lack of attention as the audience showed at the last Philharmonic is certain to have a discouraging and relaxing effect upon even the most enthusiastic players. A public which is not inflamed to the point of stormy applause upon hearing the Egmont overture, but on the contrary enwraps itself in 'noble' silence, does not, in truth, deserve to hear such splendid tone-poems. As a matter of fact, it is becoming the 'fashion' with most people not to allow themselves to be led to enthusiasm and applause. This is because only very few people go to the concerts to really enjoy the artistic performances; on the contrary, they go in order to have 'been there' and to be able to chatter about it afterwards. Every school girl who has hardly learned the difference between major and minor sits in her reserved seat feeling like a little Hanslick [the most celebrated Viennese—in fact European—critic] and criticises in a loud voice not only after but even during the performances. This disagreeable but ever-increasing habit which every sensible person is bound to roundly condemn arises from the ridiculous impression that artists exist for the public. This is simply not true! The artist exists for art alone, and it is a sad thing that he is not able to live only in the service of the Muses without being dependent for the material necessities of existence upon the protection of some stupid and conceited 'music lover.' As a matter of fact, to be present as witness at a fine artistic performance is an honor, which is appreciated by every truly cultured person who has a real understanding for art."

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON JANUARY 26, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, William J. Winch.

Director Nikisch as Accompanist—"Nadjy," "Erminie" and "Paola" as Local Attractions—Events of the Week—The Stetson "Gondoliers"—Andres and Doerner's Boston Debut.

The appearance of Mr. William J. Winch, tenor, as soloist at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, made a very pleasing event of the season, and his personal popularity with Boston audiences was shown most prominently in the welcome given him upon his entrance. He chose as his numbers on the programme the "Romance" from Weber's "Euryanthe," and the four songs by Dvorak, (a) "I Chant My Lay," (b) "Hark, How My Triangle," (c) "Songs My Mother Taught Me," (d) "Cloudy Heights of Tatra Daring Falcon Haunteth." His singing was most satisfying in each of his appearances, and the perfection of his mastery of the vocal art was shown in all his work. In the "Romance" his phrasing and delivery of the tuneful measures fairly disarmed criticism, and his voice was used with such faultless taste that he easily commanded the attention of his audience, as well as a grand recognition of his abilities as a singer when the selection was ended. It would be difficult to name a singer better qualified to give a correct interpretation of the group of songs by Dvorak than Mr. Winch. These songs go for little, save when sung by one fully in sympathy with their peculiar characteristics and equal to the many difficulties they present. Mr. Winch sung all the songs delightfully, giving especial pleasure, however, in the "Songs My Mother Taught Me," which was a gem of vocal art as given by this most talented artist. The difficult accompaniments to the Dvorak songs were played with admirable taste by Conductor Nikisch, who complimented the singer by making his debut, as an accompanist, in these concerts, on this occasion, and the audience gracefully recognized his good work at the piano. The "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, made a comparative novelty, having its first completely satisfactory performance at this concert. Those who heard it played at the summer "Pops" under the disadvantages incidental to the summer concerts had all their anticipations concerning its rehearing fully realized, and Conductor Nikisch has made no more popular success than in its performance. For the first time this season the string band repeated its work in earlier years under Mr. Gericke, and the remarkable beauty of the work done by this division of the orchestra in the suite charmed all who heard the performance. It is a most fascinating composition, and the rapt attention given to its movements proved how much these audiences enjoy the lighter music which is so seldom given a place in these programmes. The last movement, descriptive of the chasing of "Peer Gynt," created such a sensation that its repetition was necessary to quell the applause, and this departure from all precedents in these concerts was gracefully conceded by Mr. Nikisch. A fine interpretation of the "Melusina" overture, by Mendelssohn, began the programme, and an interesting performance of the "Rhenish" symphony, by Schumann, ended it. Next Saturday the programme will be: "Prelude and Fugue," Bach-Albert; symphony, "An Das Vaterland," Raff (for the first time here), and the "Huldigung's March," by Wagner.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 26, 1890.

AT THE "SYMPHONY."

Nikisch Returns with a Brilliant and Much-Applauded Programme to Music Hall.

When the proverbial coldness of a "public rehearsal audience is so far melted that a programme number is re-demanded, it is small cause for wonder that Mr. Nikisch should for once forego his rule, and consent to a repetition. The selection thus uniquely honored at last week's concert was the closing movement in Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite. This grotesque but effective setting forth of the way in which the imps of the mountain follow and torment the hero of the Norwegian legend, was certainly admirably done. But the entire suite could hardly have found a more appreciative interpretation. Nikisch's absolute command over his orchestral resources was most impressively shown. The funeral march was a marvel in the management of the pianissimo effects—the "dying away" of the theme could not have been given more delicately. More and more the musicians seem to be perfectly swayed by the leader, as if the orchestra were but one grand instrument, instantly responsive to the master's touch and thought.

Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture opened the programme, and Schumann's noble Third symphony in E flat was the closing offering. Usually Nikisch is wholly admirable in his readings of Schumann. In all the movements, except the "religioso," yesterday's interpretation was poetic and appreciative to a degree. But in presenting the composer's impressions of the grand ceremonial of the church, the leader seemed to be lacking in sympathy for the composer's thought. The interpretation here was undeniably a disappointment, for the orchestra, as well as the conductor did not seem to enter fully into the spirit and meaning of this great, tone picture of the Rhenish symphony.

W. J. Winch, the tenor, sang with taste, expression and fervor a group of songs by Dvorak. He was particularly happy in setting forth the tender sadness of the "Songs My Mother Taught Me," and the gypsy song, "Tatra's Heights." Mr. Nikisch accompanied the singer admirably upon the piano.

For this week's programme, three selections only are assigned—an arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, Wagner's "Homage" march and Raff's symphony, "Our Fatherland," which will be heard for the first time by a Boston audience.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, which Mr. Nikisch read with fine poetic feeling, and bringing out clearly many strong points that are generally neglected. Both in conception and execution the performance was exceedingly beautiful. Four extracts from Grieg's music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" were heard on this occasion for the first time at these concerts; though they had been heard at some of the summer concerts in Music Hall. The selections were called respectively "Daylight," "The Death of Aase," "Antira's Dance," and "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains." They are all pretty, but very slight in construction; in fact they are miserly in idea, but lavish in harmony and instrumentation. Each consists of about eight bars worked over and over again, and repeated in various keys until further repetition would become almost ludicrous. They are graceful, however, and calculated to please the popular taste. The dance is very quaint and dainty, with a novel and curious effect of a pizzicato crescendo. The closing number works the eight bars of which it consists to very tatters, and winds up with several cymbal clashes and orchestral noise, over which the audience went wild, applauding the clap-trap effect with such persistent enthusiasm that Mr. Nikisch found a repetition inevitable, and so granted the first encore of the season. It was a mournful comment on the taste of a symphony concert audience. The whole ended with a magnificent rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; in fact the clearest, most satisfying and most masterly interpretation the work has ever received here. From beginning to end it was perfect and brought out more beauties in the symphony and more coherency than had ever been brought out in any previous performance of it that we have listened to in Music Hall. It was one of Mr. Nikisch's triumphs. The soloist was Mr. W. J. Winch, who sang Adolar's lovely romance from Weber's "Euryanthe," with great beauty of expression, rising in the last stanza to impressive power. Later he sang the group of songs by Dvorak, which he has made popular here, and which he interprets with such admirable taste and with so keen a sympathy with their character. He was accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch with exquisite skill, both in point of style and technique. Mr Winch was ardently applauded after each effort of the evening, and recalled twice after the aria and the group of songs. The programme for the next concert is Prelude and Fugue, Bach-Abert; "An das Vaterland," symphony by Raff, first time in Boston, and Wagner's "Huldigungs March." There will be no soloist.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Die schöne Melusine."
Weber: Romance from "Euryanthe."
Grieg: Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.
Dvorák: Songs with pianoforte—
a. "I chant my lay."
b. "Hark, how my triangle."
c. "Songs my mother taught me."
d. "Cloudy heights of Tatra."
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Rhenish"), op. 97.

Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

It was an unalloyed pleasure to hear that undulating mermaid figure in the "Melusine" overture, which Wagner has transferred to his Rhine-Daughters in the "Nibelungen," played at a moderate tempo, and without any accent on the beat; years ago this figure used to be so played as to suggest jerking a fish out of the water. The whole overture was beautifully played, saving an occasional want of exactness in the ensemble. Grieg's suite, illustrative of passages in Henrik Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," is one of the most enjoyable things we have yet heard from the composer. Here Grieg has been true to his own personal bent, and to the musical spirit of his country, and, at the same time musically charming. You find nothing of that "timid Scandinavianism" in this suite, with which both Grieg and Svendsen once reproached Gade; the music is as boldly Northern in spirit as need be; and yet it is musical, too, and you do not have to have Norwegian blood in your veins to understand it. Only in the last movement, where the imps chase Peer Gynt about, does the composer take to absolute tone-painting, and substitute the characteristically ugly for the musically beautiful. Yet this very movement shows more genius than the other three put together; there is in it a frank, unhesitating picturesqueness, an intensity of life and a well-sustained vivacity of humor that carry all before them. Call it a mere musical jeu d'esprit, if you will; it is an admirably brilliant one. It scored the second encore that has been given in these concerts—the first was won by the Scherzo in Mr. Chadwick's second symphony—and we are heartily glad that Mr. Nikisch consented to the repetition, for it proved convincingly what utterly foolish things encores are. It sounded almost weak the second time. The performance of the whole suite was a marvel of perfection. Schumann's incomparable E-flat symphony was also grandly played. The first movement was given with a breadth, vigor of accent, and an appropriate wealth of shading that showed it in all its glory; for once, too, the second movement was taken slow enough to let the characteristic, rather loutish, peasant swing of the rhythm produce its full effect, and to prevent the orchestration from seeming over-loaded. The Cathedral scene was given with due impressive solemnity, albeit it suffered at moments from a slight wavering in the orchestra. Was not the tempo just a thought too slow? But, upon the whole, the performance was masterly.

Mr. Winch sang Adolar's beautiful "Unter blüh'nden Mandelbäumen" capitally; the song has hardly that climax in it that one looks for in a concert piece; its effect in the opera comes from the very fact that it is a purely lyrical movement, a lyrical oasis, so to speak, in the dramatic action. But sung as Mr. Winch sang it, it could not fail to make an impression. Mr. Winch was fairly at his very best in the Dvorák songs; indeed, in the third one he rose to an ideal height of beauty and tender, soulful expressiveness. The songs were accompanied by Mr. Nikisch himself, and that too to perfection. Let us all hope that our conductor's place at the pianoforte will be a permanent one.

The next programme is: Bach, Abert, prelude and fugue in G minor; Raff, symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland;" Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

New York cannot be accused of any narrow provincial jealousy in musical matters. The Sun, in its review of the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, referred to Mr. Nikisch's band as "far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic." It goes on, with more particularity, to say that in the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish; but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest effort. The Sun is not the highest musical authority in the city, but I think its opinion coincides with that of the majority of the audience that attended the last concert. It was about as near the perfection of orchestral playing as one can hope to hear.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1890.

UNION HALL: THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third in their series of concerts in Union Hall on Monday, when the following programme, all from Beethoven, was presented:

Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; pianoforte trio in D, op. 60, No. 1; quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

Quartet: Mr. Franz Kneisel, first violin; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Louis Svécenski, viola; Mr. Anton Hekking, violoncello. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist.

This capital programme in such capable hands drew a large and enthusiastic audience to the new quarters adopted by the quartet for its concerts.

The C major quartet is a noble composition, representing Beethoven himself in fuller and freer style than his earliest writing when the influences that he had felt most strongly were not yet thoroughly assimilated. Hammerton's simile of the chemical compound in character development belongs no less to music than to other arts. The greatest artist feels all influences. A mirror of reflection alone has nothing of the individual in it, but the great soul that "takes its own where it finds it," owns it every whit. The process of the development of a musician of Beethoven's calibre is wonderfully interesting, and it is delightful to have Mr. Kneisel and his brothers interpret the artist's work at its different stages.

The quartet in C minor shows how strongly, how beautifully too, Beethoven felt Mozart's influence. Here and there, as in the first movement, there is more of Mozart than of Beethoven, but by-and-by in later work the assimilation is perfected, the master's own development has advanced, and there is no longer any detaching bits that may be said to point to one more than another of those whose work had led up to himself. It is all Beethoven, but there could have been none a century even, earlier.

Of the movements of the C-minor quartet, perhaps the most perfect one is the andante scherzando. Its simplicity and poetic beauty are adorable. The playing of the whole quartet, delightful from beginning to end, was most artistic. Singly the instruments were true to themselves and to the players, and throughout there was unity of design, and a well-balanced and polished performance.

The trio, written two years after the C-major quartet, and in the same year with the pastoral symphony, shows much of the sunny charm of that joyous composition in the allegro and presto movements. These the largo separates with a gentle sadness that is not melancholy, an exquisite pathos, and the tenderest feeling. Mr. Baermann, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. H. W. Hekking played the work with much beauty of tone, and in perfect keeping with the spirit of the composer.

The next concert in the series will take place on Feb. 24.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1890.

Third Kneisel Quartet Concert in Union Hall—Notes.

Unavoidable postponements of the third concert seemed to have whetted the appetite of the cultivated clientele of the Kneisel Quartet; not only a large and deeply interested audience, but a fine programme and unusually beautiful playing were features of its consummation last night in Union Hall. Only Beethoven's compositions were performed: Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; Piano Trio in D, op. 70; Quartet in C, op. 59, No. 3. Union Hall proved fairly satisfying for chamber music. Our brief word about the playing is one of praise. To these purely quartet works of Beethoven's first and second manner, Mr. Kneisel and his companions paid worthy tribute. In point of sentiment the playing was beyond reproach, while technically the quartet presented unquestioned evidence of its pre-eminent ability. It would be a pleasure to remark upon several notable points in the reading and the execution, did space permit; we do not think the quartet ever came to a concert better prepared. The ensemble is well nigh perfect, yet were Mr. Hekking to repress his tone less, the resulting gain in force would be helpful; in the fugato of the last movement of the C major quartet the enunciation of the subject by the 'cello, was weak in comparison with the preceding voices. Never in the concerts of the quartet has the work of the second violin and viola been as fine as last night. Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist in the trio. Recovered from his illness, Mr. Baermann seems to have moderated his tendency to disregard the proper balance of the ensemble, for the performance of the trio was excellent in point of unity, and it is unnecessary to say genial and musical in spirit.

Clipping No.

[65]

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1890

MUSIC.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch has returned from the second trip along the Atlantic coast, crowned with new honors, and with the orchestra in a better condition than ever. The disastrous effect of la grippe seemed to have wholly passed away, as the following programme was most superbly played on Saturday evening:

Overture—"Melusina".....Mendelssohn
Romance—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Suite—"Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
(First time at these concerts.)
Songs with piano—a. "I Chant My Lay." b. "Hark How My Triangle," c. "Songs My Mother Taught Me," d. "Cloudy Heights of Tatra Daring Falcon Haunteth".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in E flat (Rhenish), op. 97.....Schumann

The Melusina overture is by no means one of Mendelssohn's greater works, but Mr. Nikisch gave it a smooth, artistic and interesting reading. Mr. Winch has perhaps never sung better in his life: his rendering of both the romance and the songs was little short of perfect. It is a liberal education in the evasive art of musical phrasing to hear such really beautiful singing. The fact that Mr. Winch can sing so well makes it all the more regrettable that one should so seldom hear him, and also that when he does sing he should so persistently confine himself to these same gypsy songs. It is probably true that no one—certainly in this country—can sing them so well as he does: but that is no reason that he should sing them over and over again. Mr. Winch was warmly applauded, and small wonder, for there can hardly have been a dissenting voice as to the unusual pleasure which he gave. Mr. Nikisch appeared at this concert in a new light, and won fresh laurels. He accompanied the Dvorak songs, and his work was a perfect revelation in the immensely difficult art of accompaniment. He has a fine piano technique, and of course his sympathetic musical nature is a great help to the singer. Certain it is that the Symphony audience has seldom if ever had opportunity to listen to such artistic and interesting accompaniments. The Grieg suite was played here last summer at the popular concerts, and it must be confessed that it belongs rather to that class of musical entertainment than to the more elevated atmosphere of the Symphony concerts. It is skilfully scored, in fact at times both original and brilliant effects are obtained from the orchestra, but its subject matter is decidedly vulgar and trivial. This is especially true of the last movements, which bears the title, "The Imps Are Chasing Peer Gynt." This movement is a specimen of the popular style of theatrical entr'acte music, and yet it pleased the public and mirabile dictu! Mr. Nikisch gave way and repeated it! This is certainly an unfortunate precedent, and the fact that so vulgar a "tune" should have been so boisterously redemanded gives disastrous indications as to the real taste of our much lauded Symphony audience. The Rhenish symphony was most beautifully played. Mr. Nikisch as a Schumann interpreter is almost perfect. The beautiful first movement, the noble and elevated fourth (religioso) and the brilliantly final vivace were interpreted, read and played in such a manner that any criticism would be absurdly captious. The orchestra also seemed imbued with great fervor, and the whole symphony was grandly performed.

These concerts themselves and the methods and ideas of our new conductor have given rise to a great deal of criticism, some of which has been bitter and acrimonious. Not only the critics and musicians but pretty well the whole public has taken part in the discussion on one side or the other, irrespective of whether they knew anything about music or not. The last number of the Musikalische Rundschau, published in Vienna, contains a fine criticism of the fourth Philharmonic concert in that city. It is from the pen of the distinguished composer and critic, Richard von Perger, and its closing paragraphs are offered here in literal translation as being particularly applicable to the present situation in Boston:

"As has often been said, conductors and musicians are not—God be praised—machines, but artists with heads, hearts and nerves. Such an evident ennui and lack of attention as the audience showed at the last Philharmonic is certain to have a discouraging and relaxing effect upon even the most enthusiastic players. A public which is not inflamed to the point of stormy applause upon hearing the Egmont overture, but on the contrary enwraps itself in 'noble' silence, does not, in truth, deserve to hear such splendid tone-poems. As a matter of fact, it is becoming the 'fashion' with most people not to allow themselves to be led to enthusiasm and applause. This is because only very few people go to the concerts to really enjoy the artistic performances; on the contrary, they go in order to have 'been there' and to be able to chatter about it afterwards. Every school girl who has hardly learned the difference between major and minor sits in her reserved seat feeling like a little Hanslick (the most celebrated Viennese—in fact European—critic) and criticises in a loud voice not only after but even during the performances. This disagreeable but ever-increasing habit which every sensible person is bound to roundly condemn arises from the ridiculous impression that artists exist for the public. This is simply not true! The artist exists for art alone, and it is a sad thing that he is not able to live only in the service of the Muses without being dependent for the material necessities of existence upon the protection of some stupid and conceited 'music lover.' As a matter of fact, to be present as witness at a fine artistic performance is an honor, which is appreciated by every truly cultured person who has a real understanding for art."

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON JANUARY 26, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, William J. Winch.

Director Nikisch as Accompanist—"Nadjy," "Erminie" and "Paola" as Local Attractions—Events of the Week—The Stetson "Gondoliers"—Andres and Doerner's Boston Debut.

The appearance of Mr. William J. Winch, tenor, as soloist at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, made a very pleasing event of the season, and his personal popularity with Boston audiences was shown most prominently in the welcome given him upon his entrance. He chose as his numbers on the programme the "Romance" from Weber's "Euryanthe," and the four songs by Dvorak, (a) "I Chant My Lay," (b) "Hark, How My Triangle," (c) "Songs My Mother Taught Me," (d) "Cloudy Heights of Tatra Daring Falcon Haunteth." His singing was most satisfying in each of his appearances, and the perfection of his mastery of the vocal art was shown in all his work. In the "Romance" his phrasing and delivery of the tuneful measures fairly disarmed criticism, and his voice was used with such faultless taste that he easily commanded the attention of his audience, as well as a grand recognition of his abilities as a singer when the selection was ended. It would be difficult to name a singer better qualified to give a correct interpretation of the group of songs by Dvorak than Mr. Winch. These songs go for little, save when sung by one fully in sympathy with their peculiar characteristics and equal to the many difficulties they present. Mr. Winch sung all the songs delightfully, giving especial pleasure, however, in the "Songs My Mother Taught Me," which was a gem of vocal art as given by this most talented artist. The difficult accompaniments to the Dvorak songs were played with admirable taste by Conductor Nikisch, who complimented the singer by making his debut, as an accompanist, in these concerts, on this occasion, and the audience gracefully recognized his good work at the piano. The "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, made a comparative novelty, having its first completely satisfactory performance at this concert. Those who heard it played at the summer "Pops" under the disadvantages incidental to the summer concerts had all their anticipations concerning its rehearing fully realized, and Conductor Nikisch has made no more popular success than in its performance. For the first time this season the string band repeated its work in earlier years under Mr. Gericke, and the remarkable beauty of the work done by this division of the orchestra in the suite charmed all who heard the performance. It is a most fascinating composition, and the rapt attention given to its movements proved how much these audiences enjoy the lighter music which is so seldom given a place in these programmes. The last movement, descriptive of the chasing of "Peer Gynt," created such a sensation that its repetition was necessary to quell the applause, and this departure from all precedents in these concerts was gracefully conceded by Mr. Nikisch. A fine interpretation of the "Melusina" overture, by Mendelssohn, began the programme, and an interesting performance of the "Rhenish" symphony, by Schumann, ended it. Next Saturday the programme will be: "Prelude and Fugue," Bach-Albert; symphony, "An Das Vaterland," Raff (for the first time here), and the "Huldigung's March," by Wagner.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 26, 1890.

AT THE "SYMPHONY."

Nikisch Returns with a Brilliant and Much-Applauded Programme to Music Hall.

When the proverbipl coldness of a "public rehearsal audience is so far melted that a programme number is re-demanded, it is small cause for wonder that Mr. Nikisch should for once forego his rule, and consent to a repetition. The selection thus uniquely honored at last week's concert was the closing movement in Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite. This grotesque but effective setting forth of the way in which the imps of the mountain follow and torment the hero of the Norwegian legend, was certainly admirably done. But the entire suite could hardly have found a more appreciative interpretation. Nikisch's absolute command over his orchestral resources was most impressively shown. The funeral march was a marvel in the management of the pianissimo effects—the "dying away" of the theme could not have been given more delicately. More and more the musicians seem to be perfectly swayed by the leader, as if the orchestra were but one grand instrument, instantly responsive to the master's touch and thought.

Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture opened the programme, and Schumann's noble Third symphony in E flat was the closing offering. Usually Nikisch is wholly admirable in his readings of Schumann. In all the movements, except the "religioso," yesterday's interpretation was poetic and appreciative to a degree. But in presenting the composer's impressions of the grand ceremonial of the church, the leader seemed to be lacking in sympathy for the composer's thought. The interpretation here was undeniably a disappointment, for the orchestra, as well as the conductor did not seem to enter fully into the spirit and meaning of this great, tone picture of the Rhenish symphony.

W. J. Winch, the tenor, sang with taste, expression and fervor a group of songs by Dvorak. He was particularly happy in setting forth the tender sadness of the "Songs My Mother Taught Me," and the gypsy song, "Tatra's Heights." Mr. Nikisch accompanied the singer admirably upon the piano.

For this week's programme, three selections only are assigned—an arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, Wagner's "Homage" march and Raff's symphony, "Our Fatherland," which will be heard for the first time by a Boston audience.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, which Mr. Nikisch read with fine poetic feeling, and bringing out clearly many strong points that are generally neglected. Both in conception and execution the performance was exceedingly beautiful. Four extracts from Grieg's music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" were heard on this occasion for the first time at these concerts; though they had been heard at some of the summer concerts in Music Hall. The selections were called respectively "Daylight," "The Death of Aase," "Antira's Dance," and "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains." They are all pretty, but very slight in construction; in fact they are miserly in idea, but lavish in harmony and instrumentation. Each consists of about eight bars worked over and over again, and repeated in various keys until further repetition would become almost ludicrous. They are graceful, however, and calculated to please the popular taste. The dance is very quaint and dainty, with a novel and curious effect of a pizzicato crescendo. The closing number works the eight bars of which it consists to very tatters, and winds up with several cymbal clashes and orchestral noise, over which the audience went wild, applauding the clap trap effect with such persistent enthusiasm that Mr. Nikisch found a repetition inevitable, and so granted the first encore of the season. It was a mournful comment on the taste of a symphony concert audience. The whole ended with a magnificent rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony; in fact the clearest, most satisfying and most masterly interpretation the work has ever received here. From beginning to end it was perfect and brought out more beauties in the symphony and more coherency than had ever been brought out in any previous performance of it that we have listened to in Music Hall. It was one of Mr. Nikisch's triumphs. The soloist was Mr. W. J. Winch, who sang Adolar's lovely romance from Weber's "Euryanthe," with great beauty of expression, rising in the last stanza to impressive power. Later he sang the group of songs by Dvorak, which he has made popular here, and which he interprets with such admirable taste and with so keen a sympathy with their character. He was accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch with exquisite skill, both in point of style and technique. Mr Winch was ardently applauded after each effort of the evening, and recalled twice after the aria and the group of songs. The programme for the next concert is Prelude and Fugue, Bach-Abert; "An das Vaterland," symphony by Raff, first time in Boston, and Wagner's "Huldigungs March." There will be no soloist.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Die schöne Melusine."
Weber: Romance from "Euryanthe."
Grieg: Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.
Dvorák; Songs with pianoforte—
a. "I chant my lay."
b. "Hark, how my triangle."
c. "Songs my mother taught me."
d. "Cloudy heights of Tatra."
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Rhenish"), op. 97.
Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

It was an unalloyed pleasure to hear that undulating mermaid figure in the "Melusine" overture, which Wagner has transferred to his Rhine-Daughters in the "Nibelungen," played at a moderate tempo, and without any accent on the beat; years ago this figure used to be so played as to suggest jerking a fish out of the water. The whole overture was beautifully played, saving an occasional want of exactness in the ensemble. Grieg's suite, illustrative of passages in Henrik Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," is one of the most enjoyable things we have yet heard from the composer. Here Grieg has been true to his own personal bent, and to the musical spirit of his country, and, at the same time musically charming. You find nothing of that "timid Scandinavianism" in this suite, with which both Grieg and Svendsen once reproached Gade; the music is as boldly Northern in spirit as need be; and yet it is musical, too, and you do not have to have Norwegian blood in your veins to understand it. Only in the last movement, where the imps chase Peer Gynt about, does the composer take to absolute tone-painting, and substitute the characteristically ugly for the musically beautiful. Yet this very movement shows more genius than the other three put together; there is in it a frank, unhesitating picturesqueness, an intensity of life and a well-sustained vivacity of humor that carry all before them. Call it a mere musical jeu d'esprit, if you will; it is an admirably brilliant one. It scored the second encore that has been given in these concerts—the first was won by the Scherzo in Mr. Chadwick's second symphony—and we are heartily glad that Mr. Nikisch consented to the repetition, for it proved convincingly what utterly foolish things encores are. It sounded almost weak the second time. The performance of the whole suite was a marvel of perfection. Schumann's incomparable E-flat symphony was also grandly played. The first movement was given with a breadth, vigor of accent, and an appropriate wealth of shading that showed it in all its glory; for once, too, the second movement was taken slow enough to let the characteristic, rather loutish, peasant swing of the rhythm produce its full effect, and to prevent the orchestration from seeming over-loaded. The Cathedral scene was given with due impressive solemnity, albeit it suffered at moments from a slight wavering in the orchestra. Was not the tempo just a thought too slow? But, upon the whole, the performance was masterly.

Mr. Winch sang Adolar's beautiful "Unter blüh'nden Mandelbäumen" capitally; the song has hardly that climax in it that one looks for in a concert piece; its effect in the opera comes from the very fact that it is a purely lyrical movement, a lyrical oasis, so to speak, in the dramatic action. But sung as Mr. Winch sang it, it could not fail to make an impression. Mr. Winch was fairly at his very best in the Dvorák songs; indeed, in the third one he rose to an ideal height of beauty and tender, soulful expressiveness. The songs were accompanied by Mr. Nikisch himself, and that too to perfection. Let us all hope that our conductor's place at the pianoforte will be a permanent one.

The next programme is: Bach, Abert, prelude and fugue in G minor; Raff, symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland;" Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1890.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

New York cannot be accused of any narrow provincial jealousy in musical matters. The Sun, in its review of the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, referred to Mr. Nikisch's band as "far and away the most admirably balanced and best disciplined organization now in existence on this side of the Atlantic." It goes on, with more particularity, to say that in the interpretation of dramatic music, perhaps, more vivid effects have now and then been attained at the expense, often, of symmetry and finish; but as regards volume and richness of tone, delicacy of execution and absolute precision, no work that has been done for years by other orchestras can be cited as having even approached its happiest effort. The Sun is not the highest musical authority in the city, but I think its opinion coincides with that of the majority of the audience that attended the last concert. It was about as near the perfection of orchestral playing as one can hope to hear.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1890.

UNION HALL: THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third in their series of concerts in Union Hall on Monday, when the following programme, all from Beethoven, was presented:

Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; pianoforte trio in D, op. 60, No. 1; quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

Quartet: Mr. Franz Kneisel, first violin; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Louis Svécenski, viola; Mr. Anton Hekking, violoncello. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist.

This capital programme in such capable hands drew a large and enthusiastic audience to the new quarters adopted by the quartet for its concerts.

The C major quartet is a noble composition, representing Beethoven himself in fuller and freer style than his earliest writing when the influences that he had felt most strongly were not yet thoroughly assimilated. Hammerton's simile of the chemical compound in character development belongs no less to music than to other arts. The greatest artist feels all influences. A mirror of reflection alone has nothing of the individual in it, but the great soul that "takes its own where it finds it," owns it every whit. The process of the development of a musician of Beethoven's calibre is wonderfully interesting, and it is delightful to have Mr. Kneisel and his brothers interpret the artist's work at its different stages.

The quartet in C minor shows how strongly, how beautifully too, Beethoven felt Mozart's influence. Here and there, as in the first movement, there is more of Mozart than of Beethoven, but by-and-by in later work the assimilation is perfected, the master's own development has advanced, and there is no longer any detaching bits that may be said to point to one more than another of those whose work had led up to himself. It is all Beethoven, but there could have been none a century even, earlier.

Of the movements of the C-minor quartet, perhaps the most perfect one is the andante scherzando. Its simplicity and poetic beauty are adorable. The playing of the whole quartet, delightful from beginning to end, was most artistic. Singly the instruments were true to themselves and to the players, and throughout there was unity of design, and a well-balanced and polished performance.

The trio, written two years after the C-major quartet, and in the same year with the pastoral symphony, shows much of the sunny charm of that joyous composition in the allegro and presto movements. These the largo separates with a gentle sadness that is not melancholly, an exquisite pathos, and the tenderest feeling. Mr. Baermann, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. H. W. Hekking played the work with much beauty of tone, and in perfect keeping with the spirit of the composer.

The next concert in the series will take place on Feb. 24.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1890.

Third Kneisel Quartet Concert in Union Hall—Notes.

Unavoidable postponements of the third concert seemed to have whetted the appetite of the cultivated clientelé of the Kneisel Quartet; not only a large and deeply interested audience, but a fine programme and unusually beautiful playing were features of its consummation last night in Union Hall. Only Beethoven's compositions were performed: Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; Piano Trio in D, op. 70; Quartet in C, op. 59, No. 3. Union Hall proved fairly satisfying for chamber music. Our brief word about the playing is one of praise. To these purely quartet works of Beethoven's first and second manner, Mr. Kneisel and his companions paid worthy tribute. In point of sentiment the playing was beyond reproach, while technically the quartet presented unquestioned evidence of its pre-eminent ability. It would be a pleasure to remark upon several notable points in the reading and the execution, did space permit; we do not think the quartet ever came to a concert better prepared. The ensemble is well nigh perfect, yet were Mr. Hekking to repress his tone less, the resulting gain in force would be helpful; in the fugato of the last movement of the C major quartet the enunciation of the subject by the 'cello, was weak in comparison with the preceding voices. Never in the concerts of the quartet has the work of the second violin and viola been as fine as last night. Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist in the trio. Recovered from his illness, Mr. Baermann seems to have moderated his tendency to disregard the proper balance of the ensemble, for the performance of the trio was excellent in point of unity, and it is unnecessary to say genial and musical in spirit.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1890.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, January 27, 1890.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert here on Thursday at the Lyceum. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; Brahms' violin concerto, op. 77, played by Franz Kneisel; the introduction to "Tristan und Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony constituted the program. Mr. Nikisch has already become a "favorite" with the musical people here; at least, that's the way some of our critics put it.

We doubt if the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever gave a better performance in this city than the concert of last Thursday. Certain it is that Mr. Nikisch is one of the most accomplished conductors that have appeared in this city at present.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY.

The Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

The closing concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Infantry Hall to an audience that fully appreciated the somewhat unique and unusual programme, which conductor Nikish had prepared.

It opened with a Hadn symphony which the orchestra had never before performed, but which has many qualities that commend it to orchestras in search of works of a popular nature which have real musical merit as well. The orchestra, inspired and aided by Mr. Nikisch's baton, gave the pretty symphony a very sympathetic rendering. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

Mlle de Vere won the same success she everywhere does, and at all times. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined.

A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends.

The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1890

THE THIRD KNEISEL CONCERT.

Beethoven Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4.
Beethoven Pianoforte Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1.
Beethoven Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third concert of the series at Union Hall, Monday evening. Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

It is perhaps unnecessary to say that the performance of this most excellent Quartet was characterized by perfection of technique, keen sense of the proper subordination of one member to another, sentiment which never fell into mawkishness, and power which was never oppressive. These are all hackneyed expressions, and they have been used again and again, particularly in reference to this Kneisel Quartet. Nor are they now used loosely as by one who merely juggles with words, careless where they fall; nor are they mere mouth-tribute. For so many concerts are merely sad exhibitions of hopeless mediocrity, and so many concerts are merely a vehicle of sensational and personal display, that the homage paid to sincere and capable musicians should never grow stale, should never be perfunctory. There are some who are inclined to sneer at string quartets; they call them "thin" and "wearisome"; they complain of a "lack of tone," they miss "orchestral color." But next to the singing by a trained choir of the motets of the great Italians, comes surely in pure music the string quartet; and how many of our composers who conceal their lack of ideas by fantastic instrumentation and attract the attention by splashes of sound thrown without reason in the face of the listener, can write a quartet of sustained interest and beauty?

The concert of Monday evening, though perhaps too long (for it lasted until ten o'clock) was thoroughly delightful. Exceptions might be taken in one or two instances to the tempo chosen. In the Quartet in C major, surely the opening andante con moto was too slow, and the exquisite andante in A minor would have gained in beauty had it been taken a little faster.

Mr. Baermann played his part in the pianoforte trio with technical clearness and much discretion. It was an agreeable contrast to his ensemble playing at the last of his own concerts. Was not the largo too slow even for a largo assai; for the players lingered so long upon the opening words of the musical sentences that by the time the periods were reached, the first words were forgotten. And would it not be well in chamber music to use a smaller piano; or if the performer insists upon an instrument of full size, is it necessary to have the cover raised the full length of the supporting stick?

Each number of this program was given for the first time at these concerts. It is perhaps a dangerous experiment to restrict a program of two hours to the works of one man; the ear demands sharp contrasts; the same personality, however great it may be, soon becomes like the guest who makes too long a stay; and does not even the most faithful husband, after years of devotion, some time or other wish that another face than that of the mother of his children might shine upon him at the break of day?

It is doubtful whether the piano trio chosen would in these days be listened to in patience were not the sacred name of Beethoven attached to it. The first and third movements are ingenious, wonderfully written of course, but do they possess a real musical interest? And the piano part of the second movement is so written that when it is played, even by the accomplished musicians of Monday, either the movement becomes intolerably slow for the sake of the clearness of the piano passages, or the piano part becomes a mere jumble of notes.

The quartet in C minor, on the other hand, contains innumerable beauties, although the menuetto does not reach the high water mark of Beethoven. The scherzo is delightful from beginning to end. And if this quartet at times brings to the mind the voice of the great Mozart, curiously enough in the quartet in C major (particularly in the second movement) do we find premonitions of Mendelssohn. It is hard to believe the stories told by Thayer of the way in which these quartets were treated when they were first played over; how Romberg stamped on one, and how other musicians libeled them in terms too coarse to be repeated. Now it is the fashion to show enthusiasm over the later quartets alone of Beethoven; and to say contemptuously of the earlier ones that they might have been written by Mozart. But to say of music that it might have been the work of the composer of "Don Giovanni," is not that really the highest praise?

The Telegram.
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme for the Last Concert of the Series.

The last concert of the series for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurs this evening at Infantry Hall. Mlle Clementine de Vere is the soloist, and that charming singer is down for two numbers. Mr. Kneisel has a violin solo, and there are two numbers for the full orchestra. The programme is as follows:

Haydn...Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. & H.)
Adagio; Allegro, Largo, Menuet (Allegretto), Allegro con spirito.
Meyerbeer..... Aria, "Shadow Dance, from "Dinorah"
Mlle De Vere.
Handel.....Largo
Solo Violin, Mr. Kneisel,
David.....Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil"
Mlle. De Vere,
Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala"

The Haydn symphony, which leads the list, has not before had a place on the symphony programme. The scoring of the first movement is for strings, flute, oboe, bassoons and horns. In the remaining movements, tympani and trumpets are added. The work does not demand extended analysis. Its melodies and their treatment come upon the ear in the clearest possible way. The sprightly theme of the first allegro is worked up felicitously. The subject of the largo is severe and solemn in contrast with what has preceded. The minuet is pure Haydn in spirit and manner, while the finale, which Mr. Dwight used to call a "country dance," is brimful of motion and the naivete which we customarily associate with "Papa Haydn."

The Goldmark overture, or symphonic poem, begins with a slow introduction, succeeded by a quicker movement. Leading out of its first statement is another theme, begun in the violins and oboes, and afterwards taken up by the flutes, etc., and accompanied by the figure of the one preceding. The introduction of the second principal subject brings a new mood. The "working out" section, in the key of E major, is built upon the melodious subject (oboe and English horn) which served as pendant to the first theme. A prominent harp part is here introduced. Extended treatment marks this section, in which the second principal subject of the work appears in a new tempo, quasi allegro, fully orchestrated. The period ends with an expressive dolente episode of a sentimental character. Recapitulation follows, in which familiar [illegible] receives varied treatment. The [illegible] coda is accomplished by an [illegible] passage. The work is long and [illegible] instrumented.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Entertainment of the Series.

Mr. Nikisch placed upon the programme of the fourth and final Symphony Concert in the series a Haydn symphony which has never before appeared upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme. It was written when he was receiving a salary of $600, at Esterhaz. So many symphonies were written by him—the exact number he could never accurately say offhand—that many of intrinsic beauty are comparatively little known. Mr. Nikisch gave the pretty work a wonderfully sympathetic reading, and again exemplified the influence which controls such precision in his men. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer—the Wordsworth of music—were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

There was no manner of doubt as to Mlle. de Vere's success. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. The completeness of the attainment, however, compensated for the disturbing facial expressions, and to her was given the most enthusiastic applause of the night. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined. A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends. The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded. In younger times the overture was wont to open, not end, a concert. Last night Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

EVENING BULLETIN.
PROVIDENCE.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Entertainment of the Series.

Mr. Nikisch placed upon the programme of the fourth and final Symphony Concert in the series a Haydn symphony which has never before appeared upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme. It was written when he was receiving a salary of $600, at Esterhaz. So many symphonies were written by Haydn—the exact number he could never accurately say offhand—that many of intrinsic beauty are comparatively little known. Mr. Nikisch gave the pretty work a wonderfully sympathetic reading, and again exemplified the influence which controls such precision in his men. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer—the Wordsworth of music—were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

There was no manner of doubt as to Mlle. de Vere's success. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. The completeness of the attainment, however, compensated for the disturbing facial expressions, and to her was given the most enthusiastic applause of the night. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined. A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends. The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded. In younger times the overture was wont to open, not end, a concert. Last night Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1890.

[66]

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, January 27, 1890.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert here on Thursday at the Lyceum. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; Brahms' violin concerto, op. 77, played by Franz Kneisel; the introduction to "Tristan und Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony constituted the program. Mr. Nikisch has already become a "favorite" with the musical people here; at least, that's the way some of our critics put it.

We doubt if the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever gave a better performance in this city than the concert of last Thursday. Certain it is that Mr. Nikisch is one of the most accomplished conductors that have appeared in this city at present.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY.

The Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

The closing concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Infantry Hall to an audience that fully appreciated the somewhat unique and unusual programme, which conductor Nikish had prepared.

It opened with a Hadn symphony which the orchestra had never before performed, but which has many qualities that commend it to orchestras in search of works of a popular nature which have real musical merit as well. The orchestra, inspired and aided by Mr. Nikisch's baton, gave the pretty symphony a very sympathetic rendering. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

Mlle de Vere won the same success she everywhere does, and at all times. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined.

A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends.

The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1890

THE THIRD KNEISEL CONCERT.

Beethoven Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4.
Beethoven Pianoforte Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1.
Beethoven Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third concert of the series at Union Hall, Monday evening. Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

It is perhaps unnecessary to say that the performance of this most excellent Quartet was characterized by perfection of technique, keen sense of the proper subordination of one member to another, sentiment which never fell into mawkishness, and power which was never oppressive. These are all hackneyed expressions, and they have been used again and again, particularly in reference to this Kneisel Quartet. Nor are they now used loosely as by one who merely juggles with words, careless where they fall; nor are they mere mouth-tribute. For so many concerts are merely sad exhibitions of hopeless mediocrity, and so many concerts are merely a vehicle of sensational and personal display, that the homage paid to sincere and capable musicians should never grow stale, should never be perfunctory. There are some who are inclined to sneer at string quartets; they call them "thin" and "wearisome"; they complain of a "lack of tone," they miss "orchestral color." But next to the singing by a trained choir of the motets of the great Italians, comes surely in pure music the string quartet; and how many of our composers who conceal their lack of ideas by fantastic instrumentation and attract the attention by splashes of sound thrown without reason in the face of the listener, can write a quartet of sustained interest and beauty?

The concert of Monday evening, though perhaps too long (for it lasted until ten o'clock) was thoroughly delightful. Exceptions might be taken in one or two instances to the tempo chosen. In the Quartet in C major, surely the opening andante con moto was too slow, and the exquisite andante in A minor would have gained in beauty had it been taken a little faster.

Mr. Baermann played his part in the pianoforte trio with technical clearness and much discretion. It was an agreeable contrast to his ensemble playing at the last of his own concerts. Was not the largo too slow even for a largo assai; for the players lingered so long upon the opening words of the musical sentences that by the time the periods were reached, the first words were forgotten. And would it not be well in chamber music to use a smaller piano; or if the performer insists upon an instrument of full size, is it necessary to have the cover raised the full length of the supporting stick?

Each number of this program was given for the first time at these concerts. It is perhaps a dangerous experiment to restrict a program of two hours to the works of one man; the ear demands sharp contrasts; the same personality, however great it may be, soon becomes like the guest who makes too long a stay; and does not even the most faithful husband, after years of devotion, some time or other wish that another face than that of the mother of his children might shine upon him at the break of day?

It is doubtful whether the piano trio chosen would in these days be listened to in patience were not the sacred name of Beethoven attached to it. The first and third movements are ingenious, wonderfully written of course, but do they possess a real musical interest? And the piano part of the second movement is so written that when it is played, even by the accomplished musicians of Monday, either the movement becomes intolerably slow for the sake of the clearness of the piano passages, or the piano part becomes a mere jumble of notes.

The quartet in C minor, on the other hand, contains innumerable beauties, although the menuetto does not reach the high water mark of Beethoven. The scherzo is delightful from beginning to end. And if this quartet at times brings to the mind the voice of the great Mozart, curiously enough in the quartet in C major (particularly in the second movement) do we find premonitions of Mendelssohn. It is hard to believe the stories told by Thayer of the way in which these quartets were treated when they were first played over; how Romberg stamped on one, and how other musicians libeled them in terms too coarse to be repeated. Now it is the fashion to show enthusiasm over the later quartets alone of Beethoven; and to say contemptuously of the earlier ones that they might have been written by Mozart. But to say of music that it might have been the work of the composer of "Don Giovanni," is not that really the highest praise?

The Telegram.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme for the Last Concert of the Series.

The last concert of the series for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurs this evening at Infantry Hall. Mlle Clementine de Vere is the soloist, and that charming singer is down for two numbers. Mr. Kneisel has a violin solo, and there are two numbers for the full orchestra. The programme is as follows:

Haydn...Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. & H.)
Adagio; Allegro, Largo, Menuet (Allegretto), Allegro con spirito.
Meyerbeer..... Aria, "Shadow Dance," from "Dinorah"
Mlle De Vere.
Handel.....Largo
Solo Violin, Mr. Kneisel,
David.....Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil".
Mlle. De Vere,
Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala"

The Haydn symphony, which leads the list, has not before had a place on the symphony programme. The scoring of the first movement is for strings, flute, oboe, bassoons and horns. In the remaining movements, tympani and trumpets are added. The work does not demand extended analysis. Its melodies and their treatment come upon the ear in the clearest possible way. The sprightly theme of the first allegro is worked up felicitously. The subject of the largo is severe and solemn in contrast with what has preceded. The minuet is pure Haydn in spirit and manner, while the finale, which Mr. Dwight used to call a "country dance," is brimful of motion and the naivete which we customarily associate with "Papa Haydn."

The Goldmark overture, or symphonic poem, begins with a slow introduction, succeeded by a quicker movement. Leading out of its first statement is another theme, begun in the violins and oboes, and afterwards taken up by the flutes, etc., and accompanied by the figure of the one preceding. The introduction of the second principal subject brings a new mood. The "working out" section, in the key of E major, is built upon the melodious subject (oboe and English horn) which served as pendant to the first theme. A prominent harp part is here introduced. Extended treatment marks this section, in which the second principal subject of the work appears in a new tempo, quasi allegro, fully orchestrated. The period ends with an expressive dolente episode of a sentimental character. Recapitulation follows, in which familiar matter receives varied treatment. The lead into the coda is accomplished by an expressive passage. The coda is long and gorgeously instrumented.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Entertainment of the Series,

Mr. Nikisch placed upon the programme of the fourth and final Symphony Concert in the series a Haydn symphony which has never before appeared upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme. It was written when he was receiving a salary of $600, at Esterhaz. So many symphonies were written by him—the exact number he could never accurately say offhand—that many of intrinsic beauty are comparatively little known. Mr. Nikisch gave the pretty work a wonderfully sympathetic reading, and again exemplified the influence which controls such precision in his men. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer—the Wordsworth of music—were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

There was no manner of doubt as to Mlle. de Vere's success. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. The completeness of the attainment, however, compensated for the disturbing facial expressions, and to her was given the most enthusiastic applause of the night. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined. A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends. The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded. In younger times the overture was wont to open, not end, a concert. Last night Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

EVENING BULLETIN.
PROVIDENCE.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1890.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Entertainment of the Series,

Mr. Nikisch placed upon the programme of the fourth and final Symphony Concert in the series a Haydn symphony which has never before appeared upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme. It was written when he was receiving a salary of $600, at Esterhaz. So many symphonies were written by Haydn—the exact number he could never accurately say offhand—that many of intrinsic beauty are comparatively little known. Mr. Nikisch gave the pretty work a wonderfully sympathetic reading, and again exemplified the influence which controls such precision in his men. After the light and sprightly first allegro, the largo is an austere contrast, but the transition was exquisite in Mr. Nikisch's hands. It was given a deep, broad feeling, dignified, but softened with a suggestion of sadness. The power and earnestness of the composer—the Wordsworth of music—were translated with that perfection which has given the Boston orchestra its glory.

There was no manner of doubt as to Mlle. de Vere's success. Her technique and compass and equal fullness of tone were alike admirable, although it cannot be said that the superb tones were attained without an effort. The completeness of the attainment, however, compensated for the disturbing facial expressions, and to her was given the most enthusiastic applause of the night. She had two recalls after the aria from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah;" when the aria from "Les Perles de Bresil" was concluded the ardor of the audience was unconfined. A largo by Handel, Mr. Kneisel, soloist, was interpreted with dignity, and Mr. Kneisel learned from its reception that he was undeniably among friends. The Saint-Saens concerto for violin was most delightful to the ear. Between the bravura of the finale and the bright opening allegro there is a slow, sweet movement which balances the composition. Mr. Adamowski's very effective and lively reading, perfect mastership of all difficulties, and full vibrant tones were duly appreciated and applauded. In younger times the overture was wont to open, not end, a concert. Last night Goldmark's "Sakuntala" finished the programme. "Sakuntala" made Goldmark famous. Its slow commencement merges into quicker movement, several new moods are developed, and a harp is introduced. The orchestra gave the end of the period a sentimental coloring, which led up to a brilliant finale.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF Mr. CARL BAERMANN, Pianist.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C minor. op. 18, No. 4.
Allegro ma non tanto.—
Andante scherzando, (quasi allegretto).—
Minuetto, (allegro); trio.—
Allegretto.

BEETHOVEN. PIANOFORTE TRIO in D. op. 70, No. 1.
Allegro vivace e con brio.—
Largo assai ed espressivo.—
Presto.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C major. op. 59, No. 3.
Andante con moto; leading to Allegro vivace—C major.
Andante con moto—A minor.
Minuetto—C major; with Trio—F major.
Allegro molto—C major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

FOURTH CONCERT, Monday, February 24th, at 8 P. M.

[67]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night —Handel's Name.

The Kneisel Quartette—Professor Baermann at the piano—and a Beethoven programme! These things combined were sufficient to fill Union Hall last night with a large and representatively musical audience, and the performance was enough to justify more applause than it received. The quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, began the list, and the C major, op. 59, No. 3, ended the concert. These quartettes of the early and middle periods of Beethoven's works are the most satisfactory to the general auditor, even of culture, for they attain what the composer seeks to express, while the later quartettes are so full of striving and unrest, that the soaring after the infinite on the comparatively puny wings of four-stringed instruments, leaves confusion in many a mind which cannot fill out the suggestions given. Both quartettes went royally well. Messrs. Svecenski and Roth did some especially good work in the second movement of the C minor, where the polyphonic character gave independent display to each instrument, and where viola and second violin stood out prominently. The minuet following was delightful in its freedom, and is really more of a scherzo than the scherzo of the second symphony—the first symphonic movement of that name composed. The finale was also excellent, for its jovial chief theme was given with abundant hilarity, the earnest and the dainty episodes had good contrast, and the brusque end possessed inspiring force.

The final quartette was not less effective. One passed through the opening chords as through the Pillars of Hercules, into a strange world of sunshine and shadow. The gloomier passages were the most impressive, and although the 'cello pizzicato was at times woodeny, the bowing passages both of Mr. Hekking and Mr. Svecenski were noble enough. I sometimes think that it may be the instrument, rather than the playing of the former, which is responsible for the thin tone, or the dull pizzicato. The tender cantabile of Mr. Kneisel in this was also praiseworthy. But technically, the contrapuntal finale was the most excellent ensemble playing. One cannot love it as one does the sombre andante, but its great difficulties must be recognized, and the reviewer must also recognize the artistic manner in which they were overcome. The meaning of this polyphonic movement was never made more clear. But the climax of the concert was reached with the performance of the piano trio in D. In this Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Professor Baermann gave an ensemble that could not be excelled. The echoing quality of the hall (of which I have formerly spoken) was not present, probably owing to the crowded state of the house, and the performance was not marred in any way. The first movement was a trifle rapid at times, but the balance between the parts was better than in any of the concerted numbers with piano yet given this season, and the delicacy of Prof. Baermann's piano work was exquisite. The second movement was a marvel of united shading from beginning to end, and the finale was equally thorough, there being no runaway of any kind in the presto passages. Prof. Baermann was at his very best in this, and Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking certainly divided the honors with him. A more dignified, lofty and well executed chamber concert is not within my recollection.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890

MR. KNEISEL'S THIRD CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel has transported his admirable quartet concerts to Union Hall, and the first concert there (but the third of the season) was attended by a very large and enthusiastic audience. Applause was the order of the evening, and everybody seemed glad to see that Mr. Baermann had sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to appear again. The programme consisted entirely of chamber compositions by Beethoven, to wit: The quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; the piano trio in D major, op. 70, No. 1, and the quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet has never played better; it was as nearly a perfect performance as could be wished. All the work of this quartet, under Mr. Kneisel's patient and inspiring guidance, has been so unusually excellent that it seems absurd to say that they constantly improve. This is the case, however, for each succeeding concert shows some new fineness of detail and delicacy of artistic performance which was not there before. It is an honor to any city to possess such an institution, and Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his organization are deserving of all praise; and it may be justly claimed that they have done an immense amount towards elevating the taste and understanding for chamber music in this city. Mr. Baermann's illness does not seem to have affected his skill in the least; he exhibited again last evening his remarkable artistic power, and, more than that, the ability to play chamber music in a discreet and self-contained manner, without overwhelming the other players by thundering work on the piano. Mr. Kneisel has had such hard luck in being obliged to twice postpone this concert that it is doubly gratifying that it should have been so successful.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, when the programme of Beethoven's music included the C minor quartet, op. 18; the trio in D major, op. 70; and the C major quartet, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann in the programme of the evening, he having recovered from his recent indisposition. A more competent band of players for such a programme could hardly be called together in any city, and the excellent performance of the several compositions was most thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience in attendance. Mr. Baermann again exhibited his marked ability as an ensemble player in the trio, making the piano take only its proper prominence throughout the work, and giving to his part of the composition the same charm that has made his own chamber concert programmes of this season so enjoyable. The change made in the place for giving these concerts has given many an opportunity for their hearing who could not have been accommodated in the smaller auditorium.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 28.

MINIATURE ALMANAC...Jan. 28

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The third in the series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall last evening to a large audience. The programme consisted of three selections from Beethoven, the quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, pianoforte trio in D, op. 70, No. 1, and quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. All were heard for the first time at these concerts, and hearty applause testified to the audience's enjoyment of the music so admirably rendered. Carl Baerman was the pianist, and it is needless to state that his masterly interpretations were listened to with delight. The next concert by this quartet will be given on Monday, Feb. 24.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

Director Arthur Nikisch gave the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts a very pleasing programme of exclusively instrumental selections, without the aid of a soloist, last evening, and the three compositions chosen were the Bach-Abert prelude, chorale and fugue, the symphony "To the Fatherland," by Raff, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March." The symphony had not been heard here before, and, for reasons best known to the conductor, the work was not performed "in its entirety" on this occasion, the fourth movement being omitted. The opus number of the symphony is 96, but it is the first of the 11 works of this character given publicity by this prolific composer, and its merit, as judged by Hiller, Reinecke, Volkner, Lachner, and Ambros, led them to award it the first prize over 32 competing works of the class submitted to them as judges of the society known as "The Friends of Music" of the Austrian empire shortly after its completion about 30 years ago. It belongs to the class of "programme music," and Raff guarded its hearers from a misunderstanding of his ideas by prefacing it with the following description: "In the first movement, the 'tone poet' endeavored to portray in tone pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill and limit them. In the second movement, to the music of the horns, the hearer follows the chase with German men in German forests; he joins the happy train of young men and maidens as, singing their native airs, they wander over the smiling fields. In the third movement, the composer asks you to tarry by the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by his people through the cultivation of the Muses, through love for wife and children. Now the composer, leaving these joyful scenes, casts his eye upon another side of German life. In the fifth movement, he does not attempt to stifle the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united fatherland. But hope, the consoler, takes him by the hand, and, filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity." The symphony, as a whole, made a decidedly interesting addition to the list of this composer's works that have had a hearing here. The leading themes are none the less enjoyable because they are taken largely from the songs dear to the German nation, and these have been so skilfully treated that they are made fascinating to the musical student as well as the average music lover. In attempting to depict in music the national characteristics of the Germans the composer has made his first movement the least interesting of the four parts of the work heard yesterday, and if the "mutilation" of the symphony had been further completed by well advised "cuts" in this portion of the composition the result would have been beneficial. The theme of the scherzo, and that taken up by the first 'cello in the larghetto are delightful examples of the melodious characteristics of the work, and the fifth movement gives a glorious climax to this most attractive symphony. The conductor and his men appeared alike inspired by the composer's genius, and the performance resulted in one of the marked successes of the season. Mr. Nikisch has made an immense advance in his work with the orchestra within a very short time, and this fact was again made apparent by the performance of the fugue of the first selection in which the virtuosity of the organization was most distinctly shown. The chorale was grandly played by the brass instruments, although a shade less of the volume of tone might have improved its quality. Wagner's marvellous musical economy in ideas, as shown in the "Huldigung's March," was made the most of by all the forces of the orchestra, and had the Bach-Abert number been played between the symphony and the march the programme would have made a very much better impression. While it is not to be supposed for a moment that the comments made upon the methods and customs of Mr. Nikisch in conducting have had any effect, it may be well to say that he has come to see the advisability of placing a desk in front of his stand, and to use it as other capable men have before his advent in this city. Next Saturday evening's programme is as follows: Massenet, overture, "Phedre"; Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicode, symphonic variations, Op. 21; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." The soloist will be Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

PASTE OVER

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYST(

FIFTH SEASON 1889-

THE KNEISEL Q

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. UTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECEN
Mr. ANTON
WITH THE ASSISTANCE
Mr. CARL BAERMAN

III. CONCER

MONDAY, JANUARY 27T

PROGRAMM

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in C mi Allegro ma non tanto.. Andante scherzando, (Minuetto, (allegro); tr Allegretto.
BEETHOVEN.	PIANOFORTE TI Allegro vivace e con Largo assai ed espres Presto.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in C m Andante con moto; l Andante con moto—. Minuetto—C major; Allegro molto—C ma

The Pianoforte is a St

FOURTH CONCERT, Monday, February 24th.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night—Handel's Name.

The Kneisel Quartette—Professor Baermann at the piano—and a Beethoven programme! These things combined were sufficient to fill Union Hall last night with a large and representatively musical audience, and the performance was enough to justify more applause than it received. The quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, began the list, and the C major, op. 59, No. 3, ended the concert. These quartettes of the early and middle periods of Beethoven's works are the most satisfactory to the general auditor, even of culture, for they attain what the composer seeks to express, while the later quartettes are so full of striving and unrest, that the soaring after the infinite on the comparatively puny wings of four-stringed instruments, leaves confusion in many a mind which cannot fill out the suggestions given. Both quartettes went royally well. Messrs. Svecenski and Roth did some especially good work in the second movement of the C minor, where the polyphonic character gave independent display to each instrument, and where viola and second violin stood out prominently. The minuet following was delightful in its freedom, and is really more of a scherzo than the scherzo of the second symphony—the first symphonic movement of that name composed. The finale was also excellent, for its jovial chief theme was given with abundant hilarity, the earnest and the dainty episodes had good contrast, and the brusque end possessed inspiring force.

The final quartette was not less effective. One passed through the opening chords as through the Pillars of Hercules, into a strange world of sunshine and shadow. The gloomier passages were the most impressive, and although the 'cello pizzicato was at times woodeny, the bowing passages both of Mr. Hekking and Mr. Svecenski were noble enough. I sometimes think that it may be the instrument, rather than the playing of the former, which is responsible for the thin tone, or the dull pizzicato. The tender cantabile of Mr. Kneisel in this was also praiseworthy. But technically, the contrapuntal finale was the most excellent ensemble playing. One cannot love it as one does the sombre andante, but its great difficulties must be recognized, and the reviewer must also recognize the artistic manner in which they were overcome. The meaning of this polyphonic movement was never made more clear. But the climax of the concert was reached with the performance of the piano trio in D. In this Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Professor Baermann gave an ensemble that could not be excelled. The echoing quality of the hall (of which I have formerly spoken) was not present, probably owing to the crowded state of the house, and the performance was not marred in any way. The first movement was a trifle rapid at times, but the balance between the parts was better than in any of the concerted numbers with piano yet given this season, and the delicacy of Prof. Baermann's piano work was exquisite. The second movement was a marvel of united shading from beginning to end, and the finale was equally thorough, there being no runaway of any kind in the presto passages. Prof. Baermann was at his very best in this, and Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking certainly divided the honors with him. A more dignified, lofty and well executed chamber concert is not within my recollection.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890

MR. KNEISEL'S THIRD CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel has transported his admirable quartet concerts to Union Hall, and the first concert there (but the third of the season) was attended by a very large and enthusiastic audience. Applause was the order of the evening, and everybody seemed glad to see that Mr. Baermann had sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to appear again. The programme consisted entirely of chamber compositions by Beethoven, to wit: The quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; the piano trio in D major, op. 70, No. 1, and the quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet has never played better; it was as nearly a perfect performance as could be wished. All the work by this quartet, under Mr. Kneisel's patient and inspiring guidance, has been so unusually excellent that it seems absurd to say that they constantly improve. This is the case, however, for each succeeding concert shows some new fineness of detail and delicacy of artistic performance which was not there before. It is an honor to any city to possess such an institution, and Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his organization are deserving of all praise; and it may be justly claimed that they have done an immense amount towards elevating the taste and understanding for chamber music in this city. Mr. Baermann's illness does not seem to have affected his skill in the least; he exhibited again last evening his remarkable artistic power, and, more than that, the ability to play chamber music in a discreet and self-contained manner, without overwhelming the other players by thundering work on the piano. Mr. Kneisel has had such hard luck in being obliged to twice postpone this concert that it is doubly gratifying that it should have been so successful.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, JANUARY

[67]

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, when the programme of Beethoven's music included the C minor quartet, op. 18; the trio in D major, op. 70; and the C major quartet, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann in the programme of the evening, he having recovered from his recent indisposition. A more competent band of players for such a programme could hardly be called together in any city, and the excellent performance of the several compositions was most thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience in attendance. Mr. Baermann again exhibited his marked ability as an ensemble player in the trio, making the piano take only its proper prominence throughout the work, and giving to his part of the composition the same charm that has made his own chamber concert programmes of this season so enjoyable. The change made in the place for giving these concerts has given many an opportunity for their hearing who could not have been accommodated in the smaller auditorium.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 28.

MINIATURE ALMANAC...Jan. 28

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The third in the series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall last evening to a large audience. The programme consisted of three selections from Beethoven, the quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, pianoforte trio in D, op. 70, No. 1, and quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. All were heard for the first time at these concerts, and hearty applause testified to the audience's enjoyment of the music so admirably rendered. Carl Baerman was the pianist, and it is needless to state that his masterly interpretations were listened to with delight. The next concert by this quartet will be given on Monday, Feb. 24.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

Director Arthur Nikisch gave the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts a very pleasing programme of exclusively instrumental selections, without the aid of a soloist, last evening, and the three compositions chosen were the Bach-Abert prelude, chorale and fugue, the symphony "To the Fatherland," by Raff, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March." The symphony had not been heard here before, and, for reasons best known to the conductor, the work was not performed "in its entirety" on this occasion, the fourth movement being omitted. The opus number of the symphony is 96, but it is the first of the 11 works of this character given publicity by this prolific composer, and its merit, as judged by Hiller, Reinecke, Volkner, Lachner, and Ambros, led them to award it the first prize over 32 competing works of the class submitted to them as judges of the society known as "The Friends of Music" of the Austrian empire shortly after its completion about 30 years ago. It belongs to the class of "programme music," and Raff guarded its hearers from a misunderstanding of his ideas by prefacing it with the following description: "In the first movement, the 'tone poet' endeavored to portray in tone pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill and limit them. In the second movement, to the music of the horns, the hearer follows the chase with German men in German forests; he joins the happy train of young men and maidens as, singing their native airs, they wander over the smiling fields. In the third movement, the composer asks you to tarry by the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by his people through the cultivation of the Muses, through love for wife and children. Now the composer, leaving these joyful scenes, casts his eye upon another side of German life. In the fifth movement, he does not attempt to stifle the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united fatherland. But hope, the consoler, takes him by the hand, and, filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity." The symphony, as a whole, made a decidedly interesting addition to the list of this composer's works that have had a hearing here. The leading themes are none the less enjoyable because they are taken largely from the songs dear to the German nation, and these have been so skilfully treated that they are made fascinating to the musical student as well as the average music lover. In attempting to depict in music the national characteristics of the Germans the composer has made his first movement the least interesting of the four parts of the work heard yesterday, and if the "mutilation" of the symphony had been further completed by well advised "cuts" in this portion of the composition the result would have been beneficial. The theme of the scherzo and that taken up by the first 'cello in the larghetto are delightful examples of the melodious characteristics of the work, and the fifth movement gives a glorious climax to this most attractive symphony. The conductor and his men appeared alike inspired by the composer's genius, and the performance resulted in one of the marked successes of the season. Mr. Nikisch has made an immense advance in his work with the orchestra within a very short time, and this fact was again made apparent by the performance of the fugue of the first selection in which the virtuosity of the organization was most distinctly shown. The chorale was grandly played by the brass instruments, although a shade less of the volume of tone might have improved its quality. Wagner's marvellous musical economy in ideas, as shown in the "Huldigung's March," was made the most of by all the forces of the orchestra, and had the Bach-Abert number been played between the symphony and the march the programme would have made a very much better impression. While it is not to be supposed for a moment that the comments made upon the methods and customs of Mr. Nikisch in conducting have had any effect, it may be well to say that he has come to see the advisability of placing a desk in front of his stand, and to use it as other capable men have before his advent in this city. Next Saturday evening's programme is as follows: Massenet, overture, "Pheare"; Lalo, symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicode, symphonic variations, Op. 27; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." The soloist will be Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

PASTE OVER

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYST(

FIFTH SEASON 1889-

THE KNEISEL Q

WITH THE ASSISTANCE (

III. CONCEI

MONDAY, JANUARY 27T

PROGRAMM

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C mi
Allegro ma non tanto..
Andante scherzando. (
Minuetto, (allegro); tr
Allegretto

BEETHOVEN. PIANOFORTE TI
Allegro vivace e con l
Largo assai ed espres
Presto.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C n
Andante con moto; l
Andante con moto—.
Minuetto—C major;
Allegro molto—C ma

The Pianoforte is a St

FOURTH CONCERT, Monday, February 24th

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night—Handel's Name.

The Kneisel Quartette—Professor Baermann at the piano—and a Beethoven programme! These things combined were sufficient to fill Union Hall last night with a large and representatively musical audience, and the performance was enough to justify more applause than it received. The quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, began the list, and the C major, op. 59, No. 3, ended the concert. These quartettes of the early and middle periods of Beethoven's works are the most satisfactory to the general auditor, even of culture, for they attain what the composer seeks to express, while the later quartettes are so full of striving and unrest, that the soaring after the infinite on the comparatively puny wings of four-stringed instruments, leaves confusion in many a mind which cannot fill out the suggestions given. Both quartettes went royally well. Messrs. Svecenski and Roth did some especially good work in the second movement of the C minor, where the polyphonic character gave independent display to each instrument, and where viola and second violin stood out prominently. The minuet following was delightful in its freedom, and is really more of a scherzo than the scherzo of the second symphony—the first symphonic movement of that name composed. The finale was also excellent, for its jovial chief theme was given with abundant hilarity, the earnest and the dainty episodes had good contrast, and the brusque end possessed inspiring force.

The final quartette was not less effective. One passed through the opening chords as through the Pillars of Hercules, into a strange world of sunshine and shadow. The gloomier passages were the most impressive, and although the 'cello pizzicato was at times woodeny, the bowing passages both of Mr. Hekking and Mr. Svecenski were noble enough. I sometimes think that it may be the instrument, rather than the playing of the former, which is responsible for the thin tone, or the dull pizzicato. The tender cantabile of Mr. Kneisel in this was alse praiseworthy. But technically, the contrapuntal finale was the most excellent ensemble playing. One cannot love it as one does the sombre andante, but its great difficulties must be recognized, and the reviewer must also recognize the artistic manner in which they were overcome. The meaning of this polyphonic movement was never made more clear. But the climax of the concert was reached with the performance of the piano trio in D. In this Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Professor Baermann gave an ensemble that could not be excelled. The echoing quality of the hall (of which I have formerly spoken) was not present, probably owing to the crowded state of the house, and the performance was not marred in any way. The first movement was a trifle rapid at times, but the balance between the parts was better than in any of the concerted numbers with piano yet given this season, and the delicacy of Prof. Baermann's piano work was exquisite. The second movement was a marvel of united shading from beginning to end, and the finale was equally thorough, there being no runaway of any kind in the presto passages. Prof. Baermann was at his very best in this, and Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking certainly divided the honors with him. A more dignified, lofty and well executed chamber concert is not within my recollection.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890

MR. KNEISEL'S THIRD CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel has transported his admirable quartet concerts to Union Hall, and the first concert there (but the third of the season) was attended by a very large and enthusiastic audience. Applause was the order of the evening, and everybody seemed glad to see that Mr. Baermann had sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to appear again. The programme consisted entirely of chamber compositions by Beethoven, to wit: The quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; the piano trio in D major, op. 70, No. 1, and the quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet has never played better; it was as nearly a perfect performance as could be wished. All the work by this quartet, under Mr. Kneisel's patient and inspiring guidance, has been so unusually excellent that it seems absurd to say that they constantly improve. This is the case, however, for each succeeding concert shows some new fineness of detail and delicacy of artistic performance which was not there before. It is an honor to any city to possess such an institution, and Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his organization are deserving of all praise; and it may be justly claimed that they have done an immense amount towards elevating the taste and understanding for chamber music in this city. Mr. Baermann's illness does not seem to have affected his skill in the least; he exhibited again last evening his remarkable artistic power, and, more than that, the ability to play chamber music in a discreet and self-contained manner, without overwhelming the other players by thundering work on the piano. Mr. Kneisel has had such hard luck in being obliged to twice postpone this concert that it is doubly gratifying that it should have been so successful.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1890.

[67]

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, when the programme of Beethoven's music included the C minor quartet, op. 18; the trio in D major, op. 70; and the C major quartet, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann in the programme of the evening, he having recovered from his recent indisposition. A more competent band of players for such a programme could hardly be called together in any city, and the excellent performance of the several compositions was most thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience in attendance. Mr. Baermann again exhibited his marked ability as an ensemble player in the trio, making the piano take only its proper prominence throughout the work, and giving to his part of the composition the same charm that has made his own chamber concert programmes of this season so enjoyable. The change made in the place for giving these concerts has given many an opportunity for their hearing who could not have been accommodated in the smaller auditorium.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 28.

MINIATURE ALMANAC....Jan. 28

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The third in the series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall last evening to a large audience. The programme consisted of three selections from Beethoven, the quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, pianoforte trio in D, op. 70, No. 1, and quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. All were heard for the first time at these concerts, and hearty applause testified to the audience's enjoyment of the music so admirably rendered. Carl Baerman was the pianist, and it is needless to state that his masterly interpretations were listened to with delight. The next concert by this quartet will be given on Monday, Feb. 24.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

Director Arthur Nikisch gave the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts a very pleasing programme of exclusively instrumental selections, without the aid of a soloist, last evening, and the three compositions chosen were the Bach-Abert prelude, chorale and fugue, the symphony "To the Fatherland," by Raff, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March." The symphony had not been heard here before, and, for reasons best known to the conductor, the work was not performed "in its entirety" on this occasion, the fourth movement being omitted. The opus number of the symphony is 96, but it is the first of the 11 works of this character given publicity by this prolific composer, and its merit, as judged by Hiller, Reinecke, Volkner, Lachner, and Ambros, led them to award it the first prize over 32 competing works of the class submitted to them as judges of the society known as "The Friends of Music" of the Austrian empire shortly after its completion about 30 years ago. It belongs to the class of "programme music," and Raff guarded its hearers from a misunderstanding of his ideas by prefacing it with the following description: "In the first movement, the 'tone poet' endeavored to portray in tone pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill and limit them. In the second movement, to the music of the horns, the hearer follows the chase with German men in German forests; he joins the happy train of young men and maidens as, singing their native airs, they wander over the smiling fields. In the third movement, the composer asks you to tarry by the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by his people through the cultivation of the Muses, through love for wife and children. Now the composer, leaving these joyful scenes, casts his eye upon another side of German life. In the fifth movement, he does not attempt to stifle the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united fatherland. But hope, the consoler, takes him by the hand, and, filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity." The symphony, as a whole, made a decidedly interesting addition to the list of this composer's works that have had a hearing here. The leading themes are none the less enjoyable because they are taken largely from the songs dear to the German nation, and these have been so skilfully treated that they are made fascinating to the musical student as well as the average music lover. In attempting to depict in music the national characteristics of the Germans the composer has made his first movement the least interesting of the four parts of the work heard yesterday, and if the "mutilation" of the symphony had been further completed by well advised "cuts" in this portion of the composition the result would have been beneficial. The theme of the scherzo and that taken up by the first 'cello in the larghetto are delightful examples of the melodious characteristics of the work, and the fifth movement gives a glorious climax to this most attractive symphony. The conductor and his men appeared alike inspired by the composer's genius, and the performance resulted in one of the marked successes of the season. Mr. Nikisch has made an immense advance in his work with the orchestra within a very short time, and this fact was again made apparent by the performance of the fugue of the first selection in which the virtuosity of the organization was most distinctly shown. The chorale was grandly played by the brass instruments, although a shade less of the volume of tone might have improved its quality. Wagner's marvellous musical economy in ideas, as shown in the "Huldigung's March," was made the most of by all the forces of the orchestra, and had the Bach-Abert number been played between the symphony and the march the programme would have made a very much better impression. While it is not to be supposed for a moment that the comments made upon the methods and customs of Mr. Nikisch in conducting have had any effect, it may be well to say that he has come to see the advisability of placing a desk in front of his stand, and to use it as other capable men have before his advent in this city. Next Saturday evening's programme is as follows: Massenet, overture, "Pheare"; Lalo, symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicode, symphonic variations, Op. 27; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." The soloist will be Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

PASTE OVER

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

4

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.

The quartet in C minor is one of the first set of quartets for stringed instruments Beethoven wrote. The published order of the six which comprise opus 18 is not that in which they were written and it is an interesting fact that two of the least pretending as to style and least elaborate as to construction among them, namely the A major and the B flat major, should have been the last in the order of production; while, if the dated manuscripts be reliable, the quartet in D, (No. 3) by some considered the most beautiful and original of the set, preceded them all in the design of the composer. Beethoven's model in the quartets of opus 18, which are dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, was Mozart. The six quartets which belong to the "first manner" have often been compared with the set of six composed by Mozart and dedicated to Haydn. The comparison, one writer observes, is not without a good show of reason. Before Beethoven was entirely and unreservedly himself, Mozart was not only his pattern, but his idol (for Haydn, although he studied with him some time, Beethoven entertained no very deep or hearty sympathy); and except, perhaps, in their orchestral accompaniments in C and D major, their pianoforte sonatas in C minor, and their concertos for pianoforte and orchestral accompaniments in C major and C minor (in which a very strong affinity is evident), nowhere do the two admirable masters more nearly approach each other than in the quartets respectively dedicated to Haydn and the Prince Lobkowitz.

The quartet in C minor played to-day was one which Haydn liked best. Attention is called to a few of the salient points of the work: the first phrase of the first movement is pure Mozart; the second subject is first given out by the second violin, with viola accompaniment, with counter theme for first violin, and then taken up by that instrument. To this melody succeeds a tributary in the same key (E flat). In the andante scherzando some see a resemblance to the andante of the first symphony. The movement is an early indication of what Beethoven subsequently did with the scherzo. The minuet and trio contain a little of Haydn, more of Mozart, and are not without some Beethovenish turns. The last movement is in rondo form built upon a characteristic melody. Those fond of tracing analogies have found it remindful of Mozart's serenade in C minor for eight wind instruments, afterwards turned into a quintet for strings. (First performance at Kneisel Concerts).

The pianoforte trio in D, opus 70, and its companion in E flat, were written in the summer of the year 1808, the period of the C minor and "Pastoral" symphonies and the Choral Fantasia. The symphonies and the Fantasia were produced a few months after they were completed, but the trios were first heard in April of the next year at the house of Beethoven's friend Count Zmeskall. Beethoven's letters show that they had been played privately, and at the time of writing Zmeskall, an amateur violoncellist, was organizing a performance in society. Zmeskall asked the composer himself to take the pianoforte part, and was readily answered, "I shall be glad, right glad, to play." But the master appeared less eager to admit his "dear little musical old Count" to the violoncello part. First he said, "If you find that you can manage it, play it yourself, or let old Kraft do so." Subsequently, however, he wrote: "I think, after all, it would be advisable to let old Kraft play, as the trios are to be heard for the first time (in society), and you can play them afterwards. * * If you meet with any difficulties, one of which may possibly be that Kraft & S. (Schuppanzigh) do not harmonize well together, (they were then conducting rival concerts in Vienna), then Herr von Zmeskall must distinguish himself not as a mere musical Count, but as an energetic musician." Reichardt speaks of a performance of the trios at Countess Erdödy's in December, at which Beethoven played the pianoforte. (First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

BEETHOVEN'S three quartets of op. 59 were composed in 1806, the year of the fourth symphony, the violin concerto and the pianoforte concerto in G. Here we find him entirely freed from his own favorite model (Mozart) laying the foundation of what has been designated his second manner. They are dedicated to Count Rasoumouffsky, Russian Ambassador to Vienna, to whom and Prince Lobkowitz, both zealous and generous amateurs, Beethoven inscribed many works. It was probably as a compliment to Count Rasoumouffsky, who had presented him with the theme, that Beethoven took a Russian melody for the subject of the finale in the first (F major) and another for the trio of the allegretto of the second (E minor). The following has been compiled: The first movement of the third of the series, in C, the one played to-day, opens with a brief introduction (andante con moto) of vague and mysterious character commencing upon a discord, The allegro vivace which comes in after a long holding chord is but preliminary to the leading subject, or theme, of vigorous character, (violins in octaves) Two tributaries branch out of this, the first having an entirely new melody; the second being evolved from the two notes which commence the preliminary to the leading subject. After development the second subject enters in the key of the dominant (G), (violins in thirds). This subject's tributary, which serves for peroration to the first part, is first commenced by the 'cello. Here are the materials for the whole movement. In the second part, or "free fantasia" portion, use of these is varied in an extraordinary degree; the most notable episode being based upon the two notes already mentioned. This appears just before resumption of the principal theme. Recapitulation proceeds in the ordinary way. The coda (again are the two notes called into play) is unusually short for Beethoven.

In consequence of the andante con moto, one writer says, the quartet in C major is the most generally popular of the three dedicated to Prince Rasoumouffsky. The andante is an inspiration from beginning to end. Such an inspiration, indeed, as only came to Beethoven. The plaintive and mysterious opening at once prepares the mind for what is to follow. To remark upon the various beauties of this wonderful movement would occupy more space than can be allowed. The plaintive ritornelle to the first theme, the impassioned opening of the second part (viola), and various other parts, must speak for themselves.

The theme of the minuet and its trio are in lively and grateful contrast.

The finale begins with a fugato, the subject given out by the viola, and successively answered by the second violin, 'cello and first violin. After its full developement a coda follows, which speedily leads through a cadenza for first violin, to the principal second theme in the dominant chord (G). The episode and tributaries in this impetuous movement are numerous. When the first subject appears again it is combined with a new motive, (half notes in the viola) and the complications keep piling up until in the coda the attainment of what the ear believes to be a climax is suddenly arrested by one of those surprises which are rarely met with in the works of other composers. After this the coda is resumed in a new form and with increasing effect; a brilliant unison acting as peroration. (First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night —Handel's Name.

The Kneisel Quartette—Professor Baermann at the piano—and a Beethoven programme! These things combined were sufficient to fill Union Hall last night with a large and representatively musical audience, and the performance was enough to justify more applause than it received. The quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, began the list, and the C major, op. 59, No. 3, ended the concert. These quartettes of the early and middle periods of Beethoven's works are the most satisfactory to the general auditor, even of culture, for they attain what the composer seeks to express, while the later quartettes are so full of striving and unrest, that the soaring after the infinite on the comparatively puny wings of four-stringed instruments, leaves confusion in many a mind which cannot fill out the suggestions given. Both quartettes went royally well. Messrs. Svecenski and Roth did some especially good work in the second movement of the C minor, where the polyphonic character gave independent display to each instrument, and where viola and second violin stood out prominently. The minuet following was delightful in its freedom, and is really more of a scherzo than the scherzo of the second symphony—the first symphonic movement of that name composed. The finale was also excellent, for its jovial chief theme was given with abundant hilarity, the earnest and the dainty episodes had good contrast, and the brusque end possessed inspiring force.

The final quartette was not less effective. One passed through the opening chords as through the Pillars of Hercules, into a strange world of sunshine and shadow. The gloomier passages were the most impressive, and although the 'cello pizzicato was at times woodeny, the bowing passages both of Mr. Hekking and Mr. Svecenski were noble enough. I sometimes think that it may be the instrument, rather than the playing of the former, which is responsible for the thin tone, or the dull pizzicato. The tender cantabile of Mr. Kneisel in this was also praiseworthy. But technically, the contrapuntal finale was the most excellent ensemble playing. One cannot love it as one does the sombre andante, but its great difficulties must be recognized, and the reviewer must also recognize the artistic manner in which they were overcome. The meaning of this polyphonic movement was never made more clear. But the climax of the concert was reached with the performance of the piano trio in D. In this Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Professor Baermann gave an ensemble that could not be excelled. The echoing quality of the hall (of which I have formerly spoken) was not present, probably owing to the crowded state of the house, and the performance was not marred in any way. The first movement was a trifle rapid at times, but the balance between the parts was better than in any of the concerted numbers with piano yet given this season, and the delicacy of Prof. Baermann's piano work was exquisite. The second movement was a marvel of united shading from beginning to end, and the finale was equally thorough, there being no runaway of any kind in the presto passages. Prof. Baermann was at his very best in this, and Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking certainly divided the honors with him. A more dignified, lofty and well executed chamber concert is not within my recollection.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1890

MR. KNEISEL'S THIRD CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel has transported his admirable quartet concerts to Union Hall, and the first concert there (but the third of the season) was attended by a very large and enthusiastic audience. Applause was the order of the evening, and everybody seemed glad to see that Mr. Baermann had sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to appear again. The programme consisted entirely of chamber compositions by Beethoven, to wit: The quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4; the piano trio in D major, op. 70, No. 1, and the quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3. The quartet has never played better; it was as nearly a perfect performance as could be wished. All the work of this quartet, under Mr. Kneisel's patient and inspiring guidance, has been so unusually excellent that it seems absurd to say that they constantly improve. This is the case, however, for each succeeding concert shows some new fineness of detail and delicacy of artistic performance which was not there before. It is an honor to any city to possess such an institution, and Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his organization are deserving of all praise; and it may be justly claimed that they have done an immense amount towards elevating the taste and understanding for chamber music in this city. Mr. Baermann's illness does not seem to have affected his skill in the least; he exhibited again last evening his remarkable artistic power, and, more than that, the ability to play chamber music in a discreet and self-contained manner, without overwhelming the other players by thundering work on the piano. Mr. Kneisel has had such hard luck in being obliged to twice postpone this concert that it is doubly gratifying that it should have been so successful.

ARTHUR WELD.

[68]

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1890

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Melusina"
Weber.....Romance from "Euryanthe"
Grieg.....Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(First time at these concerts.)
Dvorak.....Songs with Piano
(a) "I chant my Lay."
(b) "Hark, how my Triangle."
(c) "Songs my Mother taught me."
(d) "Cloudy Heights of Tatra daring Falcon haunteth."
Schumann.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, op. 97

The charming Melusina overture was roughly handled last Saturday. The mermaid was not wooed with gentle caresses and honeyed words; violent hands were laid upon her, as though she were a woman of the Sabines. Where was the mysterious and dreamy beauty of the opening measures? Who would have thought that Mendelssohn had marked them pianissimo?

And next to Mr. Nikisch, the first clarinet player was chiefly blamable. This gentleman at his first appearance, when he played in the "Rosamunde" music of Schubert, made a very favorable impression. Since the first concert he has steadily worked to remove that impression. We may well be proud of the oboes, flutes and bassoons of the orchestra; but it is not to be denied that the first clarinet is a weaker member.

Nor can the peculiar genius of Mr. Nikisch be seen in his direction of such works as this overture. He seems unhappy unless he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Repose, the quiet beauty of insinuation, delicacy of touch and treatment, these qualities seem abhorrent to his nature. By birth and education his is a theatrical nature; and when he has to deal with the theatrical in music he is admirable, most admirable; but the hot and feverish air of the playhouse soon becomes insupportable.

The suite of Grieg is taken from the music written for the stage version of "Peer Gynt," the extraordinary poem of Ibsen. Of the four numbers, the first and second are musically the most interesting; the second is beautiful, and it was exceedingly well played, for the strings so carefully drilled by Mr. Gericke have not yet lost their cunning. The dance of Anitra is not so original, and the last movement is vulgar and noisy. As a whole the music of this suite is like unto the gracefully rounded sentences of a speaker who has nothing to say. It is fair theater-music, and while it may be appropriate and effective in the theater, where it accompanies the play, it is out of place when included in the program of a symphony concert.

And the cymbal and the drum delighted the people, and at the end of the fourth number they shouted for joy. At last they were really pleased; at last they heard that which they could understand. And it was as if they said one unto the other, "Come now let us no longer imagine vain things; let us no longer pretend to admire that which wearies us; let us show openly our delight in that which appeals to us and fits our nature. Let us be honest; and let us hear this thing again." Mr. Nikisch, perhaps amused at the preference shown for Barabbas, yielded all too willingly to the people's cry.

Little or no attention was paid to any of the composer's expression-marks in the first movement of the Schumann symphony. It was played with a rush and a bang. The other movements were treated with more respect, and the wonderfully solemn "Religioso" movement was well played. Schumann originally wrote a short explanation of this movement and afterwards struck it out, saying that in the absence of a text the hearers could not indulge in preposterous comparisons.

Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist. His rich and sympathetic voice was under his control: and by his personal magnetism he almost succeeded in making the songs of Dvorak endurable. For songs, with the possible exception of the third, they are not; nor are they dramatically effective if you regard them as a species of recitative. They do not soothe; they do not haunt; they incite hysteria; they suggest, in fact they demand—an anti-spasmodic. The accompaniments, often harsh and at times obtrusive, were played by Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The feature of the Symphony concert Saturday evening was the performance for the first time in this city of the Symphony No. 1, "To the Fatherland," by Raff. It is a long work, and the fourth movement was omitted entirely, but it proved interesting and attractive to the audience, particularly the larghetto and finale. There is almost an entire symphony in the opening number, with its wealth of material and its variety of subjects interwoven the one with the other. The other movements were simpler and not so long, but the wood-wind has some delightful work, and the orchestra was very much in sympathy with the character of the performance. The finale is glorious. The symphony, despite the fact that it was never given in Boston, is a prize composition, Raff having been awarded the first prize in a contest with 32 competitors. It is one of the novelties which Mr. Nikisch is giving us, and the orchestra is beginning to show that the discipline of the conductor is very far from being the nonentity that was claimed for it earlier in the season by some of the disappointed ones. The new conductor is not like Gericke—he is different in every way—and his work with the orchestra is effected after his own manner. This was to have been expected, and it is curious to see Mr. Nikisch's severest critics at the outset taking up with the judgment of those who have been his warm admirers through the season. The other numbers were a prelude, choral and fugue, by Bach-Abert, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March." The fugue under Abert's arrangement was a delightful composition, and this, as well as the Wagner selection, was finely interpreted. Mr. Nikisch used the score, though by no means confined to it, and seems to direct as readily in the one case as the other. At the next concert, Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist and the programme is to be this: Massanet, overture, "Phedre;" Lalo, symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicode, symphonic variations, op. 27; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Three numbers only compose the programme assigned for the concert of this evening, and duly rehearsed yesterday afternoon—the fine and favorite arrangement by Abert of a Bach prelude and fugue, in which the discreet use of the orchestra intensifies and illuminates every effect possible to the organ; Wagner's "Huldigang's" march, which is more noisy and vehement than interesting or gratifying, although of course its author's ingenuity in making so much out of almost nothing always compels admiration; and between these Raff's "In the Fatherland" symphony. In regard to the first and last there is nothing to say except that they were well and properly played, barring some harshness of the lower brass in the original chorale which Abert placed between the prelude and fugue; but the second deserves a different consideration, as being new to Boston. This symphony, begun after peace had been made at Villafranca, in the autumn of 1859, was finished in 1861, and was about to be given to the world in the regular course of publication, when Raff decided to enter it in the competition for a prize offered by a society known as "The Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire." There were thirty-two symphonies sent in, and the board of judges, consisting of five such authorities as Hiller, Reinecke, Volkmann, Lachner, and Ambros, pronounced it best of all. While not desirous that this work should be accounted as "programme music," in the sense in which his "Lenore" is such, Raff still thought it best that the hearer should not be at a disadvantage by having to guess what he meant to convey, and therefore—having the excellent example of Beethoven, in the "Pastoral" symphony, before him—he prepared a brief explanatory preface, which is outlined as follows: The opening allegro indicates the aspiration, the gravity, the gentleness, and the persistency of the German character, each of these phases being suggested by a particular subject, having its individual treatment, while in the course of the development they are combined and contrasted scholastically. The second movement, a very vivacious scherzo, depicts the fondness of the German for out-door life and rural sports; horns and wooden wind now bring to mind the chase and the delights of forest and field, and now a decided volkslied expresses those quieter joys in which maidens as well as young men can participate. The third movement, larghetto, presents the atmosphere of home life by its smooth broad melody set in flowing but still quiet harmonies. The fourth movement, which will not be played, indicates the spirit of German patriotism, by having for its foundation the well-known popular song, "What is the German Fatherland?" The fifth movement shows contrasted feelings; it begins with a larghetto, representing the regret springing from the separation of the great Germany into distinct kingdoms, and concludes with an allegro deciso trionfante, proclaiming the consolations of hope and the prophecies of faith that all will yet be well throughout the land and a new and more glorious unity will succeed. It is not possible to make any detailed comment here and now upon this long and elaborate work, but some few of its characteristics may be indicated. Rich it must necessarily be in melodious themes, devices of instrumentation, and bold, original thematic treatment, and the composer's wealth of resources is particularly shown in the first movement, with its four subjects. The layman will be delighted with the sensuous qualities of the work, while the musician will enjoy the ingenious and yet academic use of the arts of composition. An honorable feature of the work is the reserve which Raff seems to have imposed upon himself, refraining alike from any cloying sweetness of theme or instrumentation and from any excess of splendor when a development has led up to a high climax. The audience of yesterday afternoon seemed to be in doubt as to whether they liked the first two movements, but the beautifully placed third was heartily applauded. The carpers, who have objected to Mr. Nikisch's memory, and the conservative, who feel safer with a book, ought to have been pleased, for he conducted almost entirely from the score.

The announcements made assign to the afternoon of Wednesday, March 5, the second Young People's Popular, with a soloist hereafter to be named, and set down for the regular symphony concert of next week this programme: Massenet, overture, "Phedre;" Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, Symphonic Variations, op. 27, first time at these concerts; Tschaikowski, Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," first time in Boston. Soloist, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette played a programme taken entirely from Beethoven, which consisted of two quartettes—C-minor, opus 18, No. 4, and C-major, opus 59, No. 3—and the pianoforte trio in D, opus 60, No. 1. This was a well-balanced arrangement, and there was contrast enough to give relief although one felt, of course, the atmosphere of the great master about him all the time. Mr. Baermann was the assistant at the pianoforte, and the work of all the artists was a fine exemplification of finished style and sympathetic co-operation.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday — No Soloist.

It was a programme entirely of orchestral music, with no soloist, and considerably more of polyphony than of melody such as could appeal to the public Cerberus. The first number was a Bach Pasticcio made up of a prelude from the well-tempered Clavichord, a chorale by Abert, who is responsible for the whole arrangement, and a fine transcription of the G minor organ fugue. The prelude was well played, but the succeeding chorale was a little too powerfully intoned, although there was a certain charm in the grand sonority of trumpets, horns and trombones. In the fugue the strings bore off the honors and played with inspiring breadth. There is no objection possible to giving Bach in a transcribed state, for even his orchestral works become transcriptions when given by a modern orchestra. It might be a pleasure, however, to hear the old works sometime, under the conditions which attended their original performances, that is, with a small orchestra of some 20 men, and in a hall no larger than Chickering's. Even then the viola pomposo, the oboe d'amore and other obsolete instruments would be lacking, but the result would be more nearly Bach than the heavy scoring which one has in the modern orchestral versions. It was a descent from the ancient fugue to the modern symphony, for Raff was certainly not inspired when he wrote the ultra-patriotic mixture which he called "An das Vaterland." It is prolix and prosy, although I must hasten to say that the audience seemed to disagree with me in the matter, and applauded with the heartiest enthusiasm. Nevertheless the work spoke more of the midnight oil than of the fever of patriotic frenzy, and while presenting Raff's elegant manner in a favorable light, by no means represented the spirit of a mighty nation.

The Huldigungs Marsch which closed the programme was more lofty, although it is by no means a true picture of Wagner's power. In the marches which the great master composed, there is sometimes more of bombast than of inspiration. The Kaiser Marsch is probably to be ranked as the best of the set, and at the least in the introduction of that war cry of the reformation—"A Streng Castle is Our God"—shows a fitness which is not discernable in the others. If we are to have these marches at all it would seem fitting that the Centennial March should sometime grace the programme. It was Mr Gericke's intention to have presented this work at one of the concerts of last season, but the plan never came to fruition. The march is perhaps something of an absurdity, for when Wagner wrote it he knew not a single American tune with which to impart a national color to the work, but it would be as interesting to an American audience as any of the more characteristic works. The march given was played with power and dignity; one might have demanded a better attack in the brass phrases, but the breadth of the reading was undeniable and successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 2, 1890.

Musical Successes in Mr. Nikisch's Latest Programme.

A Bach fugue is not in itself a very inspiring work to the average concert-goer. Even Nikisch's orchestra could not make it very enthralling yesterday, though the number was given with wonderful breadth and fulness of tone. As a clever transcription, Abert's setting forth of Bach's prelude and fugue has, however, a certain interest. A symphony by Roff, new to this public, formed the chief offering at the 15th symphony concert. "To the Fatherland" made a fine impression. On the whole, it seems distinctly more interesting and more brilliant than the symphonies of the seasons by the same distinguished composer that have been heard here. Although it is rather a long work, even with one movement omitted, the interpretation was evidently enjoyed greatly. The larghetto was performed almost faultlessly. Director, as well as musicians, seemed to take a special interest in the symphony. Except for one unfortunate "break" in the horns, there was no blemish upon the performance, which was sympathetic to a degree, the gradations of tone being carried out with consummate skill. Wagner's grandiose "Huldigungs March" closed the programme effectively enough.

At the next concert Massenet's "Phedra" overture will open the programme. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is to perform Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin, the orchestra accompanying. Two interesting works fill out the offering—Nicode's symphonic variations, new to patrons of these concerts, and the overture fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, which will be a novelty in this city.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening:

Prelude, Choral and Fugue.....Bach-Abert
Symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland," op. 96.....Raff
Allegro. Scherzo (allegro molto vivace).
Larghetto. Larghetto sostenuto; un poco lento, quasi andante moderato; allegro deciso trionfante.
(First time in Boston.)
Huldigung's March.....Wagner

Capellmeister Abert's orchestral arrangement of the celebrated G minor organ fugue has been often heard here. It is a very thoughtful and musicianly piece of work, and it is skilfully orchestrated in a manner to emphasize the contrapuntal leading of the voices, and this causes the structure of the fugue to become somewhat clearer to the layman's ear than when played upon the organ. Mr. Nikisch took the time somewhat slower than the average organist would do, but this is not a fault. It was clearly and precisely played. "An das Vaterland" is the title of Raff's first symphony. It bears the opus number 96, but all of Raff's symphonies and larger orchestral works fell in the last twenty years of his life. It is a work to which one listens with very mixed feelings, which might be briefly summed up as follows: The first movement is most interesting to a musician, but the third would give the greatest pleasure to the public at large. The second is dull and colorless, and the last uninteresting and incomprehensible. The opening allegro is certainly a fine movement, fresh, original and brilliantly scored. Raff himself prepared a "programme" for the work, and in it we are informed that "in the first movement the 'tone poet' endeavored to portray in tone pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill and limit them." It is certainly a rather large undertaking to represent all this in absolute music, and, in fact, as is usual with "programme music," the composer fails. The movement is simply an interesting, well-written, melodious allegro, which means whatever one may choose to have it mean. In the second movement, Raff's favorite wind instruments, the horns, have things pretty well their own way, and the listener is expected to see with his imaginative eye "a happy train of young men and maidens singing their native airs as they wander over the smiling fields." Again the music failed properly to illustrate its composer's idea, but the really beautiful and melodious larghetto, with its broad cantabile, might, indeed, be considered to represent "the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by the people through the cultivation of the Muses, through love for wife and children." As it is the last movement, as aforesaid, it is simply incomprehensible, besides being dull. It is long, by no means so effectively scored as the rest of the work, and its themes are rambling and badly worked out. At the close much noise was made by the brass, but the effect of fulness and power was not attained. How different in this respect is the gorgeous Huldigung's March! Here the orchestra, as a means of transmitting music, is sunerbly used, and even if the ideas are somewhat insignificant they are grandly portrayed. It was magnificently played, and again Mr. Nikisch gave new proof of his unusual qualifications for conducting the works of the Bayreuth master. In fact, the orchestra was very fine throughout the whole concert, and all honor is due to both conductor and men. In the next concert Mr. Loeffler will play the beautiful "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, by Lalo, with which he scored a brilliant success some years ago.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was a rather prosy concert, all in all, although one movement of the Raff symphony aroused a degree of enthusiasm in the audience. It began with a Bach prelude and fugue, which is by no means new to musical students, although something of a pasticcio in its present shape. The prelude did not quite carry out Mattheson's rule that "it should be a preparation for the style of the succeeding work," but the chorale for brasses was interesting and well played, and displayed the trumpet to excellent advantage. In the fugue the strings showed excellent balance, and every voice was clear and easily followed. The Raff symphony "To the Fatherland" was about as uninspired a work as this great composer ever gave to the world, and beside the "Lenore" or the "Im Walde" symphonies it sinks into absolute insignificance. It seems artificial all through, and although it brings in a phrase or two of "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland." in the last movement, this is not sufficient to make it absolutely national music. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch" which, although not as great a work as the "Kaiser Marsch," was yet the most inspiring number of the programme. The brasses were in this, not always perfectly together, but none the less gave a brilliant tone, and what with the trumpet fanfares, and the powerful climaxes, the work made a good ending to the programme, although one might have sighed for a little more melody and a less polyphonic style than characterized the entire programme.

[68]

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1890

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Melusina"
Weber.....Romance from "Euryanthe"
Grieg.....Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(First time at these concerts.)
Dvorak.....Songs with Piano
(a) "I chant my Lay."
(b) "Hark, how my Triangle."
(c) "Songs my Mother taught me."
(d) "Cloudy Heights of Tatra daring Falcon haunteth."
Schumann.....Symphony No. 3, in E-flat, op. 97

The charming Melusina overture was roughly handled last Saturday. The mermaid was not wooed with gentle caresses and honeyed words; violent hands were laid upon her, as though she were a woman of the Sabines. Where was the mysterious and dreamy beauty of the opening measures? Who would have thought that Mendelssohn had marked them pianissimo?

And next to Mr. Nikisch, the first clarinet player was chiefly blamable. This gentleman at his first appearance, when he played in the "Rosamunde" music of Schubert, made a very favorable impression. Since the first concert he has steadily worked to remove that impression. We may well be proud of the oboes, flutes and bassoons of the orchestra; but it is not to be denied that the first clarinet is a weaker member.

Nor can the peculiar genius of Mr. Nikisch be seen in his direction of such works as this overture. He seems unhappy unless he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Repose, the quiet beauty of insinuation, delicacy of touch and treatment, these qualities seem abhorrent to his nature. By birth and education his is a theatrical nature; and when he has to deal with the theatrical in music he is admirable, most admirable; but the hot and feverish air of the playhouse soon becomes insupportable.

The suite of Grieg is taken from the music written for the stage version of "Peer Gynt," the extraordinary poem of Ibsen. Of the four numbers, the first and second are musically the most interesting; the second is beautiful, and it was exceedingly well played, for the strings so carefully drilled by Mr. Gericke have not yet lost their cunning. The dance of Anitra is not so original, and the last movement is vulgar and noisy. As a whole the music of this suite is like unto the gracefully rounded sentences of a speaker who has nothing to say. It is fair theater-music, and while it may be appropriate and effective in the theater, where it accompanies the play, it is out of place when included in the program of a symphony concert.

And the cymbal and the drum delighted the people, and at the end of the fourth number they shouted for joy. At last they were really pleased; at last they heard that which they could understand. And it was as if they said one unto the other, "Come now let us no longer imagine vain things; let us no longer pretend to admire that which wearies us; let us show openly our delight in that which appeals to us and fits our nature. Let us be honest; and let us hear this thing again." Mr. Nikisch, perhaps amused at the preference shown for Barabbas, yielded all too willingly to the people's cry.

Little or no attention was paid to any of the composer's expression-marks in the first movement of the Schumann symphony. It was played with a rush and a bang. The other movements were treated with more respect, and the wonderfully solemn "Religioso" movement was well played. Schumann originally wrote a short explanation of this movement and afterwards struck it out, saying that in the absence of a text the hearers could not indulge in preposterous comparisons.

Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist. His rich and sympathetic voice was under his control: and by his personal magnetism he almost succeeded in making the songs of Dvorak endurable. For songs, with the possible exception of the third, they are not; nor are they dramatically effective if you regard them as a species of recitative. They do not soothe; they do not haunt; they incite hysteria; they suggest, in fact they demand—an anti-spasmodic. The accompaniments, often harsh and at times obtrusive, were played by Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The feature of the Symphony concert Saturday evening was the performance for the first time in this city of the Symphony No. 1, "To the Fatherland," by Raff. It is a long work, and the fourth movement was omitted entirely, but it proved interesting and attractive to the audience, particularly the larghetto and finale. There is almost an entire symphony in the opening number, with its wealth of material and its variety of subjects interwoven the one with the other. The other movements were simpler and not so long, but the wood-wind has some delightful work, and the orchestra was very much in sympathy with the character of the performance. The finale is glorious. The symphony, despite the fact that it was never given in Boston, is a prize composition, Raff having been awarded the first prize in a contest with 32 competitors. It is one of the novelties which Mr. Nikisch is giving us, and the orchestra is beginning to show that the discipline of the conductor is very far from being the nonentity that was claimed for it earlier in the season by some of the disappointed ones. The new conductor is not like Gericke—he is different in every way—and his work with the orchestra is effected after his own manner. This was to have been expected, and it is curious to see Mr. Nikisch's severest critics at the outset taking up with the judgment of those who have been his warm admirers through the season. The other numbers were a prelude, choral and fugue, by Bach-Abert, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March." The fugue under Abert's arrangement was a delightful composition, and this, as well as the Wagner selection, was finely interpreted. Mr. Nikisch used the score, though by no means confined to it, and seems to direct as readily in the one case as the other. At the next concert, Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist and the programme is to be this: Massanet, overture, "Phedre;" Lalo, symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, symphonic variations, op. 27; Tschaikowsky, overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Three numbers only compose the programme assigned for the concert of this evening, and duly rehearsed yesterday afternoon—the fine and favorite arrangement by Abert of a Bach prelude and fugue, in which the discreet use of the orchestra intensifies and illuminates every effect possible to the organ; Wagner's "Huldigang's" march, which is more noisy and vehement than interesting or gratifying, although of course its author's ingenuity in making so much out of almost nothing always compels admiration; and between these Raff's "In the Fatherland" symphony. In regard to the first and last there is nothing to say except that they were well and properly played, barring some harshness of the lower brass in the original chorale which Abert placed between the prelude and fugue; but the second deserves a different consideration, as being new to Boston. This symphony, begun after peace had been made at Villafranca, in the autumn of 1859, was finished in 1861, and was about to be given to the world in the regular course of publication, when Raff decided to enter it in the competition for a prize offered by a society known as "The Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire." There were thirty-two symphonies sent in, and the board of judges, consisting of five such authorities as Hiller, Reinecke, Volkmann, Lachner, and Ambros, pronounced it best of all. While not desirous that this work should be accounted as "programme music," in the sense in which his "Lenore" is such, Raff still thought it best that the hearer should not be at a disadvantage by having to guess what he meant to convey, and therefore—having the excellent example of Beethoven, in the "Pastoral" symphony, before him—he prepared a brief explanatory preface, which is outlined as follows: The opening allegro indicates the aspiration, the gravity, the gentleness, and the persistency of the German character, each of these phases being suggested by a particular subject, having its individual treatment, while in the course of the development they are combined and contrasted scholastically. The second movement, a very vivacious scherzo, depicts the fondness of the German for out-door life and rural sports; horns and wooden wind now bring to mind the chase and the delights of forest and field, and now a decided volkslied expresses those quieter joys in which maidens as well as young men can participate. The third movement, larghetto, presents the atmosphere of home life by its smooth broad melody set in flowing but still quiet harmonies. The fourth movement, which will not be played, indicates the spirit of German patriotism, by having for its foundation the well-known popular song, "What is the German Fatherland?" The fifth movement shows contrasted feelings; it begins with a larghetto, representing the regret springing from the separation of the great Germany into distinct kingdoms, and concludes with an allegro deciso trionfante, proclaiming the consolations of hope and the prophecies of faith that all will yet be well throughout the land and a new and more glorious unity will succeed. It is not possible to make any detailed comment here and now upon this long and elaborate work, but some few of its characteristics may be indicated. Rich it must necessarily be in melodious themes, devices of instrumentation, and bold, original thematic treatment, and the composer's wealth of resources is particularly shown in the first movement, with its four subjects. The layman will be delighted with the sensuous qualities of the work, while the musician will enjoy the ingenious and yet academic use of the arts of composition. An honorable feature of the work is the reserve which Raff seems to have imposed upon himself, refraining alike from any cloying sweetness of theme or instrumentation and from any excess of splendor when a development has led up to a high climax. The audience of yesterday afternoon seemed to be in doubt as to whether they liked the first two movements, but the beautifully placed third was heartily applauded. The carpers, who have objected to Mr. Nikisch's memory, and the conservative, who feel safer with a book, ought to have been pleased, for he conducted almost entirely from the score.

The announcements made assign to the afternoon of Wednesday, March 5, the second Young People's Popular, with a soloist hereafter to be named, and set down for the regular symphony concert of next week this programme: Massenet, overture, "Phedre;" Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, Symphonic Variations, op. 27, first time at these concerts; Tschaikowski, Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," first time in Boston. Soloist, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette played a programme taken entirely from Beethoven, which consisted of two quartettes—C-minor, opus 18, No. 4, and C-major, opus 59, No. 3—and the pianoforte trio in D, opus 60, No. 1. This was a well-balanced arrangement, and there was contrast enough to give relief although one felt, of course, the atmosphere of the great master about him all the time. Mr. Baermann was the assistant at the pianoforte, and the work of all the artists was a fine exemplification of finished style and sympathetic co-operation.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday — No Soloist.

It was a programme entirely of orchestral music, with no soloist, and considerably more of polyphony than of melody such as could appeal to the public Cerberus. The first number was a Bach Pasticcio made up of a prelude from the well-tempered Clavichord, a chorale by Abert, who is responsible for the whole arrangement, and a fine transcription of the G minor organ fugue. The prelude was well played, but the succeeding chorale was a little too powerfully intoned, although there was a certain charm in the grand sonority of trumpets, horns and trombones. In the fugue the strings bore off the honors and played with inspiring breadth. There is no objection possible to giving Bach in a transcribed state, for even his orchestral works become transcriptions when given by a modern orchestra. It might be a pleasure, however, to hear the old works sometime, under the conditions which attended their original performances, that is, with a small orchestra of some 20 men, and in a hall no larger than Chickering's. Even then the viola pomposo, the oboe d'amore and other obsolete instruments would be lacking, but the result would be more nearly Bach than the heavy scoring which one has in the modern orchestral versions. It was a descent from the ancient fugue to the modern symphony, for Raff was certainly not inspired when he wrote the ultra-patriotic mixture which he called "An das Vaterland." It is prolix and prosy, although I must hasten to say that the audience seemed to disagree with me in the matter, and applauded with the heartiest enthusiasm. Nevertheless the work spoke more of the midnight oil than of the fever of patriotic frenzy, and while presenting Raff's elegant manner in a favorable light, by no means represented the spirit of a mighty nation.

The Huldigungs Marsch which closed the programme was more lofty, although it is by no means a true picture of Wagner's power. In the marches which the great master composed, there is sometimes more of bombast than of inspiration. The Kaiser Marsch is probably to be ranked as the best of the set, and at the least in the introduction of that war cry of the reformation—"A Strong Castle is Our God"—shows a fitness which is not discernable in the others. If we are to have these marches at all it would seem fitting that the Centennial March should sometime grace the programme. It was Mr Gericke's intention to have presented this work at one of the concerts of last season, but the plan never came to fruition. The march is perhaps something of an absurdity, for when Wagner wrote it he knew not a single American tune with which to impart a national color to the work, but it would be as interesting to an American audience as any of the more characteristic works. The march given was played with power and dignity; one might have demanded a better attack in the brass phrases, but the breadth of the reading was undeniable and successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 2, 1890.

Musical Successes in Mr. Nikisch's Latest Programme.

A Bach fugue is not in itself a very inspiring work to the average concert-goer. Even Nikisch's orchestra could not make it very enthralling yesterday, though the number was given with wonderful breadth and fulness of tone. As a clever transcription, Abert's setting forth of Bach's prelude and fugue has, however, a certain interest. A symphony by Roff, new to this public, formed the chief offering at the 15th symphony concert. "To the Fatherland" made a fine impression. On the whole, it seems distinctly more interesting and more brilliant than the symphonies of the seasons by the same distinguished composer that have been heard here. Although it is rather a long work, even with one movement omitted, the interpretation was evidently enjoyed greatly. The larghetto was performed almost faultlessly. Director, as well as musicians, seemed to take a special interest in the symphony. Except for one unfortunate "break" in the horns, there was no blemish upon the performance, which was sympathetic to a degree, the gradations of tone being carried out with consummate skill. Wagner's grandiose "Huldigungs March" closed the programme effectively enough.

At the next concert Massenet's "Phedra" overture will open the programme. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is to perform Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin, the orchestra accompanying. Two interesting works fill out the offering—Nicodé's symphonic variations, new to patrons of these concerts, and the overture fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, which will be a novelty in this city.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1890.

FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening:

Prelude, Choral and Fugue.....Bach-Abert
Symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland," op. 96.....Raff
Allegro. Scherzo (allegro molto vivace). Larghetto. Larghetto sostenuto; un poco lento, quasi andante moderato; allegro deciso trionfante.
(First time in Boston.)
Huldigung's March.....Wagner

Capellmeister Abert's orchestral arrangement of the celebrated G minor organ fugue has been often heard here. It is a very thoughtful and musicianly piece of work, and it is skilfully orchestrated in a manner to emphasize the contrapuntal leading of the voices, and this causes the structure of the fugue to become somewhat clearer to the layman's ear than when played upon the organ. Mr. Nikisch took the time somewhat slower than the average organist would do, but this is not a fault. It was clearly and precisely played. "An das Vaterland" is the title of Raff's first symphony. It bears the opus number 96, but all of Raff's symphonies and larger orchestral works fell in the last twenty years of his life. It is a work to which one listens with very mixed feelings, which might be briefly summed up as follows: The first movement is most interesting to a musician, but the third would give the greatest pleasure to the public at large. The second is dull and colorless, and the last uninteresting and incomprehensible. The opening allegro is certainly a fine movement, fresh, original and brilliantly scored. Raff himself prepared a "programme" for the work, and in it we are informed that "in the first movement the 'tone poet' endeavored to portray in tone pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill and limit them." It is certainly a rather large undertaking to represent all this in absolute music, and, in fact, as is usual with "programme music," the composer fails. The movement is simply an interesting, well-written, melodious allegro, which means whatever one may choose to have it mean. In the second movement, Raff's favorite wind instruments, the horns, have things pretty well their own way, and the listener is expected to see with his imaginative eye "a happy train of young men and maidens singing their native airs as they wander over the smiling fields." Again the music failed properly to illustrate its composer's idea, but the really beautiful and melodious larghetto, with its broad cantabile, might, indeed, be considered to represent "the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by the people through the cultivation of the Muses, through love for wife and children." As it is the last movement, as aforesaid, it is simply incomprehensible, besides being dull. It is long, by no means so effectively scored as the rest of the work, and its themes are rambling and badly worked out. At the close much noise was made by the brass, but the effect of fulness and power was not attained. How different in this respect is the gorgeous Huldigung's March! Here the orchestra, as a means of transmitting music, is superbly used, and even if the ideas are somewhat insignificant they are grandly portrayed. It was magnificently played, and again Mr. Nikisch gave new proof of his unusual qualifications for conducting the works of the Bayreuth master. In fact, the orchestra was very fine throughout the whole concert, and all honor is due to both conductor and men. In the next concert Mr. Loeffler will play the beautiful "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, by Lalo, with which he scored a brilliant success some years ago.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was a rather prosy concert, all in all, although one movement of the Raff symphony aroused a degree of enthusiasm in the audience. It began with a Bach prelude and fugue, which is by no means new to musical students, although something of a pasticcio in its present shape. The prelude did not quite carry out Mattheson's rule that "it should be a preparation for the style of the succeeding work," but the chorale for brasses was interesting and well played, and displayed the trumpet to excellent advantage. In the fugue the strings showed excellent balance, and every voice was clear and easily followed. The Raff symphony "To the Fatherland" was about as uninspired a work as this great composer ever gave to the world, and beside the "Lenore" or the "Im Walde" symphonies it sinks into absolute insignificance. It seems artificial all through, and although it brings in a phrase or two of "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland," in the last movement, this is not sufficient to make it absolutely national music. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch" which, although not as great a work as the "Kaiser Marsch," was yet the most inspiring number of the programme. The brasses were in this, not always perfectly together, but none the less gave a brilliant tone, and what with the trumpet fanfares, and the powerful climaxes, the work made a good ending to the programme, although one might have sighed for a little more melody and a less polyphonic style than characterized the entire programme.

[69]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night consisted of the Bach Abert Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue; Raff's first symphony "An das Vaterland," and Wagner's "Huldigungs" March. The masterly transcription that opened the performances has been heard at these concerts before, but not in so spirited and so impressive a reading as was accorded it last night. The Wagner March has also had previous hearings at the same concerts, and the more one becomes acquainted with it the flimsier its pomp, and the more vulgar its pretentiousness appear. It was brilliantly given and with great clearness and beauty of color, but its novelty has worn off and there is nothing left to give it a permanent interest. The symphony had its first performance here on this occasion. It is a very long work, and except in its fluent and ingenious use of contrapuntal devices, and its masterly orchestration, does not bear much resemblance to its composer's other symphonies. It is also distinct from his later symphonies in that it never sinks to the reckless moments of common-place that too often disfigure them; but it is also not as warm in its melodies and not as fresh and pleasing in general effect as are these. The work is so long and so complex that it is not easy to do it justice on a first hearing, even if we had the space at our command to attempt it. The slow movement, and the larghetto that introduces the finale are very beautiful and made themselves understood at once, but the opening and closing allegros are more involved and are not quite clear on a single hearing. It was made fully manifest, however, that the work will repay better acquaintance, and we trust it may appear again in one of this season's programmes, though we doubt if it will ever meet with the appreciation that attends the "Im Wald" Symphony, and what is finest in the "Lenore" Symphony. There is certainly nothing in it that attains to the beauty of the andante of the latter work, or to the masterly play of harmony and of instrumentation that marks the opening allegro of the same symphony. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Phedre" Massanet; Symphony Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Lalo; Symphonic Variations, op. 27, Nicodè, (first time); Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky, (first time). Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist.

Musical Notes.

The third concert of this season's series by the Kneise Quartet took place in Union Hall on Monday evening There was a large audience, and very much applause. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann, who was welcomed with great heartiness on his first appearance since his recent illness. The programme was devoted wholly to Beethoven, and consisted of the quartet in C minor, op. 18; the piano trio in D, op. 70, and the quartet in C, op. 59. The playing of the organization, which has achieved so much under Mr Kneisel's conscientious and able direction, was of exceptional beauty and finish. The contrasting characters of the two string quartets were admirably emphasized, and the readings were clean cut, true and keenly sympathetic down to the slightest details. Especially noticeable was the discreet and artistic balance of tone preserved by the players, to say nothing of the clearness, precision and delightful coloring that gave a charming distinction to their work. In the great trio, heard here but too seldom, Mr. Baermann again manifested to the full his masterly powers, and that deep artistic sentiment, which is an instinct with him and is so finely manifested in his performance of ensemble chamber music, in which, the piano, as treated by him, always falls into its due place as part of a well-balanced and self-consistent whole instead of obtruding itself to give the player prominence to the misrepresentation of the music. Loyalty to the composer is one of Mr. Baermann's many artistic virtues, and to this end he causes himself to disappear as completely as possible. Mr. Kneisel played exquisitely in this trio, and Mr. Hekking's work was of the highest merit. Nothing more perfect has been heard here this season than the reading and performance of this work.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert was:

Bach-Abert: Prelude, Choral and Fugue.
Raff. Symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland," op. 93.
Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.

Not a very interesting concert, in spite of excellent playing by the orchestra. Abert's grand show-piece, based upon a prelude and the great G minor fugue of Bach, seems rather an inexcusable bit of work. It would, perhaps, be a little less aggravating if Abert had had the grace to set forth plainly in black and white that what he calls the "choral" is not by Bach at all, but something of the psalm-tune sort hatched upon the G minor fugue by his own incubation. When composers set to work to write what is known as a "fugue with chora'," they usually begin by selecting a fixed choral melody, and then write a fugue around it; this requires no little musical learning, skill and inventiveness. But to do what Abert has done, to pick out a series of long notes that will go together with a corresponding number of measures of an already written fugue, without making fifths or octaves, and then call it a choral, requires next to no skill at all. The whole business comes from that passion some men have for cooking up reputable classic compositions with a grandiose sauce, and making them sound very tremendous indeed. One would have thought that Bach's G minor fugue, of all things in the world, was quite well enough to be let alone, and far too good to be thus spiked on a bogus psalm-tune.

Considering the noise that Raff's "Vaterland" symphony made when it came out in Germany in 1863, one rather wonders at our so long escaping hearing it here. It was written for a prize offered by the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, and won it over thirty-two competitors—one shudders to think of what those thirty-two other symphonies must have been. For one thing, Raff's work bears all the well-known marks of a prize symphony; there are parts of considerable skill in it that should, of themselves, have insured a prize; rarely has Raff shown himself more easily and melodiously learned. The trouble with it is, not the lack, but the inveterably weak and commonplace character of the inspiration. When Moszkowski, in his suite, "Les Nations," made the "Germany" movement reflect the peculiar characteristics of the Franz Abt ballad, we always thought that this was a sly stroke of Slavic humor on his part; as any good Russian might be tempted to show up Germany at her worst. But here is Raff, a German himself, actually dedicating to his Vaterland a slow movement which, contrapuntal elaboration apart, is of precisely the same character—a very Bänkelsänger's paradise! Upon the whole, one can say of this symphony that it is admirably calculated for one thing: for winning a prize; and after it had done this, its mission ought to have been considered as fulfilled, and nobody more have been asked of it. Wagner's Huldigungs-March, superbly played by the orchestra, was the one inspiring thing of the evening.

The next programme is: Massenet, overture to "Phedre"; Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, symphonic variations, op. [illegible] Tschaikowski, overture-fantasy, "Romeo [illegible] C. M. Loeffler will be the so-

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Programme and Performance at the Fifteenth Concert Last Evening.

Raff's first symphony, "In the Fatherland," occupied most of the time at the usual concert in Music hall last evening, and was also heard for the first time.

It is an elaborate and skillfully made work, but mainly admirable on account of its being, in a technical sense, a symphony. Each theme of the opening allegro is well conceived, and ably treated, but as a whole the movement is too deeply involved in scholasticism, and is altogether too prolix to be thoroughly enjoyed. In the second movement, a scherzo, the tonality brightens, and there is a complete and refreshing change of mood, which fairly awakens one from the inevitable somnolency that the opening allegro cannot have failed to occasion. The most beautiful portion of the symphony is its third movement, the larghetto which is a thoroughly musical conception, and no less melodious than charmingly scored. The next movement of the work is an allegro drammaticco, the melodic basis of which is with a familiar folk song, the treatment of which is no less effective and inspiring than thoroughly commendable. The finale of the work opens with a somewhat tumid introduction, followed by a brief yet charming andante the whole culminating in a most grandiloquent and sensational allegro. Thus ends a symphony, which while not taking rank with the most important works of its class, is at least conspicuous as the production of a highly gifted and masterly musician.

The remaining works on the programme were the Bach-Albert prelude choral and fugue and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

The orchestral service of the concert was at no time so praiseworthy as with the larghetto of the symphony. Here is an abundance of individual writing for the various instruments, none of which were so charmingly heard as Mr. Hekking's 'cello. Mr. Nikisch was notably sympathetic in his reading of the work, and his interpretation of the entire programme was as wholly characteristic of his most musical mood as it was admirable.

The programme for the next concert will be entirely devoted to modern composers—Massenet, Lalo, Nicodé and Tschaikowski. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The programme for the third concert of the season by the Kneisel quartette, in Union hall, on Monday evening, was religiously confined to the works of Beethoven, as follows:

Quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 3.
Pianoforte Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1.
Quartette in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

How long the concert really was could not have been realized by the very large audience in attendance, which, considering the severity of the programme, was a remarkably attentive one.

Perhaps the most satisfactory playing of the evening was with the trio, Mr. Carl Baermann being pianist, with Messrs. Kneisel, violin, and Mr. Hekking, 'cello. Here all three artists were unimpeachably in the right mood, being no less zealously painstaking than constantly successful in maintaining a flawless ensemble. Mr. Baermann's influence, as usual, appeared to incite his colleagues to their best efforts, and his playing was in every respect worthy of his enviable reputation as an artist and interpreter.

Beethoven's C minor quartette did not bring out the very best efforts of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Hekking, but it would seem ungrateful to find fault and be overcritical when much of the playing was really beyond reproach.

With the quartette in C major the concert came to a brilliant close, all four artists doing some of their very ablest work of the season.

The fourth concert will take place Feb. 24.

NEW HAVEN EVEN

THE REGISTER.

FEBRUARY 3.

HYPERION THEATER. | Monday Evening | FEB. 10.

LAST CONCERT BUT ONE BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH CONDUCTOR.

ACCOMPANIED BY

MLLE. CLEMENTINE DE VERE,

The celebrated operatic Prima Donna Soprano.

A choice program, including the Schumann Symphony in D minor.

Tickets now ready at Steinert's Music store.

fs 2au7d C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The next Boston symphony concert will take place at the Hyperion next Monday evening. The program will be varied from those in the former concerts.

Boston Evening Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

Raff's Prize Symphony.

A Wagner Calendar—Two Specimens of English Humor.

Notes, News and Negations—Paragraphs—Nuggets.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert was:

Bach-Abert. Prelude, choral and fugue.
Raff. Symphony No. 1, "An das Vateland," op. 96.
I. Allegro.
II. Scherzo (Allegro molto vivace).
III. Larghetto.
V. Larghetto sostenuto; Un poco lento, quasi Andante moderato; Allegoro deciso trionfante.
(First time in Boston.)
Wagner. Huldigung's March.

Abert's transcription is one of the best of its kind. To publish the beauties of Bach's finest fugue by means of the full orchestra is a commendable act, and when the result is as fine as in the present instance a real addition to the best concert music accrues. If one is inclined to consider the "artistic verities," the short chorale for full brass choir, afterwards used against the free running fugue, marks the only point of debate.

The slow movement in Raff's "German" symphony may not of itself be sufficient to keep alive the whole work, which is inordinately long and unequally made, but the work ought to live for the sake of the lovely larghetto. The symphony is accompanied by a "programme" wherein the composer defines the meaning he wished the several movements to convey. Briefly stated in the preface it reads:

In the first movement, the "tone-poet" endeavored to portray in tone-pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill, and limit them. In the second movement, to the music of the horns, the hearer follows the chase with German men in German forests; he joins the happy train of young men and maidens as, singing their native airs, they wander over the smiling fields. In the third movement, the composer asks you to tarry by the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by his people through the cultivation of the muses, through love for wife and children. Now the composer, leaving these joyful scenes, casts his eye upon another side of German life. In the fifth movement he does not attempt to stifle the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united Fatherland. But Hope, the consoler, takes him by the hand, and, filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity.

Mr. Nikisch omitted a fourth movement, which is the musician's picture of the united Fatherland. The work as played was interesting; the first movement is a good though not one of the best examples of Raff's fine musicianship employed in the treatment of themes, and the subjects themselves are well chosen. Less can be said in praise of the last movement, which borders on the inartistic. Raff is simply a genius in his use of color, and this, his first symphony, contains the germs of what came to a glowing fruition in the later works, the "Im Walde" and "Lenore" symphonies.

In the scherzo there is much in the instrumentation to admire. It is a picture of home life Raff draws in the larghetto. The music is not feverish with discontent, there is no wine, or hot words, or cruel taunt, or disloyalty of any kind; it is serene, tranquil and beautiful. Of how many homes about us is it a mirror? Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for playing the symphony. Wagner's sumptuously scored and splendidly effective "Kaiser March" was played magnificently. There was much to admire in the playing of the orchestra throughout the concert. The next programme, with Mr. Loeffler as soloist, is distinctively modern: Massenet, overture, "Phedre;" Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, symphonic variations, op. 27 (first time at these concerts); Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet" (first time in Boston).

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1890.

——The third Nikisch concert takes place next Tuesday evening at Steinway Hall.

——Mr. Nikisch gave as his program for last Saturday night's concert in Music Hall, Boston, the Bach-Albert prelude, chorale and fugue; the symphony "To the Fatherland," Raff, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1890.

CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

The fourth Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large and fashionable audience of Cambridge citizens and Harvard students to Sanders Theatre last night. Mr. Anton Hepping was the soloist of the evening. In one of the soli, the "Elfin Dance," Mr. Nikisch, himself, played the accompaniment, Mr. Hepping was twice recalled.

By far the most taking number of the evening was Grieg's quaint and odd suite, "Peer Gynt." The last portion of this, the scene in the halls of the King of the Dovre mountains, was rendered by the orchestra with great strength and exactness. In response to long-continued applause Mr. Nikisch repeated the selection. It was the first time in the history of the Cambridge concerts for the orchestra to repeat a selection in response to the evident wishes of the audience. Judged by the enthusiasm shown, the concert, was perhaps, the most successful of the present season.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, FEB. 7.

Symphony in Sanders Theatre.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert in the Cambridge series at Sanders Theatre last night before a large audience. The programme included a larger number of selections than usual, and gave genuine satisfaction. The feature of the concert was the admirable execution of Mr. Anton Hekking on the violoncello.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for tonight begins with a work new to Boston—Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasty, "Romeo and Juliet," delightfully played yesterday afternoon and received with great favor. It is put forward by the author without any prologue, and it moves on for twenty minutes with but a single break—this being a momentary pause just before the conclusion—and its effects depend even more upon the changing values of the orchestral treatment, and upon subordinate nuances of side-light, suggestion and reflective comment than upon many wide contrasts of theme. While listeners will interpret differently, at least in regard to minor details, there will probably be a general agreement that it represents the phases of the emotional side of the tragedy rather than any incidents. It opens broodingly and dreamily, half-sadly indeed, the sentiment being presented under different aspects, but in one atmosphere. Then follows an awakening episode which leads to a long passage of highly excited character, boding turbulence and brawl and moral antagonism, culminating in a bitter crash. Then a depressed and gloomy mood succeeds, out of which grow sweet and consolatory pages, yet tinged with unrest and gloom, like the fateful days of the brief love clouded with fear and opposition. Next, as if it were the day of Romeo's banishment, come back the strains of conflict, rising into a movement that suggests the march of a relentless fate, sweeping down furious and persistent. Melancholy and dolorous is the music which comes now, stressful and distressful, and then, to close the story, comes a monody, half sad, half hopeful, almost ecclesiastical at times, but ending with a roll of drums like a salvo of honor to brave and noble dead. The general temper of the fantasy is sad: for although it paints the energy of battle and suggests the peace of love, it gives no sounds of festivity or of jubilant and undoubting joy. It is rich in color, but it is a pensive richness contributed by melodies in the deeper strings, solemn basses and serene or impressive harmonies of the lower wooden wind. There is reserve in the writing throughout, and even the most contentious passages suggest rather the flurry of feud than the abiding animosity of deliberate battle. It is poetic and can hardly fail to give a higher opinion of its author as an orchestral writer than any previous extract from his writings. Mr. Loeffler comes next with a repetition of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which he introduced about two years ago and which sets forth so well the various aspects of this artist's delicate, refined and loftily sentimental style. Yesterday afternoon he played it all so exquisitely that none could have desired to transfer it to Sarasate, for whom it was written, and unstinted applause rewarded each movement. Next in order comes a set of symphonic variations, twelve in number, by Nicodé, with a prelude and finale, upon a broad, grave theme, and dedicated to Brahms. There is much variety in the tempi and in the instrumentation, solo voices not infrequently standing out from the warp and woof of the orchestral web, and the whole forming a work worthy of its dedication. The last number is Massenet's bold and emphatic "Phedre" overture, tragic, pathetic and picturesque by turns.

There will be no concert on Saturday evening next, but on the 21st and 22nd instant, this programme will be given: Weber, overture, "Oberon"; Liszt, piano concerto in A major, No. 2; Stanford C. Villiers, symphony, "Irish," (first time in Boston). Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

[69]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night consisted of the Bach Abert Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue; Raff's first symphony "An das Vaterland," and Wagner's "Huldigungs" March. The masterly transcription that opened the performances has been heard at these concerts before, but not in so spirited and so impressive a reading as was accorded it last night. The Wagner March has also had previous hearings at the same concerts, and the more one becomes acquainted with it the flimsier its pomp, and the more vulgar its pretentiousness appear. It was brilliantly given and with great clearness and beauty of color, but its novelty has worn off and there is nothing left to give it a permanent interest. The symphony had its first performance here on this occasion. It is a very long work, and except in its fluent and ingenious use of contrapuntal devices, and its masterly orchestration, does not bear much resemblance to its composer's other symphonies. It is also distinct from his later symphonies in that it never sinks to the reckless moments of common-place that too often disfigure them; but it is also not as warm in its melodies and not as fresh and pleasing in general effect as are these. The work is so long and so complex that it is not easy to do it justice on a first hearing, even if we had the space at our command to attempt it. The slow movement, and the larghetto that introduces the finale are very beautiful and made themselves understood at once, but the opening and closing allegros are more involved and are not quite clear on a single hearing. It was made fully manifest, however, that the work will repay better acquaintance, and we trust it may appear again in one of this season's programmes, though we doubt if it will ever meet with the appreciation that attends the "Im Wald" Symphony, and what is finest in the "Lenore" Symphony. There is certainly nothing in it that attains to the beauty of the andante of the latter work, or to the masterly play of harmony and of instrumentation that marks the opening allegro of the same symphony. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Phedre" Massanet; Symphony Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Lalo; Symphonic Variations, op. 27, Nicodè, (first time); Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky, (first time). Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist.

Musical Notes.

The third concert of this season's series by the Kneise Quartet took place in Union Hall on Monday evening There was a large audience, and very much applause. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Carl Baermann, who was welcomed with great heartiness on his first appearance since his recent illness. The programme was devoted wholly to Beethoven, and consisted of the quartet in C minor, op. 18; the piano trio in D, op. 70, and the quartet in C, op. 59 The playing of the organization, which has achieved so much under Mr Kneisel's conscientious and able direction, was of exceptional beauty and finish. The contrasting characters of the two string quartets were admirably emphasized, and the readings were clean cut, true and keenly sympathetic down to the slightest details. Especially noticeable was the discreet and artistic balance of tone preserved by the players, to say nothing of the clearness, precision and delightful coloring that gave a charming distinction to their work. In the great trio, heard here but too seldom, Mr. Baermann again manifested to the full his masterly powers, and that deep artistic sentiment, which is an instinct with him and is so finely manifested in his performance of ensemble chamber music, in which, the piano, as treated by him, always falls into its due place as part of a well-balanced and self-consistent whole instead of obtruding itself to give the player prominence to the misrepresentation of the music. Loyalty to the composer is one of Mr. Baermann's many artistic virtues, and to this end he causes himself to disappear as completely as possible. Mr. Kneisel played exquisitely in this trio, and Mr. Hekking's work was of the highest merit. Nothing more perfect has been heard here this season than the reading and performance of this work.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert was:

Bach-Abert: Prelude, Choral and Fugue.
Raff: Symphony No. 1, "An das Vaterland," op. 96.
Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.

Not a very interesting concert, in spite of excellent playing by the orchestra. Abert's grand show-piece, based upon a prelude and the great G minor fugue of Bach, seems rather an inexcusable bit of work. It would, perhaps, be a little less aggravating if Abert had had the grace to set forth plainly in black and white that what he calls the "choral" is not by Bach at all, but something of the psalm-tune sort hatched upon the G minor fugue by his own incubation. When composers set to work to write what is known as a "fugue with chora'," they usually begin by selecting a fixed choral melody, and then write a fugue around it; this requires no little musical learning, skill and inventiveness. But to do what Abert has done, to pick out a series of long notes that will go together with a corresponding number of measures of an already written fugue, without making fifths or octaves, and then call it a choral, requires next to no skill at all. The whole business comes from that passion some men have for cooking up reputable classic compositions with a grandiose sauce, and making them sound very tremendous indeed. One would have thought that Bach's G minor fugue, of all things in the world, was quite well enough to be let alone, and far too good to be thus spiked on a bogus psalm-tune.

Considering the noise that Raff's "Vaterland" symphony made when it came out in Germany in 1863, one rather wonders at our so long escaping hearing it here. It was written for a prize offered by the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, and won it over thirty-two competitors—one shudders to think of what those thirty-two other symphonies must have been. For one thing, Raff's work bears all the well-known marks of a prize symphony; there are parts of it where contrapuntal skill in it that should, of themselves, have insured a prize; rarely has Raff shown himself more easily and melodiously learned. The trouble with it is, not the lack, but the inveterably weak and commonplace character of the inspiration. When Moszkowski, in his suite, "Les Nations," made the "Germany" movement reflect the peculiar characteristics of the Franz Abt ballad, we always thought that this was a sly stroke of Slavic humor on his part; as any good Russian might be tempted to show up Germany at her worst. But here is Raff, a German himself, actually dedicating to his Vaterland a slow movement which, contrapuntal elaboration apart, is of precisely the same character—a very Bänkelsänger's paradise! Upon the whole, one can say of this symphony that it is admirably calculated for one thing: for winning a prize; and after it had done this, its mission ought to have been considered as fulfilled, and nothing more have been asked of it. Wagner's Huldigungs-March, superbly played by the orchestra, was the one inspiring thing of the evening.

The next programme is: Massenet, overture to "Phedre"; Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, symphonic variations, op. 27; Tschaikowski, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Programme and Performance at the Fifteenth Concert Last Evening.

Raff's first symphony, "In the Fatherland," occupied most of the time at the usual concert in Music hall last evening, and was also heard for the first time.

It is an elaborate and skillfully made work, but mainly admirable on account of its being, in a technical sense, a symphony. Each theme of the opening allegro is well conceived, and ably treated, but as a whole the movement is too deeply involved in scholasticism, and is altogether too prolix to be thoroughly enjoyed. In the second movement, a scherzo, the tonality brightens, and there is a complete and refreshing change of mood, which fairly awakens one from the inevitable somnolency that the opening allegro cannot have failed to occasion. The most beautiful portion of the symphony is its third movement, the larghetto which is a thoroughly musical conception, and no less melodious than charmingly scored. The next movement of the work is an allegro drammaticco, the melodic basis of which is with a familiar folk song, the treatment of which is no less effective and inspiring than thoroughly commendable. The finale of the work opens with a somewhat tumid introduction, followed by a brief yet charming andante the whole culminating in a most grandiloquent and sensational allegro. Thus ends a symphony, which while not taking rank with the most important works of its class, is at least conspicuous as the production of a highly gifted and masterly musician.

The remaining works on the programme were the Bach-Albert prelude choral and fugue and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

The orchestral service of the concert was at no time so praiseworthy as with the larghetto of the symphony. Here is an abundance of individual writing for the various instruments, none of which were so charmingly heard as Mr. Hekking's 'cello. Mr. Nikisch was notably sympathetic in his reading of the work, and his interpretation of the entire programme was as wholly characteristic of his most musical mood as it was admirable.

The programme for the next concert will be entirely devoted to modern composers—Massenet, Lalo, Nicodé and Tschaikowski. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The programme for the third concert of the season by the Kneisel quartette, in Union hall, on Monday evening, was religiously confined to the works of Beethoven, as follows:

Quartette in C minor, op. 18, No. 3.
Pianoforte Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1.
Quartette in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

How long the concert really was could not have been realized by the very large audience in attendance, which, considering the severity of the programme, was a remarkably attentive one.

Perhaps the most satisfactory playing of the evening was with the trio, Mr. Carl Baermann being pianist, with Messrs. Kneisel, violin, and Mr. Hekking, 'cello. Here all three artists were unimpeachably in the right mood, being no less zealously painstaking than constantly successful in maintaining a flawless ensemble. Mr. Baermann's influence, as usual, appeared to incite his colleagues to their best efforts, and his playing was in every respect worthy of his enviable reputation as an artist and interpreter.

Beethoven's C minor quartette did not bring out the very best efforts of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Hekking, but it would seem ungrateful to find fault and be overcritical when much of the playing was really beyond reproach.

With the quartette in C major the concert came to a brilliant close, all four artists doing some of their very ablest work of the season.

The fourth concert will take place Feb. 24.

NEW HAVEN EVEN

THE REGISTER.

FEBRUARY 3.

HYPERION THEATER. | Monday Evening | FEB. 10.

LAST CONCERT BUT ONE BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH CONDUCTOR.

ACCOMPANIED BY

MLLE. CLEMENTINE DE VERE,

The celebrated operatic Prima Donna Soprano.

A choice program, including the Schumann Symphony in D minor.

Tickets now ready at Steinert's Music store.

f2 2su7d C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The next Boston symphony concert will take place at the Hyperion next Monday evening. The program will be varied from those in the former concerts.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1890.

SINGLE COPIES THREE CENTS.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.
Raff's Prize Symphony.

A Wagner Calendar—Two Specimens of English Humor.

Notes, News and Negations—Paragraphs—Nuggets.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert was:

Bach-Abert. Prelude, choral and fugue.
Raff. Symphony No. 1, "An das Vateland," op. 96.
I. Allegro.
II. Scherzo (Allegro molto vivace).
III. Larghetto.
V. Larghetto sostenuto: Un poco lento, quasi Andante moderato; Allegoro deciso trionfante.
(First time in Boston.)
Wagner. Huldigung's March.

Abert's transcription is one of the best of its kind. To publish the beauties of Bach's finest fugue by means of the full orchestra is a commendable act, and when the result is as fine as in the present instance a real addition to the best concert music accrues. If one is inclined to consider the "artistic verities," the short chorale for full brass choir, afterwards used against the free running fugue, marks the only point of debate.

The slow movement in Raff's "German" symphony may not of itself be sufficient to keep alive the whole work, which is inordinately long and unequally made, but the work ought to live for the sake of the lovely larghetto. The symphony is accompanied by a "programme" wherein the composer defines the meaning he wished the several movements to convey. Briefly stated in the preface it reads:

In the first movement, the "tone-poet" endeavored to portray in tone-pictures the free and towering flight, the background of deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance—these important forces which, in the natural disposition of the Germans, assist, fill, and limit them. In the second movement, to the music of the horns, the hearer follows the chase with German men in German forests; he joins the happy train of young men and maidens as, singing their native airs, they wander over the smiling fields. In the third movement, the composer asks you to tarry by the domestic hearth, glorified and made illustrious by his people through the cultivation of the muses, through love for wife and children. Now the composer, leaving these joyful scenes, casts his eye upon another side of German life. In the fifth movement he does not attempt to stifle the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united Fatherland. But Hope, the consoler, takes him by the hand, and, filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity.

Mr. Nikisch omitted a fourth movement, which is the musician's picture of the united Fatherland. The work as played was interesting; the first movement is a good though not one of the best examples of Raff's fine musicianship employed in the treatment of themes, and the subjects themselves are well chosen. Less can be said in praise of the last movement, which borders on the inartistic. Raff is simply a genius in his use of color, and this, his first symphony, contains the germs of what came to a glowing fruition in the later works, the "Im Walde" and "Lenore" symphonies.

In the scherzo there is much in the instrumentation to admire. It is a picture of home life Raff draws in the larghetto. The music is not feverish with discontent, there is no wine, or hot words, or cruel taunt, or disloyalty of any kind; it is serene, tranquil and beautiful. Of how many homes about us is it a mirror? Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for playing the symphony. Wagner's sumptuously scored and splendidly effective "Kaiser March" was played magnificently. There was much to admire in the playing of the orchestra throughout the concert. The next programme, with Mr. Loeffler as soloist, is distinctively modern: Massenet, overture, "Phèdre;" Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Nicodé, symphonic variations, op. 27 (first time at these concerts); Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet" (first time in Boston).

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1890.

——The third Nikisch concert takes place next Tuesday evening at Steinway Hall.

——Mr. Nikisch gave as his program for last Saturday night's concert in Music Hall, Boston, the Bach-Albert prelude, chorale and fugue; the symphony "To the Fatherland," Raff, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1890.

CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

The fourth Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large and fashionable audience of Cambridge citizens and Harvard students to Sanders Theatre last night. Mr. Anton Hepping was the soloist of the evening. In one of the soli, the "Elfin Dance," Mr. Nikisch, himself, played the accompaniment, Mr. Hepping was twice recalled.

By far the most taking number of the evening was Grieg's quaint and odd suite, "Peer Gynt." The last portion of this, the scene in the halls of the king of the Dovre mountains, was rendered by the orchestra with great strength and exactness. In response to long-continued applause Mr. Nikisch repeated the selection. It was the first time in the history of the Cambridge concerts for the orchestra to repeat a selection in response to the evident wishes of the audience. Judged by the enthusiasm shown, the concert, was perhaps, the most successful of the present season.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, FEB. 7.

Symphony in Sanders Theatre.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert in the Cambridge series at Sanders Theatre last night before a large audience. The programme included a larger number of selections than usual, and gave genuine satisfaction. The feature of the concert was the admirable execution of Mr. Anton Hekking on the violoncello.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

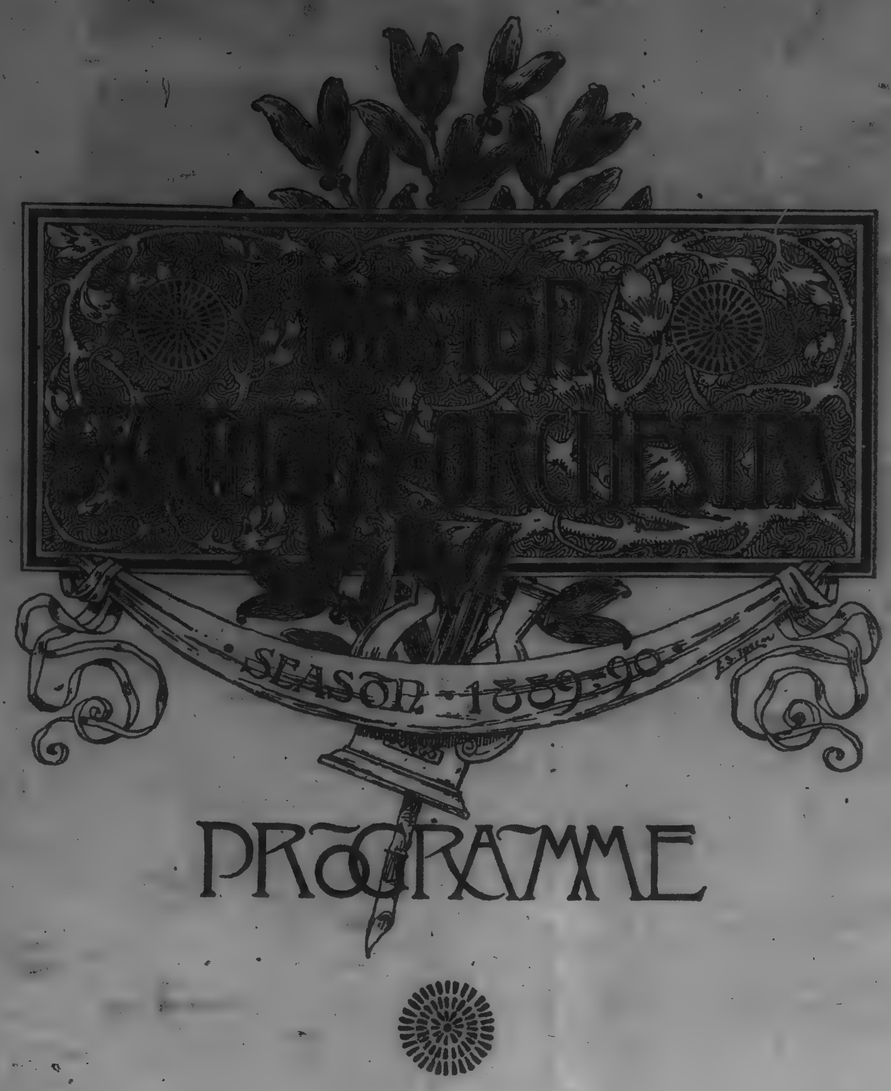
The programme for tonight begins with a work new to Boston—Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasty, "Romeo and Juliet," delightfully played yesterday afternoon and received with great favor. It is put forward by the author without any prologue and it moves on for twenty minutes with but a single break—this being a momentary pause just before the conclusion—and its effects depend even more upon the changing values of the orchestral treatment, and upon subordinate nuances of side-light, suggestion and reflective comment than upon many wide contrasts of theme. While listeners will interpret differently, at least in regard to minor details, there will probably be a general agreement that it represents the phases of the emotional side of the tragedy rather than any incidents. It opens broodingly and dreamily, half-sadly indeed, the sentiment being presented under different aspects, but in one atmosphere. Then follows an awakening episode which leads to a long passage of highly excited character, boding turbulence and brawl and moral antagonism, culminating in a bitter crash. Then a depressed and gloomy mood succeeds, out of which grow sweet and consolatory pages, yet tinged with unrest and gloom, like the fateful days of the brief love clouded with fear and opposition. Next, as if it were the day of Romeo's banishment, come back the strains of conflict, rising into a movement that suggests the march of a relentless fate, sweeping down furious and persistent. Melancholy and dolorous is the music which comes now, stressful and distressful, and then, to close the story, comes a monody, half sad, half hopeful, almost ecclesiastical at times, but ending with a roll of drums like a salvo of honor to brave and noble dead. The general temper of the fantasy is sad: for although it paints the energy of battle and suggests the peace of love, it gives no sounds of festivity or of jubilant and undoubting joy. It is rich in color, but it is a pensive richness contributed by melodies in the deeper strings, solemn basses and serene or impressive harmonies of the lower wooden wind. There is reserve in the writing throughout, and even the most contentious passages suggest rather the flurry of feud than the abiding animosity of deliberate battle. It is poetic and can hardly fail to give a higher opinion of its author as an orchestral writer than any previous extract from his writings. Mr. Loeffler comes next with a repetition of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which he introduced about two years ago and which sets forth so well the various aspects of this artist's delicate, refined and loftily sentimental style. Yesterday afternoon he played it all so exquisitely that none could have desired to transfer it to Sarasate, for whom it was written, and unstinted applause rewarded each movement. Next in order comes a set of symphonic variations, twelve in number, by Nicodé, with a prelude and finale, upon a broad, grave theme, and dedicated to Brahms. There is much variety in the tempi and in the instrumentation, solo voices not infrequently standing out from the warp and woof of the orchestral web, and the whole forming a work worthy of its dedication. The last number is Massenet's bold and emphatic "Phedre" overture, tragic, pathetic and picturesque by turns.

There will be no concert on Saturday evening next, but on the 21st and 22nd instant, this programme will be given: Weber, overture, "Oberon"; Liszt, piano concerto in A-major, No. 2; Stanford C. Villiers, symphony, "Irish," (first time in Boston). Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.



PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolan."
SAINT-SAENS.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 33. Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.—Allegro non troppo.
GRIEG.	SUITE. "Peer Gynt." DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
CHOPIN.	a) NOCTURNE.
MASSENET.	b) MELODIE.
POPPER.	c) ELFIN DANCE.
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

The Pianoforte used is a Steinway.

CRITERION COURSE.

(NINTH NIGHT.)

MECHANICS HALL.

Thursday Evening, February 6th, 1890, at 8.

GRAND

English Ballad

CONCERT.

ARTISTS:

Mrs. LOUISE BALDWIN POWERS.
Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS.
Mr. J. C. BARTLETT.
Mr. D. M. BABCOCK.
Mr. FRITZ GIESE.
Mr. LEON KEACH.

Programme.

MADRIGAL. "Down in a Flow'ry Vale." (15th Century.)	Festa
ARIA. "Burst ye, Apple Buds." MRS. POWERS.	Emery
SOLO for VIOLONCELLO. "Le Desir." MR. GIESE.	Servais
BALLAD. "It was a Dream." MR. J. C. BARTLETT.	Robyn
BALLAD. "He roamed in the Forest." MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.	O'Leary
FOUR PART SONG. "How sweet the Moonlight sleeps."	Leslie
SONG. "The mighty Deep." MR. D. M. BABCOCK.	Jude
DUETS. a) "From far away." b) "Flight of Clouds." c) "Nearest and Dearest." MISS EDMANDS and MR. BARTLETT.	Folk Songs
SOLO for VIOLONCELLO. "Album Leaf." MR. GIESE.	Vieuxtemps
SONG. "She wandered down the Mountain side." MRS. POWERS.	Clay
TRIO. "Turn on, old Time." MISS EDMANDS, MR. BARTLETT and MR. BABCOCK.	Wallace
QUARTET. "Come, Dorothy, Come."	Folk Song

Thursday, February 20th, Closing Concert of the Criterion Course. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, accompanied by HERR RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Piano used is a Steinway, from the Warerooms of Mess. C. L. Gorham & Co.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER
AY FEBRUARY 4, 1

The Brilliant Artiste Who is to Appear at the Next Symphony Concert.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, the gifted operatic soprano, has recently returned from a western tour with Gilmore's band, as the leading star of a company of soloists selected by the famous bandmaster to accompany him. Her success brought her so many offers that she declined an engagement tendered her by Mr. Abbey to support Patti in the season of Italian opera now progressing in Mexico. Mlle. De Vere will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion next Monday evening and will contribute to the program some of her most brilliant operatic arias.

FEBRUARY 5.

There has been a good sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and the prospects are there will be a large audience. This concert will be one of the best of the course and will be marked by the appearance of Mlle. Clementine De Vere, a soprano of unusual excellence.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.		OVERTURE. "Coriolan."
SAINT-SAENS.		CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 33. Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.— Allegro non troppo.
GRIEG.		SUITE. "Peer Gynt." DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
		SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
CHOPIN.	a)	NOCTURNE.
MASSENET.	b)	MELODIE.
POPPER.	c)	ELFIN DANCE.
MENDELSSOHN.		SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.— Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

The Pianoforte used is a Steinway.

CRITERION COURSE.

(NINTH NIGHT.)

MECHANICS HALL.

Thursday Evening, February 6th, 1890, at 8.

GRAND

English Ballad

CONCERT.

ARTISTS:

Mrs. LOUISE BALDWIN POWERS.
Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS.
Mr. J. C. BARTLETT.
Mr. D. M. BABCOCK.
Mr. FRITZ GIESE.
Mr. LEON KEACH.

Programme.

MADRIGAL. "Down in a Flow'ry Vale." (15th Century.) . Festa

ARIA. "Burst ye, Apple Buds." . . . . Emery
MRS. POWERS.

SOLO FOR VIOLONCELLO. "Le Desir." . . . Servais
MR. GIESE.

BALLAD. "It was a Dream." . . . . Robyn
MR. J. C. BARTLETT.

BALLAD. "He roamed in the Forest." . . . O'Leary
MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

FOUR PART SONG. "How sweet the Moonlight sleeps." . Leslie

SONG. "The mighty Deep." . . . . Jude
MR. D. M. BABCOCK.

DUETS. a) "From far away." b) "Flight of Clouds." c) "Nearest and Dearest." . . . . Folk Songs
MISS EDMANDS and MR. BARTLETT.

SOLO FOR VIOLONCELLO. "Album Leaf." . . Vieuxtemps
MR. GIESE.

SONG. "She wandered down the Mountain side." . . Clay
MRS. POWERS.

TRIO. "Turn on, old Time." . . . . Wallace
MISS EDMANDS, MR. BARTLETT and MR. BABCOCK.

QUARTET. "Come, Dorothy, Come." . . . Folk Song

Thursday, February 20th, Closing Concert of the Criterion Course. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, accompanied by HERR RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Piano used is a Steinway, from the Warerooms of Mess. C. L. Gorham & Co.

THE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER
AY FEBRUARY 4, 1

The Brilliant Artiste Who is to Appear at the Next Symphony Concert.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, the gifted operatic soprano, has recently returned from a western tour with Gilmore's band, as the leading star of a company of soloists selected by the famous bandmaster to accompany him. Her success brought her so many offers that she declined an engagement tendered her by Mr. Abbey to support Patti in the season of Italian opera now progressing in Mexico. Mlle. De Vere will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion next Monday evening and will contribute to the program some of her most brilliant operatic arias.

FEBRUARY 5.

There has been a good sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and the prospects are there will be a large audience. This concert will be one of the best of the course and will be marked by the appearance of Mlle. Clementine De Vere, a soprano of unusual excellence.

[70]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolan."
SAINT-SAENS.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 33. Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.— Allegro non troppo.
GRIEG.	SUITE. "Peer Gynt." DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
CHOPIN.	a) NOCTURNE.
MASSENET.	b) MELODIE.
POPPER.	c) ELFIN DANCE.
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.— Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

The Pianoforte used is a Steinway.

CRITERION COURSE.

(NINTH NIGHT.)

MECHANICS HALL.

Thursday Evening, February 6th, 1890, at 8.

GRAND

English Ballad

CONCERT.

ARTISTS:

Mrs. LOUISE BALDWIN POWERS.
Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS.
Mr. J. C. BARTLETT.
Mr. D. M. BABCOCK.
Mr. FRITZ GIESE.
Mr. LEON KEACH.

Programme.

MADRIGAL. "Down in a Flow'ry Vale." (15th Century.)	Festa
ARIA. "Burst ye, Apple Buds." MRS. POWERS.	Emery
SOLO for VIOLONCELLO. "Le Desir." MR. GIESE.	Servais
BALLAD. "It was a Dream." MR. J. C. BARTLETT.	Robyn
BALLAD. "He roamed in the Forest." MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.	O'Leary
FOUR PART SONG. "How sweet the Moonlight sleeps."	Leslie
SONG. "The mighty Deep." MR. D. M. BABCOCK.	Jude
DUETS. a) "From far away." b) "Flight of Clouds." c) "Nearest and Dearest." MISS EDMANDS and MR. BARTLETT.	Folk Songs
SOLO for VIOLONCELLO. "Album Leaf." MR. GIESE.	Vieuxtemps
SONG. "She wandered down the Mountain side." MRS. POWERS.	Clay
TRIO. "Turn on, old Time." MISS EDMANDS, MR. BARTLETT and MR. BABCOCK.	Wallace
QUARTET. "Come, Dorothy, Come."	Folk Song

Thursday, February 20th, Closing Concert of the Criterion Course. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, accompanied by HERR RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Piano used is a Steinway, from the Warerooms of Mess. C. L. Gorham & Co.

HE NEW HAVEN
EVENING REGISTER.
AY FEBRUARY 4, 1

The Brilliant Artiste Who is to Appear at the Next Symphony Concert.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, the gifted operatic soprano, has recently returned from a western tour with Gilmore's band, as the leading star of a company of soloists selected by the famous bandmaster to accompany him. Her success brought her so many offers that she declined an engagement tendered her by Mr. Abbey to support Patti in the season of italian opera now progressing in Mexico. Mlle. De Vere will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Hyperion next Monday evening and will contribute to the program some of her most brilliant operatic arias.

FEBRUARY 5.

There has been a good sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert at the Hyperion next Monday evening, and the prospects are there will be a large audience. This concert will be one of the best of the course and will be marked by the appearance of Mlle. Clementine De Vere, a soprano of unusual excellence.

[70]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Jan. 13th, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, February 10, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after concert. Sleeping cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Feb. 11.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 12, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Feb. 13, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington, 2.40 P. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington Friday, Feb. 14, at 12 M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot.
Arrive Baltimore, 12.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore directly after Concert.
Leave New York Grand Central Depot Saturday, Feb. 15, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Boston, 4.30 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Feb. 10, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1890

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Bach-Abert .....Prelude, Choral and Fugue
Raff ..Symphony No. 1, "To the Fatherland," op. 96
1. Allegro.
2. Scherzo (Allegro molto vivace).
3. Larghetto.
5. Larghetto sostenuto; Un poco lento, quasi Andante moderato; Allegro deciso trionfante. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner..... .....Huldigungs March

J. J. Abert, composer, director, and player upon the double bass is only known in this country as the arranger for orchestra of Sebastian Bach's great organ fugue in G-minor; and yet he has written symphonies, quartets, songs, and operas. His symphonic poem "Columbus," written in 1864, after it had been played in the cities of Germany, was brought out in Paris by Pasdeloup at one of his Popular Concerts; and his third opera "Astorga" has been translated into French and published by Durand. Since 1867 he has written but little, for about that time he married a woman who, like Justice Shallow, had land and beeves, and of whom it is said, she first loved the compositions, then the composer. And so he lived in the sleepy town of Stuttgart, drank most, and at times lazily swung the baton in the little theater of the Court.

The Bach arrangement, or rather Bach pot pourri, is ingeniously made; the instrumentation is interesting and the choral is cleverly introduced. At the same time this fugue was written for the organ; nor is it improved by the addition of the choral. The utility of playing upon one instrument that which was designed and written for another is very questionable. The genius of an organ is separate and distinct; and although you may play upon that sublime piece of mechanism the Overture to Zampa and so please the unthinking, you sin against the composer and against the laws of artistic common sense; for however ingenious your registration may be, you cannot faithfully reproduce the ideas of the composer, and you turn the organ into an orchestrion.

Neither can any combination of orchestral instruments deceive the ear by imitations of the tones of organ diapsons.

The proper tempo at which the fugue should be taken when it is played upon the organ depends upon the proportions of the instrument, its promptness of speech, and the size of the church or hall. Saturday evening the fugue was taken at too slow a pace; the subject as played was not "incisive, corrosive;" when the "spider web strengthened," the attention flagged and the demands of the choral to be heard became at last impudent, not to be borne. This fugue of Bach calls for speed, a headlong rush, and an irresistible, all-conquering rhythmic swing, as "the pulse of Time" which seen by the Blessed Damozel, "shook fierce through all the world."

The symphony of Joachim Raff which took the prize offered by "The Society of the Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire" bears the motto, "An das Vaterland," and it contains as a species of prelude a preface of words full of sound and fury. This collection of turgid phrases is supposed to prepare the hearer for the music which follows; and we learn from it that the symphony is really an "Inquire Within" for all you wish to know of the German character. It is a Baedeker for German emotions. Civilization, the dance, "profundity," women and children, victory and defeat, the chase, perseverance—all the qualities, conditions, experiences, and events of German life are to be portrayed by music. It is a musical stereopticon; a pantomime with the curtain falling on the apotheosis of Germania. And to give the wondering foreigner a correct idea of the past, present and future condition of the "Fatherland" from a geographical, historical, political and zoological standpoint, only five movements were found necessary. Fortunately only four were played; the movement which portrays "the vain struggles to bring about the unity of the Fatherland" was omitted.

It is not easy, it is not fair after one hearing of this work to write anything but mere impressions which a second hearing might change. And first, even with the cuts, the symphony is too long, nor does the geographical extent of Germany upon the map of the world call for a symphony of such length. Some unknown compiler of figures, an enthusiastic German or a precise and plodding Englishman, or possibly a poor wretch tormented with insomnia, has taken the trouble to count the measures of "Vaterland"; and he has found (to quote from the Program Notes) that is is longer by 1,427 measures than Mozart's Jupiter. It is by 600 measures longer than Beethoven's "Heroic"; by 800 longer than Schumann's Second.

The first movement seems interminable; and although the hearer is expected to admire the "tone-picture" of German perseverance, it is more likely that he will wonder at the patience of those who sit through the performance. There is an abundance, perhaps a superabundance of technical skill; Raff's mastery over counterpoint is seen in nearly every page; there are many examples of the most cunning canonic treatment; but as a whole, the first movement seems long-winded, and so crowded with detail that there is no definite impression made upon the hearer. The second movement seems tiresome and undramatic; and as "program music" singularly weak. The larghetto, which "gives us a picture of home life, its charms and pleasures," certainly appeals to the senses. It is melodious and sentimentally beautiful. But in the last movement, if "Hope the consoler takes the composer by the hand," it is only after she has forsaken the listener who sits sullenly awaiting the "unity of Germany" which is "expressed by the final chord."

Now in the absence of the text and without the introduction of a national song, would any human being be reminded by this music of the abstract qualities assigned by Raff to his countrymen; would he in the larghetto see a vision of domestic bliss and grandmother and the children seated about the hearth? Not without reason did Hanslick write that German men and women who gladly recognized themselves in the looking-glass held up by Beethoven would not regard themselves as flattered by this music of Raff.

Wagner's "Huldigungsmarsch" was the final number. With its roar of brass and beatings of drums it this time served its purpose, saying "It is high time to awake, to awake out of sleep."

And yet so far as musical ideas are concerned it is far below the Tannhauser march, and not much better than the celebrated $5000 Centennial swindle.

In the Symphony and in this March was seen a singular habit of Mr. Nikisch: viz., his exaggeration of the ritardando. If the composer has indicated a slight ritardando for, say two measures, Mr. Nikisch says ten. And in so doing, he is not only at variance with the composer; he wars against the laws of musical taste and ruins the sentence and the rhythm.

Boston Sunday Globe

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 9, 1890.

[71]

for Symphony Hearers.

There was no composer of German birth represented upon the programme of the 16th of Mr. Nikisch's symphony concerts. Considering the undeniable preponderance of musical talent among his own countrymen, the director could hardly have given more decided evidence that he is ready to recognize art wherever it exists. Mr. Nikisch's readiness to give opportunity and encouragement to Boston composers has been often exemplified. On the whole it would seem that the charge of narrowness which some writers have brought against the leader from Leipzig has been quietly but most effectively disproved.

An overture-fantasy by Tschaikovsky, given for the first time in Boston, opened the programme. "Romeo and Juliet," this brilliant and original work is called. It breathes the spirit and soul of Shakespeare's tragedy. In the highest sense this Russian composer's offering is descriptive music. The angry rivalries of the Montagues and Capulets are set forth in a strong, yet quite unconventional way. What may well be called the "love motive" is in delightful contrast to the storm and stress of the opening portion of this fantasy. The poetic character of this episode was interpreted with great delicacy of expression. Nor was Mr. Nikisch less happy in the reading of the dirge-like close. Altogether the Tschaikovsky number proved a most welcome addition to the symphony concert's repertory.

Mr. Loeffler was the soloist and he performed, with the correctness and skill that might have been expected, the violin part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. The work was made known here by Mr. Loeffler two seasons ago at one of the earlier symphony concerts. The orchestral accompaniment was not quite so sure and apt as usual with Mr. Nikisch.

Nicode's "Symphonic Variations," have been given here by the Thomas orchestra. They are much more enjoyable than "variations" as a rule; for these are generally a weariness to the audience as well as the performers. Mr. Nikisch's players displayed anew their skill in producing varied effects of orchestration, and the performance was liberally applauded. Massenet's fine overture, played with great spirit and brilliancy, closed the programme.

Once more the Boston symphony orchestra and Mr. Nikisch are to journey to other cities, where the most friendly of receptions assuredly await them. On the return, Feb. 22, Rafael Joseffy is to be heard as soloist, Liszt's piano concerto in A major, No. 2, giving this distinguished artist a re-entrance too long delayed. Weber's "Oberon" overture and Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony (first time in Boston) completes the interesting offering.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Programme and Performance at the Sixteenth Concert Last Evening.

The verdict for last evening's concert must be that considering the programme was entirely devoted to modern music, and a very considerable portion of that in a minor key, it was a remarkably successful concert. The Tschaikowski overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," shows a masterly taste and discrimination in the use of orchestral colors such as even Berlioz might have taken pride in; and while it is difficult to understand wherein it is the tone-poem that it pretends to be, it is none the less a highly imaginative and charming work. Nicode's symphonic variations, are anything but symphonic in design, but the thematic sentiment throughout is of the most effective and entertaining description,— the whole being somewhat operatically conceived 'tis true, yet at all times dignified and impressive. Mr. C. M. Loeffler was rewarded with the heartiest honors of the season, thus far, for his wonderfully able performance of the Lalo symphonie espagnole.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of Massenet's overture "Phedre." Throughout the concert the orchestra played superbly.

A BALLAD CONCERT.

When an audience encores everybody who takes part in a concert, it is a fair inference that the audience is pleased. Such was the case in the "English ballad concert" in the Criterion course last night. It is a gratifying fact that the applause was deserved. Mrs. Louise Baldwin Powers, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. I. C. Bartlett and Mr. D. M. Babcock were a very competent choir, and individually their executive abilities are very considerably beyond the class of music they were required to sing. It was sometimes much lighter than the genuine English ballad. Whether in solo, duet, trio or quartet, they were all very satisfactory. Despite the unquestionable sameness of the songs, the singers were generally so tuneful and so artistic that there could be little thought of weariness in the audience. Miss Edmands gave the most convincing proof of high artistic perception and execution, and that may be said without reflecting unpleasantly on any other singer. The return of Mr. Fritz Giese and his 'cello was welcome. There is no other man in America capable at once of such a superb tone and such faultless execution. Anton Hekking of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, (formerly of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and Bilse's first 'cellist), has the execution but not the tone, and much the same may be said of Victor Herbert of New York, though the latter approaches Giese more nearly in tone. Mr. Giese was delightful last night. His music was of a light character, but it was beautifully played. It is seldom that so marked a contrast in two performances is heard as that between Servais' "Le Desir," as played last night and as played only three days before in another hall. Mr. Leon Kasch and Mr. W. S. Kennedy were the accompanists.

Symphony Orchestra Assembly, pianist, Thursday, [illegible]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[71]

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Jan. 13th, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, February 10, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after concert. Sleeping cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Feb. 11.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 12, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Feb. 13, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington, 2.40 P. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington Friday, Feb. 14, at 12 M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot.
Arrive Baltimore, 12.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore directly after Concert.
Leave New York Grand Central Depot Saturday, Feb. 15, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Boston, 4.30 P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Feb. 10, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1890

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Bach-Abert .....Prelude, Choral and Fugue
Raff. ..Symphony No. 1, "To the Fatherland," op. 96
1. Allegro.
2. Scherzo (Allegro molto vivace).
3. Larghetto.
5. Larghetto sostenuto; Un poco lento, quasi Andante moderato; Allegro deciso trionfante. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner..... .....Huldigungs March

J. J. Abert, composer, director, and player upon the double bass is only known in this country as the arranger for orchestra of Sebastian Bach's great organ fugue in G-minor; and yet he has written symphonies, quartets, songs, and operas. His symphonic poem "Columbus," written in 1864, after it had been played in the cities of Germany, was brought out in Paris by Pasdeloup at one of his Popular Concerts; and his third opera "Astorga" has been translated into French and published by Durand. Since 1867 he has written but little, for about that time he married a woman who, like Justice Shallow, had land and beeves, and of whom it is said, she first loved the compositions, then the composer. And so he lived in the sleepy town of Stuttgart, drank most, and at times lazily swung the baton in the little theater of the Court.

The Bach arrangement, or rather Bach pot pourri, is ingeniously made; the instrumentation is interesting and the choral is cleverly introduced. At the same time this fugue was written for the organ; nor is it improved by the addition of the choral. The utility of playing upon one instrument that which was designed and written for another is very questionable. The genius of an organ is separate and distinct; and although you may play upon that sublime piece of mechanism the Overture to Zampa and so please the unthinking, you sin against the composer and against the laws of artistic common sense; for however ingenious your registration may be, you cannot faithfully reproduce the ideas of the composer, and you turn the organ into an orchestrion.

Neither can any combination of orchestral instruments deceive the ear by imitations of the tones of organ diapsons.

The proper tempo at which the fugue should be taken when it is played upon the organ depends upon the proportions of the instrument, its promptness of speech, and the size of the church or hall. Saturday evening the fugue was taken at too slow a pace; the subject as played was not "incisive, corrosive;" when the "spider web strengthened," the attention flagged and the demands of the choral to be heard became at last impudent, not to be borne. This fugue of Bach calls for speed, a headlong rush, and an irresistible, all-conquering rhythmic swing, as "the pulse of Time" which seen by the Blessed Damozel, "shook fierce through all the world."

The symphony of Joachim Raff which took the prize offered by "The Society of the Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire" bears the motto, "An das Vaterland," and it contains as a species of prelude a preface of words full of sound and fury. This collection of turgid phrases is supposed to prepare the hearer for the music which follows; and we learn from it that the symphony is really an "Inquire Within" for all you wish to know of the German character. It is a Baedeker for German emotions. Civilization, the dance, "profundity," women and children, victory and defeat, the chase, perseverance—all the qualities, conditions, experiences, and events of German life are to be portrayed by music. It is a musical stereopticon; a pantomime with the curtain falling on the apotheosis of Germania. And to give the wondering foreigner a correct idea of the past, present and future condition of the "Fatherland" from a geographical, historical, political and zoological standpoint, only five movements were found necessary. Fortunately only four were played; the movement which portrays "the vain struggles to bring about the unity of the Fatherland" was omitted.

It is not easy, it is not fair after one hearing of this work to write anything but mere impressions which a second hearing might change. And first, even with the cuts, the symphony is too long, nor does the geographical extent of Germany upon the map of the world call for a symphony of such length. Some unknown compiler of figures, an enthusiastic German or a precise and plodding Englishman, or possibly a poor wretch tormented with insomnia, has taken the trouble to count the measures of "Vaterland"; and he has found (to quote from the Program Notes) that is is longer by 1,427 measures than Mozart's Jupiter. It is by 600 measures longer than Beethoven's "Heroic"; by 800 longer than Schumann's Second.

The first movement seems interminable; and although the hearer is expected to admire the "tone-picture" of German perseverance, it is more likely that he will wonder at the patience of those who sit through the performance. There is an abundance, perhaps a superabundance of technical skill; Raff's mastery over counterpoint is seen in nearly every page; there are many examples of the most cunning canonic treatment; but as a whole, the first movement seems long-winded, and so crowded with detail that there is no definite impression made upon the hearer. The second movement seems tiresome and undramatic; and as "program music" singularly weak. The larghetto, which "gives us a picture of home life, its charms and pleasures," certainly appeals to the senses. It is melodious and sentimentally beautiful. But in the last movement, if "Hope the consoler takes the composer by the hand," it is only after she has forsaken the listener who sits sullenly awaiting the "unity of Germany" which is "expressed by the final chord."

Now in the absence of the text and without the introduction of a national song, would any human being be reminded by this music of the abstract qualities assigned by Raff to his countrymen; would he in the larghetto see a vision of domestic bliss and grandmother and the children seated about the hearth? Not without reason did Hanslick write that German men and women who gladly recognized themselves in the looking-glass held up by Beethoven would not regard themselves as flattered by this music of Raff.

Wagner's "Huldigungsmarsch" was the final number. With its roar of brass and beatings of drums it this time served its purpose, saying "It is high time to awake, to awake out of sleep."

And yet so far as musical ideas are concerned it is far below the Tannhauser march, and not much better than the celebrated $5000 Centennial swindle.

In the Symphony and in this March was seen a singular habit of Mr. Nikisch: viz., his exaggeration of the ritardando. If the composer has indicated a slight ritardando for, say two measures, Mr. Nikisch says ten. And in so doing, he is not only at variance with the composer; he wars against the laws of musical taste and ruins the sentence and the rhythm.

Boston Sunday Globe

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 9, 1890.

for Symphony Hearers.

There was no composer of German birth represented upon the programme of the 16th of Mr. Nikisch's symphony concerts. Considering the undeniable preponderance of musical talent among his own countrymen, the director could hardly have given more decided evidence that he is ready to recognize art wherever it exists. Mr. Nikisch's readiness to give opportunity and encouragement to Boston composers has been often exemplified. On the whole it would seem that the charge of narrowness which some writers have brought against the leader from Leipzig has been quietly but most effectively disproved.

An overture-fantasy by Tschaikovsky, given for the first time in Boston, opened the programme. "Romeo and Juliet," this brilliant and original work is called. It breathes the spirit and soul of Shakespeare's tragedy. In the highest sense this Russian composer's offering is descriptive music. The angry rivalries of the Montagues and Capulets are set forth in a strong, yet quite unconventional way. What may well be called the "love motive" is in delightful contrast to the storm and stress of the opening portion of this fantasy. The poetic character of this episode was interpreted with great delicacy of expression. Nor was Mr. Nikisch less happy in the reading of the dirge-like close. Altogether the Tschaikovsky number proved a most welcome addition to the symphony concert's repertory.

Mr. Loeffler was the soloist and he performed, with the correctness and skill that might have been expected, the violin part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. The work was made known here by Mr. Loeffler two seasons ago at one of the earlier symphony concerts. The orchestral accompaniment was not quite so sure and apt as usual with Mr. Nikisch.

Nicode's "Symphonic Variations," have been given here by the Thomas orchestra. They are much more enjoyable than "variations" as a rule; for these are generally a weariness to the audience as well as the performers. Mr. Nikisch's players displayed anew their skill in producing varied effects of orchestration, and the performance was liberally applauded. Massenet's fine overture, played with great spirit and brilliancy, closed the programme.

Once more the Boston symphony orchestra and Mr. Nikisch are to journey to other cities, where the most friendly of receptions assuredly await them. On the return, Feb. 22, Rafael Joseffy is to be heard as soloist. Liszt's piano concerto in A major, No. 2, giving this distinguished artist a re-entrance too long delayed. Weber's "Oberon" overture and Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony (first time in Boston) completes the interesting offering.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Programme and Performance at the Sixteenth Concert Last Evening.

The verdict for last evening's concert must be that considering the programme was entirely devoted to modern music, and a very considerable portion of that in a minor key, it was a remarkably successful concert. The Tschaikowski overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," shows a masterly taste and discrimination in the use of orchestral colors such as even Berlioz might have taken pride in; and while it is difficult to understand wherein it is the tone-poem that it pretends to be, it is none the less a highly imaginative and charming work. Nicode's symphonic variations, are anything but symphonic in design, but the thematic sentiment throughout is of the most effective and entertaining description,— the whole being somewhat operatically conceived 'tis true, yet at all times dignified and impressive. Mr. C. M. Loeffler was rewarded with the heartiest honors of the season, thus far, for his wonderfully able performance of the Lalo symphonic espagnole.

The concert ended with s brilliant performance of Massenet's overture "Phedre." Throughout the concert the orchestra played superbly.

A BALLAD CONCERT.

When an audience encores everybody who takes part in a concert, it is a fair inference that the audience is pleased. Such was the case in the "English ballad concert" in the Criterion course last night. It is a gratifying fact that the applause was deserved. Mrs. Louise Baldwin Powers, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. I. C. Bartlett and Mr. D. M. Babcock were a very competent choir, and individually their executive abilities are very considerably beyond the class of music they were required to sing. It was sometimes much lighter than the genuine English ballad. Whether in solo, duet, trio or quartet, they were all very satisfactory. Despite the unquestionable sameness of the songs, the singers were generally so tuneful and so artistic that there could be little thought of weariness in the audience. Miss Edmands gave the most convincing proof of high artistic perception and execution, and that may be said without reflecting unpleasantly on any other singer. The return of Mr. Fritz Giese and his 'cello was welcome. There is no other man in America capable at once of such a superb tone and such faultless execution. Anton Hekking of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, (formerly of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and Bilse's first 'cellist), has the execution but not the tone, and much the same may be said of Victor Herbert of New York, though the latter approaches Giese more nearly in tone. Mr. Giese was delightful last night. His music was of a light character, but it was beautifully played. It is seldom that so marked a contrast in two performances is heard as that between Servais'—"Le Desir," as played last night and as played only three days before in another hall. Mr. Leon Keach and Mr. W. S. Kennedy were the accompanists.

Symphony Orchestra and Joseffy, pianist, Thursday, Feb. 20th.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, February 11, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

PROGRAMME

16

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890

SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert on Saturday night was unusually enthusiastic. The concert was not only extremely interesting, but the work of the orchestra was very fine. The programme was as follows:

Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," ..... Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21 ..... Lalo
Symphonic variations, op. 27 ..... Nicodé
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture, "Phedre" ..... Massenet
Soloist, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

The symphonic variations by the comparatively young Polish composer, Jean Louis Nicodé, are very interesting and indeed often very beautiful. It is a difficult task to effect the combination of interest and beauty in this form of composition, and no matter how cleverly this may be accomplished a "theme with variations" will always savor rather of the contrapuntal class room than the concert hall, but with the work in question it is certainly true that this scholastic (rather than scholarly) element has been kept well in the background. The theme itself is striking and original, the different variations show great individuality of melodic and harmonic thought, and the whole work is very effectively instrumented. It was beautifully played and the various complicated solo passages for flute, clarinet, horn and other instruments were all remarkably well executed. It may be observed in this connection that Mr. Reiter (the new first hornist, and a brother of Xavier Reiter, who held this position until quite recently) is a magnificent player, quite on a par with his brother, and indeed his tone, if not quite so varied in color, is more what might be called the "true horn tone." Massenet's overture to "Phedre" is an extremely effective work, and although at times slightly vulgar, it is not so marred by unexpected trivialities as are many of his compositions. It is rather reminiscent, and in different passages recalls very distinctly both Liszt's "Tasso" and Rubinstein's song, "Gelb rollt mir zu Füssen." This was also very finely executed by the orchestra.

The "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, by Lalo, was introduced at these concerts by Mr. Loeffler in 1887, and was enthusiastically received. It was again greeted with marked and genuine enthusiasm on Saturday night, and both the beautiful composition itself and the admirable manner in which it was performed justly deserved unusual applause. Marked Spanish characteristics pervade all its movements, and yet it is so distinctly new and "original" that the interest is undiminished from the first note to the end. Mr. Loeffler played in a thoroughly delightful manner, with neat and finished technique, and his peculiarly warm and sympathetic tone, which are so indispensable to the satisfactory rendering of this class of music. He seemed thoroughly to catch the composer's feeling and intentions, and he rendered the last movement (a vivace in 6-8 time, incorrectly termed a habanera) with true southern fire and expression. Mr. Loeffler was warmly applauded and three times recalled.

The chief interest in the programme centred in the overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The friends of the Slavonic school of music must have been very happy on Saturday night, for it is certainly true that this work is one of the most important, remarkable and beautiful modern compositions that has been heard in Boston for many years. It possesses every characteristic necessary to artistic beauty: it is completely original, its themes are striking to a degree of intensity that only genius could produce, its form is clear and comprehensible, and its instrumentation magnificent. It was listened to with that rapt attention which immediately proclaims the presence of really great thoughts, and the enthusiasm at the close showed how its beauty had been appreciated. Although no further "programme" than its title is appended to the work, it is surely a most successful piece of "programme music," for without endeavoring to represent all manner of impossible details the fiery Russian succeeds in imbuing his listeners with the general sentiment of the great love poem, and this is the true mission of this style of composition.

The clarinets and bassoons announce a melancholy theme, which may perhaps be called the "Romeo" theme. The whole of the first part of the work (andante non tanto) is given up to the treatment and development of this theme, and here, at the very outset, we find originality of thought which is surprising. The manner in which the voices are led indicates a true contrapuntal feeling, which, however, expresses itself in new forms and phases, and this whole division of the work is very beautiful in instrumental color. What might be called the second division of the work (allegro giusto) introduces a new theme, with a remarkably strong and unusual rhythm; all the resources of the modern orchestra are brought into play, the strings throw off stormy passages while the brasses and the wood-wind, as it were, attack one another with conflicting rhythm. It is easy to see that the composer intends to represent the deadly feud between the Montagues and the Capulets, and from the "programme-music" point of view stated above this portion of the work is particularly successful. Presently the storm of angry words and clashing swords dies away and the rough rhythms merge into soft and low pulsations.

But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?
It is the east, and Juliet is the sun!

This new theme—the "Juliet" theme, if we may call it so—is a singularly lovely melody and is first announced by the plaintive English horns, with the muted violins. It is followed by a passage for all the strings, the last phrase of which presently appears in the horns as a throbbing, passionate counter, subject to the "Juliet" theme, which is now given to the wood-wind. We are only permitted, however, to cast a passing glance at the two lovers; the quarrel between the two houses breaks out again and wages more fiercely than before. This part of the work is like a compendium of modern instrumentation: it is exceedingly effective, and introduces many new and striking instrumental combinations. Softer emotions at last prevail, and then suddenly the "Juliet" theme appears again, given to all the strings in an overpowering cantabile, while the horns again bring the persistent, pulsing counter-subject as before. It is difficult to describe the simply superb effort of this passage—surely it is one of the most magnificent products of modern music. It is impossible to resist the power of the situation. At last the music dies away and we hear the sad notes of a funeral song. The drums roll loudly and the great, broad chords ring out like a benediction—

Go hence, to have more talk of these sad things;
Some shall be pardon'd and some punished,
For never was a story of more woe
Than this of Juliet and her Romeo.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 9, 1890.

[72]

The Symphony Concert, Mr. C. M. Loeffler Soloist.

For the 16th of the season's series of symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented a programme made up of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Lalo's symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra, op. 21; Nicode's symphonic variations, op. 27, and Massenet's overture "Phedre." The "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the Nicode variations were the novelties of the evening, the first named composition having its first performance here on this occasion, and the last its first hearing in these concerts. The Russian composer, Tschaikowky, has not given any outline of his intentions in the overture other than to state on its title page that it is "after Shakespeare," thus leaving the listener to avoid a tendency to "dilate with the wrong emotion" by his or her own imagination as to the meaning of the various parts of the work. It is dedicated to M. M. Balakireff, a composer of the Russian school, and is scored for full modern orchestra, including piccolo, English horn, cymbals, great drum, and harp. A single hearing of such a composition leaves but little idea of the intent and purpose of the composer. It is a masterly work, so far as it illustrates the ability of its author to use skilfully all the resources of the modern orchestra, but in the, at times excessive display of tone color, the outline of the picture is made indistinct. There are many evidences of the dramatic strength of the composer in this overture, but the love scenes, which have been made so much of in other musical treatments of this subject, find but little prominence in this. There are many evidences of the melodious turn of the composer, and there is the same distinct individuality in the leading characteristics of the work that is found in all of Tschaikowsky's writing. The overture is certainly an interesting composition, and a further hearing of it might give a better impression of its value as a descriptive work. Mr. Nikisch was somewhat unfortunate in the selection of the numbers to complete this programme, for there was a great similarity and characteristics of the remaining works lack of contrast in the remaining selections that, despite the good work done by the orchestra throughout the evening, the concert proved a wearisome one. The Lalo "Symphonie" was again as thoroughly enjoyed as when heard at these concerts a few seasons ago, upon the occasion of its introduction to America by Mr. Loeffler, whose style it is so admirably suited to. Its graceful charactistics, charming themes and national peculiarities were all given due prominence by the soloist, and he has never made a more gratifying exhibition of his value as a player, than in this performance. He was most enthusiastically applauded for his effort, and called again and again to bow his thanks for this commendation. Had the Nicode variations been more happily placed, their enjoyment by the audience would have been greatly heightened. They were finely played throughout, and the first flute and leading violin passages were given with remarkable purity of tone and with rare expression. The Massenet overture afforded a great relief to the generally monotonous character of the evening's selections, and it was played with fine effect throughout. The orchestra makes its third Atlantic coast tour the coming week, appearing at New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

Clipping No. 4
Clipping from Times Phila Pa
Date 2/7/90

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Gives a Widely-Assorted Programme.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night before a very large audience at the Academy of Music, proved one of the most interesting of the season. The programme included three novelties and one classic work, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony. Massanet's "Phedre" overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective. The "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, for violin and orchestra, is hardly a symphony, though it is in four movements. It is a couscientious treatment of themes presumably Spanish, and though it begins rather aimlessly the later movements are exceedingly poetical and graceful. The solo part was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler with great purity of tone and smoothness of execution, and the performance won warm applause.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is a fanciful bit of writing that served best to show the discipline of the orchestra. If delicacy of execution is the test of a conductor, as many persons seem to think, Mr. Nikisch may be said to have beaten the record of Mr. Gericke. The extraordinary pianissimo of the funeral march made the audience enthusiastic and the accurate bang of the cymbals in the final movement awakened such plaudits that Mr. Nikisch was compelled to give this Berlioz-esque bit over again.

It was a peculiar judgment that placed this theatrical claptrap immediately before the Symphony, but perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought it would make his audience appreciate Mendelssohn the more. It should have done so and it certainly had that effect upon some, but not on those that made the loudest noise.

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, February 11, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have proved highly satisfactory to those who have objected that these concerts were given up almost wholly to the music of German composers, for there was not one native of Germany represented. The performances opened with an Overture-Fantasie (for the first time in Boston) entitled "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, a Russian, which was followed by the Symphonie Espagnole for solo violin and orchestra, by Lalo, a Spaniard; and this in turn was succeeded by a set of Symphonic Variations (for the first time at these concerts), by Nicodé, a Pole, the whole concluding with the overture to "Phedre," by Massenet, a Frenchman. The concert should also have gratified those who have steadily complained because Mr. Nikisch has been in the habit of conducting from memory, for on this occasion he conducted every piece with the score open before him. The concert was a brilliant and interesting one, and we regret that the limited space at our command does not admit of an adequate notice of the two new works, because the Tschaikowsky overture, though it is difficult to appreciate it as a tone picture of Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet," is nevertheless a remarkable work, original, poetic in spirit, impressive in effect and remarkably interesting in its harmonic treatment and its orchestration. The Nicodé variations have scarcely the symphonic character, but they are full of charm, and are richly and ingeniously instrumented. These two works were read and played splendidly; in fact, the performances of the orchestra through the whole concert was of the highest beauty and finish. The Massenet overture, a noisily blatant work, but clever and effective in its way, despite its conventionalities and its occasional vulgarity was given with exciting vigor and brilliancy. The delightful Lalo concerto which had been played before at these concerts by Mr. C. M. Loeffler who introduced it here, was again performed by him and with the same delightfully artistic finish, fluent mastery of technique and purity and warmth of style that attended his earlier interpretation of it. His elegant and sympathetic rendering of the work excited a storm of enthusiasm, and he was recalled three or four times with some of the most hearty applause that has been given at these concerts this season. The music for the next concert is "Overture Oberon," Weber; Concerto for Piano, A-major, Liszt; "Irish Symphony," Stanford C. Villiers. The soloist is to be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

FRIDAY.....FEBRUARY 7, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give one of their incomparable concerts in Washington on Thursday next. It is the finest musical organization in this country. Would that Richmond could enjoy the treat.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist at the Symphony Concert Saturday evening, rendering Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which was first introduced to a symphony audience in 1887 by Mr. Loeffler. The work abounds in difficulties of technique and calls for brilliant playing from the solo violin. It is richly orchestrated and is a delightful work when given as it was played by Mr. Loeffler. The number was originally composed for Signor Sarasate, but we doubt if that brilliant artist could have given more pleasure to the audience than the deservedly popular violinist of last Saturday evening. Mr. Loeffler was heartily applauded after each movement of the symphony, and at its close was recalled many times, and was the recipient of a floral offering.

The work of Mr. Loeffler was the nearest approach to a symphony of anything on the programme, and it was curiously arranged and admirably fitted to satisfy those who wanted none. classes, both in composition and effects. The concert opened with an overture, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, the celebrated Russian composer, which had never been played in Boston, and the other selections were some symphonic variations by Nicode and an overture by Massenet. It can be truly said that the work of the orchestra was admirable in all these selections, and it happens that Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely from the score. It appears to make little difference to our conductor, and it is presumed that he acts his pleasure in this matter. He leads the orchestra whether conducting from memory or from the score.

The variety of effect, the prominence given to the wood wind in the Tschaikowsky number was marked by exquisite shading, and the variations by Nicode were clearly delivered. Yet, all in all, there seemed something to be desired in the programme which was lacking, and it was not as entirely satisfactory as many of the symphony concerts which had preceded it. There is to be no symphony concert this week. At the next concert Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 16, 1890.

Louis Miller, the tenor, is coming to the front as a manager. He has just concluded an engagement with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikish, conductor, whereby he takes that famous orchestra to Minneapolis in May next for a grand concert to be given either at the Exposition or Colosseum buildings, either of which holds 7000 people. Mr. Miller has just returned from Minneapolis where he has been attending to the preliminary arrangements, and now looking [illegible]

Boston Gazette.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890.

SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert on Saturday night was unusually enthusiastic. The concert was not only extremely interesting, but the work of the orchestra was very fine. The programme was as follows:

Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," ..... Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21..... Lalo
Symphonic variations, op. 27..... Nicodé
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture, "Phedre"..... Massenet
Soloist, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

The symphonic variations by the comparatively young Polish composer, Jean Louis Nicodé, are very interesting and indeed often very beautiful. It is a difficult task to effect the combination of interest and beauty in this form of composition, and no matter how cleverly this may be accomplished a "theme with variations" will always savor rather of the contrapuntal class room than the concert hall, but with the work in question it is certainly true that this scholastic (rather than scholarly) element has been kept well in the background. The theme itself is striking and original, the different variations show great individuality of melodic and harmonic thought, and the whole work is very effectively instrumented. It was beautifully played and the various complicated solo passages for flute, clarinet, horn and other instruments were all remarkably well executed. It may be observed in this connection that Mr. Reiter (the new first hornist, and a brother of Xavier Reiter, who held this position until quite recently) is a magnificent player, quite on a par with his brother, and indeed his tone, if not quite so varied in color, is more what might be called the "true horn tone." Massenet's overture to "Phedre" is an extremely effective work, and although at times slightly vulgar, it is not so marred by unexpected trivialities as are many of his compositions. It is rather reminiscent, and in different passages recalls very distinctly both Liszt's "Tasso" and Rubinstein's song, "Gelb rollt mir zu Füssen." This was also very finely executed by the orchestra.

The "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, by Lalo, was introduced at these concerts by Mr. Loeffler in 1887, and was enthusiastically received. It was again greeted with marked and genuine enthusiasm on Saturday night, and both the beautiful composition itself and the admirable manner in which it was performed justly deserved unusual applause. Marked Spanish characteristics pervade all its movements, and yet it is so distinctly new and "original" that the interest is undiminished from the first note to the end. Mr. Loeffler played in a thoroughly delightful manner, with neat and finished technique, and his peculiarly warm and sympathetic tone, which are so indispensable to the satisfactory rendering of this class of music. He seemed thoroughly to catch the composer's feeling and intentions, and he rendered the last movement (a vivace in 6-8 time, incorrectly termed a habanera) with true southern fire and expression. Mr. Loeffler was warmly applauded and three times recalled.

The chief interest in the programme centred in the overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The friends of the Slavonic school of music must have been very happy on Saturday night, for it is certainly true that this work is one of the most important, remarkable and beautiful modern compositions that has been heard in Boston for many years. It possesses every characteristic necessary to artistic beauty: it is completely original, its themes are striking to a degree of intensity that only genius could produce, its form is clear and comprehensible, and its instrumentation magnificent. It was listened to with that rapt attention which immediately proclaims the presence of really great thoughts, and the enthusiasm at the close showed how its beauty had been appreciated. Although no further "programme" than its title is appended to the work, it is surely a most successful piece of "programme music," for without endeavoring to represent all manner of impossible details the fiery Russian succeeds in imbuing his listeners with the general sentiment of the great love poem, and this is the true mission of this style of composition.

The clarinets and bassoons announce a melancholy theme, which may perhaps be called the "Romeo" theme. The whole of the first part of the work (andante non tanto) is given up to the treatment and development of this theme, and here, at the very outset, we find originality of thought which is surprising. The manner in which the voices are led indicates a true contrapuntal feeling, which, however, expresses itself in new forms and phases, and this whole division of the work is very beautiful in instrumental color. What might be called the second division of the work (allegro giusto) introduces a new theme, with a remarkably strong and unusual rhythm; all the resources of the modern orchestra are brought into play, the strings throw off stormy passages while the brasses and the wood-wind, as it were, attack one another with conflicting rhythm. It is easy to see that the composer intends to represent the deadly feud between the Montagues and the Capulets, and from the "programme-music" point of view stated above this portion of the work is particularly successful. Presently the storm of angry words and clashing swords dies away and the rough rhythms merge into soft and low pulsations.

But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?
It is the east, and Juliet is the sun!

This new theme—the "Juliet" theme, if we may call it so—is a singularly lovely melody and is first announced by the plaintive English horns, with the muted violins. It is followed by a passage for all the strings, the last phrase of which presently appears in the horns as a throbbing, passionate counter, subject to the "Juliet" theme, which is now given to the wood-wind. We are only permitted, however, to cast a passing glance at the two lovers; the quarrel between the two houses breaks out again and wages more fiercely than before. This part of the work is like a compendium of modern instrumentation: it is exceedingly effective, and introduces many new and striking instrumental combinations. Softer emotions at last prevail, and then suddenly the "Juliet" theme appears again, given to all the strings in an overpowering cantabile, while the horns again bring the persistent, pulsing counter-subject as before. It is difficult to describe the simply superb effort of this passage—surely it is one of the most magnificent products of modern music. It is impossible to resist the power of the situation. At last the music dies away and we hear the sad notes of a funeral song. The drums roll loudly and the great, broad chords ring out like a benediction—

Go hence, to have more talk of these sad things;
Some shall be pardon'd and some punished,
For never was a story of more woe
Than this of Juliet and her Romeo.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Gazette.

BOSTON, [illegible]

The Symphony Concert.

M. Loeffler [illegible]

For the 16th of the season's series of symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented a programme made up of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Lalo's symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra, op. 21; Nicode's symphonic variations, op. 27, and Massenet's overture "Phedre." The "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the Nicode variations were the novelties of the evening, the first named composition having its first performance here on this occasion, and the last its first hearing in these concerts. The Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, has not given any outline of his intentions in the overture other than to state on its title page that it is "after Shakespeare," thus leaving the listener to avoid a tendency to "dilate with the wrong emotion" by his or her own imagination as to the meaning of the various parts of the work. It is dedicated to M. M. Balakireff, a composer of the Russian school, and is scored for full modern orchestra, including piccolo, English horn, cymbals, great drum, and harp. A single hearing of such a composition leaves but little idea of the intent and purpose of the composer. It is a masterly work, so far as it illustrates the ability of its author to use skilfully all the resources of the modern orchestra, but in the, at times excessive display of tone color, the outline of the picture is made indistinct. There are many evidences of the dramatic strength of the composer in this overture, but the love scenes, which have been made so much of in other musical treatments of this subject, find but little prominence in this. There are many evidences of the melodious turn of the composer, and there is the same distinct individuality in the leading characteristics of the work that is found in all of Tschaikowsky's writing. The overture is certainly an interesting composition, and a further hearing of it might give a better impression of its value as a descriptive work. Mr. Nikisch was somewhat unfortunate in the selection of the numbers to complete this programme, for there was a great similarity and characteristics of the remaining works lack of contrast in the remaining selections that, despite the good work done by the orchestra throughout the evening, the concert proved a wearisome one. The Lalo "Symphonie" was again as thoroughly enjoyed as when heard at these concerts a few seasons ago, upon the occasion of its introduction to America by Mr. Loeffler, whose style it is so admirably suited to. Its graceful charactistics, charming themes and national peculiarities were all given due prominence by the soloist, and he has never made a more gratifying exhibition of his value as a player, than in this performance. He was most enthusiastically applauded for his effort, and called again and again to bow his thanks for this commendation. Had the Nicode variations been more happily placed, their enjoyment by the audience would have been greatly heightened. They were finely played throughout, and the first flute and leading violin passages were given with remarkable purity of tone and with rare expression. The Massenet overture afforded a great relief to the generally monotonous character of the evening's selections, and it was played with fine effect throughout. The orchestra makes its third Atlantic coast tour the coming week, appearing at New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

Clipping No. [illegible]

Clipping from Times Phila Pa

Date [illegible] 7

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Gives a Widely-Assorted Programme.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night before a very large audience at the Academy of Music, proved one of the most interesting of the season. The programme included three novelties and one classic work, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony. Massanet's "Phedre" overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective. The "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, for violin and orchestra, is hardly a symphony, though it is in four movements. It is a conscientious treatment of themes presumably Spanish, and though it begins rather aimlessly the later movements are exceedingly poetical and graceful. The solo part was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler with great purity of tone and smoothness of execution, and the performance won warm applause.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is a fanciful bit of writing that served best to show the discipline of the orchestra. If delicacy of execution is the test of a conductor, as many persons seem to think, Mr. Nikisch may be said to have beaten the record of Mr. Gericke. The extraordinary pianissimo of the funeral march made the audience enthusiastic and the accurate bang of the cymbals in the final movement awakened such plaudits that Mr. Nikisch was compelled to give this Berlioz-esque bit over again.

It was a peculiar judgment that placed this theatrical claptrap immediately before the Symphony, but perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought it would make his audience appreciate Mendelssohn the more. It should have done so and it certainly had that effect upon some, but not on those that made the loudest noise.

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, February 11, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have proved highly satisfactory to those who have objected that these concerts were given up almost wholly to the music of German composers, for there was not one native of Germany represented. The performances opened with an Overture-Fantasie (for the first time in Boston) entitled "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, a Russian, which was followed by the Symphonie Espagnole for solo violin and orchestra, by Lalo, a Spaniard; and this in turn was succeeded by a set of Symphonic Variations (for the first time at these concerts), by Nicodé, a Pole, the whole concluding with the overture to "Phedre," by Massenet, a Frenchman. The concert should also have gratified those who have steadily complained because Mr. Nikisch has been in the habit of conducting from memory, for on this occasion he conducted every piece with the score open before him. The concert was a brilliant and interesting one, and we regret that the limited space at our command does not admit of an adequate notice of the two new works, because the Tschaikowsky overture, though it is difficult to appreciate it as a tone picture of Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet," is nevertheless a remarkable work, original, poetic in spirit, impressive in effect and remarkably interesting in its harmonic treatment and its orchestration. The Nicodé variations have scarcely the symphonic character, but they are full of charm, and are richly and ingeniously instrumented. These two works were read and played splendidly; in fact, the performances of the orchestra through the whole concert was of the highest beauty and finish. The Massenet overture, a noisily blatant work, but clever and effective in its way, despite its conventionalities and its occasional vulgarity was given with exciting vigor and brilliancy. The delightful Lalo concerto which had been played before at these concerts by Mr. C. M. Loeffler who introduced it here, was again performed by him and with the same delightfully artistic finish, fluent mastery of technique and purity and warmth of style that attended his earlier interpretation of it. His elegant and sympathetic rendering of the work excited a storm of enthusiasm, and he was recalled three or four times with some of the most hearty applause that has been given at these concerts this season. The music for the next concert is "Overture Oberon," Weber; Concerto for Piano, A-major, Liszt; "Irish Symphony," Stanford C. Villiers. The soloist is to be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

FRIDAY.....FEBRUARY 7, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give one of their incomparable concerts in Washington on Thursday next. It is the finest musical organization in this country. Would that Richmond could enjoy the treat.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist at the Symphony Concert Saturday evening, rendering Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which was first introduced to a symphony audience in 1887 by Mr. Loeffler. The work abounds in difficulties of technique and calls for brilliant playing from the solo violin. It is richly orchestrated and is a delightful work when given as it was played by Mr. Loeffler. The number was originally composed for Signor Sarasate, but we doubt if that brilliant artist could have given more pleasure to the audience than the deservedly popular violinist of last Saturday evening. Mr. Loeffler was heartily applauded after each movement of the symphony, and at its close was recalled many times, and was the recipient of a floral offering.

The work of Mr. Loeffler was the nearest approach to a symphony of anything on the programme, and it was curiously arranged and admirably fitted to satisfy those who wanted none. both in composition and effects. The concert opened with an overture, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, the celebrated Russian composer, which had never been played in Boston, and the other selections were some symphonic variations by Nicode and an overture by Massenet. It can be truly said that the work of the orchestra was admirable in all these selections, and it happens that Mr. Nikisch conducted entirely from the score. It appears to make little difference to our conductor, and it is presumed that he acts his pleasure in this matter. He leads the orchestra whether conducting from memory or from the score.

The variety of effect, the prominence given to the wood wind in the Tschaikowsky number was marked by exquisite shading, and the variations by Nicode were clearly delivered. Yet, all in all, there seemed something to be desired in the programme which was lacking, and it was not as entirely satisfactory as many of the symphony concerts which had preceded it. There is to be no symphony concert this week. At the next concert Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 16, 1890.

Louis Miller, the tenor, is coming to the front as a manager. He has just concluded an engagement with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikish, conductor, whereby he takes that famous orchestra to Minneapolis in May next for a grand concert to be given either at the Exposition or Colosseum buildings, either of which holds 7000 people. Mr. Miller has just returned from Minneapolis where he has been attending to the preliminary arrangements, and is now booking a few dates for his Philadelphia May Concert Company, which closes its season the last of March.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890

SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert on Saturday night was unusually enthusiastic. The concert was not only extremely interesting, but the work of the orchestra was very fine. The programme was as follows:

Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," ..... Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21 ..... Lalo
Symphonic variations, op. 27 ..... Nicodé
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture, "Phedre" ..... Massenet
Soloist, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

The symphonic variations by the comparatively young Polish composer, Jean Louis Nicodé, are very interesting and indeed often very beautiful. It is a difficult task to effect the combination of interest and beauty in this form of composition, and no matter how cleverly this may be accomplished a "theme with variations" will always savor rather of the contrapuntal class room than the concert hall, but with the work in question it is certainly true that this scholastic (rather than scholarly) element has been kept well in the background. The theme itself is striking and original, the different variations show great individuality of melodic and harmonic thought, and the whole work is very effectively instrumented. It was beautifully played and the various complicated solo passages for flute, clarinet, horn and other instruments were all remarkably well executed. It may be observed in this connection that Mr. Reiter (the new first hornist, and a brother of Xavier Reiter, who held this position until quite recently) is a magnificent player, quite on a par with his brother, and indeed his tone, if not quite so varied in color, is more what might be called the "true horn tone." Massenet's overture to "Phedre" is an extremely effective work, and although at times slightly vulgar, it is not so marred by unexpected trivialities as are many of his compositions. It is rather reminiscent, and in different passages recalls very distinctly both Liszt's "Tasso" and Rubinstein's song, "Gelb rollt mir zu Füssen." This was also very finely executed by the orchestra.

The "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, by Lalo, was introduced at these concerts by Mr. Loeffler in 1887, and was enthusiastically received. It was again greeted with marked and genuine enthusiasm on Saturday night, and both the beautiful composition itself and the admirable manner in which it was performed justly deserved unusual applause. Marked Spanish characteristics pervade all its movements, and yet it is so distinctly new and "original" that the interest is undiminished from the first note to the end. Mr. Loeffler played in a thoroughly delightful manner, with neat and finished technique, and his peculiarly warm and sympathetic tone, which are so indispensable to the satisfactory rendering of this class of music. He seemed thoroughly to catch the composer's feeling and intentions, and he rendered the last movement (a vivace in 6-8 time, incorrectly termed a habanera) with true southern fire and expression. Mr. Loeffler was warmly applauded and three times recalled.

The chief interest in the programme centred in the overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The friends of the Slavonic school of music must have been very happy on Saturday night, for it is certainly true that this work is one of the most important, remarkable and beautiful modern compositions that has been heard in Boston for many years. It possesses every characteristic necessary to artistic beauty: it is completely original, its themes are striking to a degree of intensity that only genius could produce, its form is clear and comprehensible, and its instrumentation magnificent. It was listened to with that rapt attention which immediately proclaims the presence of really great thoughts, and the enthusiasm at the close showed how its beauty had been appreciated. Although no further "programme" than its title is appended to the work, it is surely a most successful piece of "programme music," for without endeavoring to represent all manner of impossible details the fiery Russian succeeds in imbuing his listeners with the general sentiment of the great love poem, and this is the true mission of this style of composition.

The clarinets and bassoons announce a melancholy theme, which may perhaps be called the "Romeo" theme. The whole of the first part of the work (andante non tanto) is given up to the treatment and development of this theme, and here, at the very outset, we find originality of thought which is surprising. The manner in which the voices are led indicates a true contrapuntal feeling, which, however, expresses itself in new forms and phases, and this whole division of the work is very beautiful in instrumental color. What might be called the second division of the work (allegro giusto) introduces a new theme, with a remarkably strong and unusual rhythm; all the resources of the modern orchestra are brought into play, the strings throw off stormy passages while the brasses and the wood-wind, as it were, attack one another with conflicting rhythm. It is easy to see that the composer intends to represent the deadly feud between the Montagues and the Capulets, and from the "programme-music" point of view stated above this portion of the work is particularly successful. Presently the storm of angry words and clashing swords dies away and the rough rhythms merge into soft and low pulsations.

But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?
It is the east, and Juliet is the sun!

This new theme—the "Juliet" theme, if we may call it so—is a singularly lovely melody and is first announced by the plaintive English horns, with the muted violins. It is followed by a passage for all the strings, the last phrase of which presently appears in the horns as a throbbing, passionate counter, subject to the "Juliet" theme, which is now given to the wood-wind. We are only permitted, however, to cast a passing glance at the two lovers; the quarrel between the two houses breaks out again and wages more fiercely than before. This part of the work is like a compendium of modern instrumentation: it is exceedingly effective, and introduces many new and striking instrumental combinations. Softer emotions at last prevail, and then suddenly the "Juliet" theme appears again, given to all the strings in an overpowering cantabile, while the horns again bring the persistent, pulsing counter-subject as before. It is difficult to describe the simply superb effort of this passage—surely it is one of the most magnificent products of modern music. It is impossible to resist the power of the situation. At last the music dies away and we hear the sad notes of a funeral song. The drums roll loudly and the great, broad chords ring out like a benediction—

Go hence, to have more talk of these sad things;
Some shall be pardon'd and some punished,
For never was a story of more woe
Than this of Juliet and her Romeo.

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY [illegible]

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 9, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Feb. 8. M. Loeffler Soloist.

For the 16th of the season's series of symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented a programme made up of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Lalo's symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra, op. 21; Nicode's symphonic variations, op. 27, and Massenet's overture "Phedre." The "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the Nicode variations were the novelties of the evening, the first named composition having its first performance here on this occasion, and the last its first hearing in these concerts. The Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, has not given any outline of his intentions in the overture other than to state on its title page that it is "after Shakespeare," thus leaving the listener to avoid a tendency to "dilate with the wrong emotion" by his or her own imagination as to the meaning of the various parts of the work. It is dedicated to M. M. Balakireff, a composer of the Russian school, and is scored for full modern orchestra, including piccolo, English horn, cymbals, great drum, and harp. A single hearing of such a composition leaves but little idea of the intent and purpose of the composer. It is a masterly work, so far as it illustrates the ability of its author to use skilfully all the resources of the modern orchestra, but in the, at times excessive display of tone color, the outline of the picture is made indistinct. There are many evidences of the dramatic strength of the composer in this overture, but the love scenes, which have been made so much of in other musical treatments of this subject, find but little prominence in this. There are many evidences of the melodious turn of the composer, and there is the same distinct individuality in the leading characteristics of the work that is found in all of Tschaikowsky's writing. The overture is certainly an interesting composition, and a further hearing of it might give a better impression of its value as a descriptive work. Mr. Nikisch was somewhat unfortunate in the selection of the numbers to complete this programme, for there was a great similarity and characteristics of the remaining works lack of contrast in the remaining selections that, despite the good work done by the orchestra throughout the evening, the concert proved a wearisome one. The Lalo "Symphonie" was again as thoroughly enjoyed as when heard at these concerts a few seasons ago, upon the occasion of its introduction to America by Mr. Loeffler, whose style it is so admirably suited to. Its graceful charactistics, charming themes and national peculiarities were all given due prominence by the soloist, and he has never made a more gratifying exhibition of his value as a player, than in this performance. He was most enthusiastically applauded for his effort, and called again and again to bow his thanks for this commendation. Had the Nicode variations been more happily placed, their enjoyment by the audience would have been greatly heightened. They were finely played throughout, and the first flute and leading violin passages were given with remarkable purity of tone and with rare expression. The Massenet overture afforded a great relief to the generally monotonous character of the evening's selections, and it was played with fine effect throughout. The orchestra makes its third Atlantic coast tour the coming week, appearing at New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

Clipping No. [illegible]

Clipping from Times Phila Pa

Date [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Gives a Widely-Assorted Programme.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night before a very large audience at the Academy of Music, proved one of the most interesting of the season. The programme included three novelties and one classic work, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony. Massanet's "Phedre" overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective. The "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, for violin and orchestra, is hardly a symphony, though it is in four movements. It is a conscientious treatment of themes presumably Spanish, and though it begins rather aimlessly the later movements are exceedingly poetical and graceful. The solo part was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler with great purity of tone and smoothness of execution, and the performance won warm applause.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is a fanciful bit of writing that served best to show the discipline of the orchestra. If delicacy of execution is the test of a conductor, as many persons seem to think, Mr. Nikisch may be said to have beaten the record of Mr. Gericke. The extraordinary pianissimo of the funeral march made the audience enthusiastic and the accurate bang of the cymbals in the final movement awakened such plaudits that Mr. Nikisch was compelled to give this Berliozesque bit over again.

It was a peculiar judgment that placed this theatrical claptrap immediately before the Symphony, but perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought it would make his audience appreciate Mendelssohn the more. It should have done so and it certainly had that effect upon some, but not on those that made the loudest noise.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Loeffler as Soloist—Notes.

Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," which began the concert, may have been a Russian view of Shakespeare's tragedy, but there was little in it that spoke of either love or longing; on the contrary, all was contention and strife—a picture of Montagues and Capulets, but not of the passionate lovers. Thus it might quite as well have been labelled "Macbeth," and possibly it would have portrayed that subject even better than the more tender theme chosen. The shortcoming in the matter of passion would stand out in bold relief were the work compared with Berlioz's glowing masterpiece. There are few pictures of passion that can equal the balcony scene as it is expressed in tones by the French master, in his symphony, and while it would be unjust to demand the same fervor from Tschaikowsky, yet the absolute lack of it cannot be altogether condoned. There were some mournful touches in the work which were quite impressive, especially as they were given on the English horn in a perfect manner. But in the tumultuous passages the kettle drums took the most prominent part. In fact this humble instrument is just now enjoying a period of unmitigated revelry, and it is more generally in the foreground than ever before.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and played Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a sort of concerto-suite, with musicianly power. Especially commendable was his work on the G string, which was broad and powerful beyond any of his recent efforts. The finale was the finest and most characteristic number; it is a Habanera with a carillon-like figure in the accompaniment, that is as piquant as any Musette could be. It reminded a little of some portions of Bizet's Suites Arlesiennes. The audience certainly appreciated Mr. Loeffler's work, for he was recalled four times amid a storm of applause. He deserved the tribute, for he has never appeared to better advantage. It is pleasant to have so much of national music in these concerts, and it proves that Mr. Nikisch is likely to give the pregrammes greater scope than they have had in the last five years. The fact that Massenet's name appeared on the list, shows that the French school is not to be ignored as it has been. Massenet is the most representative composer of the younger French school, and his works are full of interest, well scored in a modern manner, and worthy of the attention of the cultured student. The work which closed the programme was by him. It was the overture to "Phedre," and was lofty in theme and interesting in treatment. It was finely read and played, the portentous dissonances being given with massive power, and the fierce phrases of the end (how finely the piccolo is used in these!) being very effective. The clarinet did excellent work in this number.

After Massenet we may hope for some of Bizet's works, which have too long been kept in outer darkness, and for the relaxing of the lines which formerly excluded so many different schools of composition, we owe thanks to Mr. Nikisch.

A set of symphonic variations by Nicodé was another interesting feature of the programme. While not attaining the breadth or ingenuity of Brahms, the set yet served to display the various instruments in detail. Again the kettle drums made up for the years of repression, but at least there were other more important instruments which shared in the honors. The flute had especial prominence in many parts of the variations, and it was played with artistic excellence; the muted strings in the eighth variation were perfect in ensemble and shading; the trumpet had some brilliant phrases, which were given with great brio; the harp and the horn were commendably effective, but the culmination of excellence was in the duet between violin and 'cello, which Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking played with exquisite shading. The work was much applauded, and was certainly agreeable, although not great.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last evening was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme was one calling for no extended comment, though providing a sufficiently interesting entertainment. The list consisted of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 in the Breitkopf & Härtel catalogue, Liszt's A major piano concerto, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and it is only necessary to say that this great artist did himself justice. He was recalled five times and finally compelled to respond to the enthusiastic demand of the audience by playing a Chopin nocturne. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was superb. The criticism so frequently made in Boston that Mr. Nikisch has sacrificed some of the finish of this organization's playing to dramatic expressiveness is undoubtedly true, but he has sacrificed very little and gained a great deal. It is not likely that any save the keenest and most exacting hearers perceived much loss of polish in the rendering of the "Peer Gynt" suite, while the splendid masculinity and vigor which the orchestra now has was enough to carry so uneven and at times repulsive a work as the Tschaikowsky composition.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the sixteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Lalo: Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, Op. 21.

Nicodé: Symphonic Variations, Op. 27.

Massenet: Overture to "Phèdre."

Mr. C. M. Loffler was the violinist.

It is some time since we have indulged ourselves in a growl over programmes, so, as the occasion seems propitious, we will do a little growling now. Let us cast a glance over the last two programmes, and the next one, to be performed on Saturday evening, Feb. 22. These three consecutive programmes give us, for symphonies, Raff's "An das Vaterland" and Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony; for overtures, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Massenet's Phèdre," and Weber's "Oberon;" for concertos, Lalo's Spanish symphony and Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto; for miscellaneous works, the Bach-Abert fugue, etc., Wagner's Huldigungs-Marsch, and Nicodé's symphonic variations. This is to say, that, in three consecutive concerts the names of Hayden, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann—the chief standbys, the composers who should form the nucleus in a course of symphony concerts—are wholly unrepresented. Moreover, in these three concerts the two symphonies and one of the overtures are given "for the first time in Boston," and the other works are, with the exception of the "Oberon" overture, if not exactly new, very unfamiliar here. Add to this that, of the ten composers represented, only four are Germans (counting Bach-Abert as one), and one can begin to appreciate how extraordinary these three programmes are. We would be the last to deprecate the introduction of novelties in symphony concerts—programmes cannot go on forever rotating in the same old circle, and there must be a first time for everything: neither would we urge the exclusion non-German composers from them, for France, Hungary, Russia, Italy, England and America have done enough in the field of orchestral music to make it interesting to hear them from time to time. Still, what these countries have produced in the way of orchestral composition is so inconspicuous, compared with what has been produced by Germany, and stands, in general, upon so far lower an artistic level, that the fitness of German music to occupy the larger place in symphony concerts can hardly be disputed. It is well to be interested in the doings of the musical world at large, and to have one's natural curiosity satisfied; but in concerts of every sort the element of pure musical enjoyment is manifestly important, and few people, if any, can enjoy a new composition as thoroughly as they do a familiar one, and our enjoyment of works of talent and cleverness can never be as deep and satisfying as the delight we get from works which bespeak true genius and consummate mastery. And here we have three consecutive concerts, bringing with them ten different compositions, and only one single work among them all—Weber's "Oberon" overture—that can, by any stretching of terms, be called a masterpiece! From such concerts, no matter how interesting they may be, one comes away hungry; by Feb. 22, Boston will not have had an orchestral square meal; anything really nourishing of the symphonic sort for over a month. This is a state of things against which a protest should not be deemed unreasonable; and we, therefore, do protest, with all the energy that comes from starvation.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has aroused immense enthusiasm in many members of the orchestra, and, judging from its reception last Saturday evening, many people in the audience shared their admiration. Even at a first hearing we can see moments of power, brilliancy and, now and then, even of beauty in the work; but, to our mind, by far the greater part of it is hideous, extravagant or tedious. There is, in particular, a descending passage in the horns of absolutely dismal persistency, which recalls nothing so vividly as the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition. Something penal might be done with that phrase; the prospect of having to hear it often would deter a man from committing the most seductive crime. We have heard some people say that this composition sounds better the second time than the first; good heavens! we hope it does, for at a first hearing it is horror incarnate. Nicodé's variations are a work of considerable strength—save in the more sentimental portions, where the composer falls rather into the commonplace—and one can listen to it with sincere pleasure. Massenet's "Phédre" overture seeems pretty well beneath criticism; it is certainly as vulgar as need be.

Mr. Loeffler played the Lalo Spanish symphony even more admirably than he did two years ago. His technique and purity of intonation go without saying; and the vitality, vigor of accent and winning grace of his performance can hardly be praised too highly. In parts of the slow movement he rose to a great hight of power and sonlful expressiveness. The composition itself, however, fascinating as it was when Mr. Laeffler first played it here, already shows signs of wear; a third performance would leave it threadbare.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Liszt, concerto No. 2, in A; C. Villiers Stanford, "Irish" symphony. Mr. Raphael Joseffy will be the pianist.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1890.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Soloist.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Tschaikowsky. ...Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet" (First time in Boston.)

Lalo..Symphonie espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21
- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Scherzando.
- IV. Andante.
- V. Rondo.

Nicodé.....Symphonic variations, op. 27 (First time at these concerts.)

Massenet.....Overture, "Phedre"

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist.

Here's a list of youngsters, all of whom have something to say: Tschaikowsky, a veritable genius with the orchestra, whose speech is darksomely tragic and at times extraordinarily effective; Lalo, a dapper little chap, clever, winsome and imbued with native Spanish color, that absolutely prevents his being anything but charming; Nicodé, a bit reflective who writes with the neatest possible touch, and Massenet, reading a tragic legend with an undeniable French accent. These composers furnished one of the most interesting concerts of the season.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" is less great than that of Berlioz, but the intrepid Russian draws a bold pen, and depicts the sterner side of the great love-drama with masterly touch. There are portions of the work as exciting as are few things in modern music; the instrumentation throughout is wonderfully expressive of the mood. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the work brought a remarkable performance; the fire and fury, the briefer softer movements were mirrored with a consummate touch; at every step the playing was superb. The Necodé variations, though generally unsymphonic, are most skilfully made, and betray much that is lovely in tint and gentle of spirit. Here also the orchestra acquitted itself with even excellence. Massenet's overture was well performed.

Mr. Loeffler never makes a mistake in choosing what is best adapted to his style, in fact, he always succeeds emphatically. The Lalo piece, whose introduction here two seasons ago we owe to Mr. Loeffler, displays this artist's facile technique and grace of style to perfection. Mr. Loeffler's performance of it, won him new laurels. At its conclusion he was enthusiastically applauded, and compelled to return to the stage three times to satisfy admiring hundreds.

There will be no concert this week. The programme for Feb. 22, is: Overture "Oberon," Weber; concerto for piano, in A major, No. 2, Liszt; symphony "Irish," C. V. Stanford. Mr. Raffael Joseffy will be the pianist.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1890.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last evening—the third and last but one of the series—drew an overflowing audience, and was, at all points, the most brilliant orchestral affair of the season. The programme was the brightest yet interpeted, the work of the band combined precision and expressiveness in a degree no other orchestral body has of late attained to, and the performance of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the soloist of the occasion, gave unmixed satisfaction. Very seldom indeed have excellence and attractiveness been so happily united in a form of entertainment that is not infrequently more edifying than attractive. The numbers on the house bill were: 1—Symphony in G major, No. 13 (B and H) Haydn; 2—Concerto in A, No. 2, Liszt; 3—Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; 4—"Romeo and Juliet" ouverture fantaisie, Tschaikowsky.

Of the compositions chosen for interpretation Grieg's music and Liszt's concerto diffused most pleasure. The suite of the Scandinavian master consists of a reduction of the score written for the production on the stage of Ibsen's dramatic poem bearing the same title. Its four movements—"Daybreak," an allegretto pastorale; "The Death of Aase," an andante doloroso; "Anitra's Dance," a tempo di mazurka, and "The Hall of the Mountain King," an alla marcia—are all distinguished by imaginativeness, by clearly defined and characteristically northern themes, and by delicate and scholarly treatment, as unlike the restless and confusing workmanship of the advanced German and Russian school as the fjords of Grieg's native land are unlike the storm-tossed waters of the northern seas. The pure beauty of the opening movement and the lively grotesquerie of the last, a repetition of which was insisted upon, were most admired, but the impression of the Suite as a whole was so good that "Peer Gynt" is sure to be played again and again. In the well-known concerto, Mr. Rafael Joseffy was heard to greater advantage than for many months past. The pianist, in acquiring breadth and power, has lost, perhaps, a little of his old-time delicacy, but in passages requiring a poetic fancy and dainty execution, he is still far ahead of all resident pianists, and last night he was not lacking in freedom or in force. It is not too much to say that he proved himself quite adquate to the composition, which, through its varying moods, its unbroken continuity, and its exceptional technical difficulties, demands of its interpreter gifts and acquirements of no ordinary kind. Mr. Joseffy could not escape the encore that was bound to follow the concerto, and he responded to it with a nocturne of Chopin's.

The Haydn symphony that stood at the head of the house bill was rendered with the sprightliness, the severe simplicity, and the liveliness its principal tempi called for respectively, and the Tschaikowsky piece, with which the concert came to a close, was given with fine variety of accent and tonal color. Still, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture might bear any other title for all that can be discerned in its measures. The exuberant fancy of modern writers in general and of Russian [illegible] is scarcely in accord

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 15, 1890.

Third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston orchestra still proves a prime attraction, and their concerts at Steinway Hall draw large audiences that are friendly in their disposition toward our accomplished neighbors. While Herr Nikisch has not made a complete capture of the New York public, he has his friends and admirers who insist that he is a far better conductor than Gericke, but it would always be better did they not have to insist.

The programme was the lightest yet presented by them. Haydn's symphony in G major (No. 13 Breitkopf and Härtell) opened the concert, and was exceedingly well played by the band. Haydn always gave the chief portion of his work to the strings, and the strings of the Boston orchestra are perhaps the most perfectly trained of any in the country.

Grieg's charming suite, "Peer Gynt," with its deliciously unique harmonic, combinations and quaint Northern melodies, was another of the four programme numbers. Here Mr. Nikisch was plainly at home, and his reading of these delightful tone pictures was full of poetic charm and originality. We were most favorably impressed by its beauties when Mr. Thomas first brought it out at Chickering Hall thirteen months ago. Of its four numbers we then wrote: "The first is Morning—not the rich, glowing morning of the South, with its choir of birds singing tribute to the tropical beauty of the sunrise, but the silent and coldly glittering beauty of the North, as the sun arises, with its dazzlingly white rays reflected back from every tiny crystal that sparkles on the frozen surface of the mantle of white that clothes the earth's surface. That the music was Wagnerian in character detracted nothing from its beauty; and, after all, the similarity lay altogether in the use of the strings, upon which Wagner is supposed to have a patent, when employed in those high and prolonged quaverings that he has used to such good advantage in all his later works.

The second number, a brief minor sketch of pathetic import, entitled, "The Death of Asa," is a tone poem, sad, but sweet. The third, "Anitra's Dance," with muted strings, is as dainty as a fairy dancing in the moon beams; no mortal could trip to such exquisite measures. Of different material is the fourth movement, "In the Hall of the Mountain King." The horns give a quirk at the most unexpected moment, the cymbals clash with a discordant jar, the unique measure is rushing along at a dizzy pace, and all is enlivened by the sudden pranks of the tricky gnomes of the underground world. It effectually stirred up the hearers, who applauded vociferously.

Mr. Joseffy, who has not been heard much in New York of late, was the soloist of the evening. He played Liszt's well-known concerto in A, No. 2. It is to be regretted that an artist like Mr. Joseffy, whose talents lie so far above the numerous race of piano thumpers who have contrived to overrun the country of late, should condescend to their trickery, and pander to the depraved taste that accepts the greatest show for the greatest art. Mr. Joseffy can play with more true refinement, delicacy and artistic inspiration than most pianists, but when he plays Liszt he thumps just as badly as though music had no meaning for his soul beyond seeing how much noise could be extracted, and how many notes could be ground out in the shortest space of time.

Tschaikowski's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," is worthy of more than the brief comment we can give it. This work is a deeply interesting one to students of orchestration and is conceived in a true poetic vein, while its harmonies are effective and at times strikingly original. We hope to meet with it again in the programmes of our symphonic concerts as it will well bear frequent hearings. The overture was played with rare finish and made a lasting impression.

[73]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Loeffler as Soloist—Notes.

Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," which began the concert, may have been a Russian view of Shakespeare's tragedy, but there was little in it that spoke of either love or longing; on the contrary, all was contention and strife—a picture of Montagues and Capulets, but not of the passionate lovers. Thus it might quite as well have been labelled "Macbeth," and possibly it would have portrayed that subject even better than the more tender theme chosen. The shortcoming in the matter of passion would stand out in bold relief were the work compared with Berlioz's glowing masterpiece. There are few pictures of passion that can equal the balcony scene as it is expressed in tones by the French master, in his symphony, and while it would be unjust to demand the same fervor from Tschaikowsky, yet the absolute lack of it cannot be altogether condoned. There were some mournful touches in the work which were quite impressive, especially as they were given on the English horn in a perfect manner. But in the tumultuous passages the kettle drums took the most prominent part. In fact this humble instrument is just now enjoying a period of unmitigated revelry, and it is more generally in the foreground than ever before.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and played Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a sort of concerto-suite, with musicianly power. Especially commendable was his work on the G string, which was broad and powerful beyond any of his recent efforts. The finale was the finest and most characteristic number; it is a Habanera with a carillon-like figure in the accompaniment, that is as piquant as any Musette could be. It reminded a little of some portions of Bizet's Suites Arlesiennes. The audience certainly appreciated Mr. Loeffler's work, for he was recalled four times amid a storm of applause. He deserved the tribute, for he has never appeared to better advantage. It is pleasant to have so much of national music in these concerts, and it proves that Mr. Nikisch is likely to give the programmes greater scope than they have had in the last five years. The fact that Massenet's name appeared on the list, shows that the French school is not to be ignored as it has been. Massenet is the most representative composer of the younger French school, and his works are full of interest, well scored in a modern manner, and worthy of the attention of the cultured student. The work which closed the programme was by him. It was the overture to "Phedre," and was lofty in theme and interesting in treatment. It was finely read and played, the portentous dissonances being given with massive power, and the fierce phrases of the end (how finely the piccolo is used in these!) being very effective. The clarinet did excellent work in this number.

After Massenet we may hope for some of Bizet's works, which have too long been kept in outer darkness, and for the relaxing of the lines which formerly excluded so many different schools of composition, we owe thanks to Mr. Nikisch.

A set of symphonic variations by Nicodé was another interesting feature of the programme. While not attaining the breadth or ingenuity of Brahms, the set yet served to display the various instruments in detail. Again the kettle drums made up for the years of repression, but at least there were other more important instruments which shared in the honors. The flute had especial prominence in many parts of the variations, and it was played with artistic excellence; the muted strings in the eighth variation were perfect in ensemble and shading; the trumpet had some brilliant phrases, which were given with great brio; the harp and the horn were commendably effective, but the culmination of excellence was in the duet between violin and 'cello, which Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking played with exquisite shading. The work was much applauded, and was certainly agreeable, although not great.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last evening was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme was one calling for no extended comment, though providing a sufficiently interesting entertainment. The list consisted of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13 in the Breitkopf & Härtel catalogue, Liszt's A major piano concerto, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and it is only necessary to say that this great artist did himself justice. He was recalled five times and finally compelled to respond to the enthusiastic demand of the audience by playing a Chopin nocturne. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was superb. The criticism so frequently made in Boston that Mr. Nikisch has sacrificed some of the finish of this organization's playing to dramatic expressiveness is undoubtedly true, but he has sacrificed very little and gained a great deal. It is not likely that any save the keenest and most exacting hearers perceived much loss of polish in the rendering of the "Peer Gynt" suite, while the splendid masculinity and vigor which the orchestra now has was enough to carry so uneven and at times repulsive a work as the Tschaikowsky composition.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the sixteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Lalo: Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, Op. 21.

Nicodé: Symphonic Variations, Op. 27.

Massenet: Overture to "Phèdre."

Mr. C. M. Loffler was the violinist.

It is some time since we have indulged ourselves in a growl over programmes, so, as the occasion seems propitious, we will do a little growling now. Let us cast a glance over the last two programmes, and the next one, to be performed on Saturday evening, Feb. 22. These three consecutive programmes give us, for symphonies, Raff's "An das Vaterland" and Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony; for overtures, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Massenet's Phèdre," and Weber's "Oberon;" for concertos, Lalo's Spanish symphony and Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto; for miscellaneous works, the Bach-Abert fugue, etc., Wagner's Huldigungs-Marsch, and Nicodé's symphonic variations. This is to say, that, in three consecutive concerts the names of Hayden, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann—the chief standbys, the composers who should form the nucleus in a course of symphony concerts—are wholly unrepresented. Moreover, in these three concerts the two symphonies and one of the overtures are given "for the first time in Boston," and the other works are, with the exception of the "Oberon" overture, if not exactly new, very unfamiliar here. Add to this that, of the ten composers represented, only four are Germans (counting Bach-Abert as one), and one can begin to appreciate how extraordinary these three programmes are. We would be the last to deprecate the introduction of novelties in symphony concerts—programmes cannot go on forever rotating in the same old circle, and there must be a first time for everything: neither would we urge the exclusion non German composers from them, for France, Hungary, Russia, Italy, England and America have done enough in the field of orchestral music to make it interesting to hear them from time to time. Still, what these countries have produced in the way of orchestral composition is so inconspicuous, compared with what has been produced by Germany, and stands, in general, upon so far lower an artistic level, that the fitness of German music to occupy the larger place in symphony concerts can hardly be disputed. It is well to be interested in the doings of the musical world at large, and to have one's natural curiosity satisfied; but in concerts of every sort the element of pure musical enjoyment is manifestly important, and few people, if any, can enjoy a new composition as thoroughly as they do a familiar one, and our enjoyment of works of talent and cleverness can never be as deep and satisfying as the delight we get from works which bespeak true genius and consummate mastery. And here we have three consecutive concerts, bringing with them ten different compositions, and only one single work among them all—Weber's "Oberon" overture—that can, by any stretching of terms, be called a masterpiece! From such concerts, no matter how interesting they may be, one comes away hungry; by Feb. 22, Boston will not have had an orchestral square meal; anything really nourishing of the symphonic sort for over a month. This is a state of things against which a protest should not be deemed unreasonable; and we, therefore, do protest, with all the energy that comes from starvation.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has aroused immense enthusiasm in many members of the orchestra, and, judging from its reception last Saturday evening, many people in the audience shared their admiration. Even at a first hearing we can see moments of power, brilliancy and, now and then, even of beauty in the work; but, to our mind, by far the greater part of it is hideous, extravagant or tedious. There is, in particular, a descending passage in the horns of absolutely dismal persistency, which recalls nothing so vividly as the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition. Something penal might be done with that phrase; the prospect of having to hear it often would deter a man from committing the most seductive crime. We have heard some people say that this composition sounds better the second time than the first; good heavens! we hope it does, for at a first hearing it is horror incarnate. Nicodé's variations are a work of considerable strength—save in the more sentimental portions, where the composer falls rather into the commonplace—and one can listen to it with sincere pleasure. Massenet's "Phédre" overture seeems pretty well beneath criticism; it is certainly as vulgar as need be.

Mr. Loeffler played the Lalo Spanish symphony even more admirably than he did two years ago. His technique and purity of intonation go without saying; and the vitality, vigor of accent and winning grace of his performance can hardly be praised too highly. In parts of the slow movement he rose to a great hight of power and soulful expressiveness. The composition itself, however, fascinating as it was when Mr. Laeffler first played it here, already shows signs of wear; a third performance would leave it threadbare.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Liszt, concerto No. 2, in A; C. Villiers Stanford, "Irish" symphony. Mr. Raphael Joseffy will be the pianist.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1890.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Soloist.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Tschaikowsky. ...Overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet" (First time in Boston.)

Lalo..Symphonie espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo.

Nicodé..... Symphonic variations, op. 27 (First time at these concerts.)

Massenet.....Overture, "Phedre"

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist.

Here's a list of youngsters, all of whom have something to say: Tschaikowsky, a veritable genius with the orchestra, whose speech is darksomely tragic and at times extraordinarily effective; Lalo, a dapper little chap, clever, winsome and imbued with native Spanish color, that absolutely prevents his being anything but charming; Nicodé, a bit reflective who writes with the neatest possible touch, and Massenet, reading a tragic legend with an undeniable French accent. These composers furnished one of the most interesting concerts of the season.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" is less great than that of Berlioz, but the intrepid Russian draws a bold pen, and depicts the sterner side of the great love-drama with masterly touch. There are portions of the work as exciting as are few things in modern music; the instrumentation throughout is wonderfully expressive of the mood. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the work brought a remarkable performance; the fire and fury, the briefer softer movements were mirrored with a consummate touch; at every step the playing was superb. The Necodé variations, though generally unsymphonic, are most skilfully made, and betray much that is lovely in tint and gentle of spirit. Here also the orchestra acquitted itself with even excellence. Massenet's overture was well performed.

Mr. Loeffler never makes a mistake in choosing what is best adapted to his style, in fact, he always succeeds emphatically. The Lalo piece, whose introduction here two seasons ago we owe to Mr. Loeffler, displays this artist's facile technique and grace of style to perfection. Mr. Loeffler's performance of it, won him new laurels. At its conclusion he was enthusiastically applauded, and compelled to return to the stage three times to satisfy admiring hundreds.

There will be no concert this week. The programme for Feb. 22, is: Overture "Oberon," Weber; concerto for piano, in A major, No. 2, Liszt; symphony "Irish," C. V. Stanford. Mr. Raffael Joseffy will be the pianist.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1890.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last evening—the third and last but one of the series—drew an overflowing audience, and was, at all points, the most brilliant orchestral affair of the season. The programme was the brightest yet interpeted, the work of the band combined precision and expressiveness in a degree no other orchestral body has of late attained to, and the performance of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the soloist of the occasion, gave unmixed satisfaction. Very seldom indeed have excellence and attractiveness been so happily united in a form of entertainment that is not infrequently more edifying than attractive. The numbers on the house bill were: 1—Symphony in G major, No. 13 (B and H) Haydn; 2—Concerto in A, No. 2, Liszt; 3—Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; 4—"Romeo and Juliet" ouverture fantaisie, Tschaikowsky.

Of the compositions chosen for interpretation Grieg's music and Liszt's concerto diffused most pleasure. The suite of the Scandinavian master consists of a reduction of the score written for the production on the stage of Ibsen's dramatic poem bearing the same title. Its four movements—"Daybreak," an allegretto pastorale; "The Death of Aase," an andante doloroso; "Anitra's Dance," a tempo di mazurka, and "The Hall of the Mountain King," an olla marcia—are all distinguished by imaginativeness, by clearly defined and characteristically northern themes, and by delicate and scholarly treatment, as unlike the restless and confusing workmanship of the advanced German and Russian school as the fjords of Grieg's native land are unlike the storm-tossed waters of the northern seas. The pure beauty of the opening movement and the lively grotesquerie of the last, a repetition of which was insisted upon, were most admired, but the impression of the Suite as a whole was so good that "Peer Gynt" is sure to be played again and again. In the well-known concerto, Mr. Rafael Joseffy was heard to greater advantage than for many months past. The pianist, in acquiring breadth and power, has lost, perhaps, a little of his old-time delicacy, but in passages requiring a poetic fancy and dainty execution, he is still far ahead of all resident pianists, and last night he was not lacking in freedom or in force. It is not too much to say that he proved himself quite adquate to the composition, which, through its varying moods, its unbroken continuity, and its exceptional technical difficulties, demands of its interpreter gifts and acquirements of no ordinary kind. Mr. Joseffy could not escape the encore that was bound to follow the concerto, and he responded to it with a nocturne of Chopin's.

The Haydn symphony that stood at the head of the house bill was rendered with the sprightliness, the severe simplicity, and the liveliness its principal tempi called for respectively, and the Tschaikowsky piece, with which the concert came to a close, was given with fine variety of accent and tonal color. Still, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture might bear any other title for all that can be discerned in its measures. The exuberant fancy of modern writers in general and of Russian musicians in particular is scarcely in accord

---

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 15, 1890.

[73]

Third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston orchestra still proves a prime attraction, and their concerts at Steinway Hall draw large audiences that are friendly in their disposition toward our accomplished neighbors. While Herr Nikisch has not made a complete capture of the New York public, he has his friends and admirers who insist that he is a far better conductor than Gericke, but it would always be better did they not have to insist.

The programme was the lightest yet presented by them. Haydn's symphony in G major (No. 13 Breitkopf and Härtell) opened the concert, and was exceedingly well played by the band. Haydn always gave the chief portion of his work to the strings, and the strings of the Boston orchestra are perhaps the most perfectly trained of any in the country.

Grieg's charming suite, "Peer Gynt," with its deliciously unique harmonic, combinations and quaint Northern melodies, was another of the four programme numbers. Here Mr. Nikisch was plainly at home, and his reading of these delightful tone pictures was full of poetic charm and originality. We were most favorably impressed by its beauties when Mr. Thomas first brought it out at Chickering Hall thirteen months ago. Of its four numbers we then wrote: "The first is Morning—not the rich, glowing morning of the South, with its choir of birds singing tribute to the tropical beauty of the sunrise, but the silent and coldly glittering beauty of the North, as the sun arises, with its dazzlingly white rays reflected back from every tiny crystal that sparkles on the frozen surface of the mantle of white that clothes the earth's surface. That the music was Wagnerian in character detracted nothing from its beauty; and, after all, the similarity lay altogether in the use of the strings, upon which Wagner is supposed to have a patent, when employed in those high and prolonged quaverings that he has used to such good advantage in all his later works.

The second number, a brief minor sketch of pathetic import, entitled, "The Death of Asa," is a tone poem, sad, but sweet. The third, "Anitra's Dance," with muted strings, is as dainty as a fairy dancing in the moonbeams; no mortal could trip to such exquisite measures. Of different material is the fourth movement, "In the Hall of the Mountain King." The horns give a quirk at the most unexpected moment, the cymbals clash with a discordant jar, the unique measure is rushing along at a dizzy pace, and all is enlivened by the sudden pranks of the tricky gnomes of the underground world. It effectually stirred up the hearers, who applauded vociferously.

Mr. Joseffy, who has not been heard much in New York of late, was the soloist of the evening. He played Liszt's well-known concerto in A, No. 2. It is to be regretted that an artist like Mr. Joseffy, whose talents lie so far above the numerous race of piano thumpers who have contrived to overrun the country of late, should condescend to their trickery, and pander to the depraved taste that accepts the greatest show for the greatest art. Mr. Joseffy can play with more true refinement, delicacy and artistic inspiration than most pianists, but when he plays Liszt he thumps just as badly as though music had no meaning for his soul beyond seeing how much noise could be extracted, and how many notes could be ground out in the shortest space of time.

Tschaikowski's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," is worthy of more than the brief comment we can give it. This work is a deeply interesting one to students of orchestration and is conceived in a true poetic vein, while its harmonies are effective and at times strikingly original. We hope to meet with it again in the programmes of our symphonic concerts as it will well bear frequent hearings. The overture was played with rare finish and made a lasting impression.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1890.

Another Successful Tour of the Boston Orchestra.

The Organ Issue at Music Hall and Its Effect—Facts About the Worcester Festival and Common Sense Comments on Its Programmes—Concerts of the Week—News and Gossip.

The third of the season's tours by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, has occupied the time of this organization during the week just ended, and again the record made has been one most gratifying to local pride. The concerts of the tour have been given in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and, in addition to the high degree of artistic success attained, it is pleasant to know that the financial results of the tour have materially exceeded those of any former visit of the orchestra to the several cities named. The concerts given in the city of Philadelphia by the orchestra have come to be almost duplicates of the Boston concerts in the size and character of the audiences that attend, and the interest shown in the success of the visits of the organization almost equals that attending the regular home appearances of the orchestra. The entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music is utilized in the Philadelphia concerts, even the top gallery being crowded by the same enthusiastic class of music lovers as that found patiently waiting the opening of the Music Hall doors for the Friday rehearsals here. In Washington the orchestra has simply got the following of the very best elements in society circles, and its appearances there are honored by the attendance of immense audiences in full dress. The New York concerts call out a general attendance of all the musical notabilities of that city, and so it will be seen that the Boston orchestra is winning a firm hold upon the musical publics of all these cities. A curious feature of the tour has been the universal favor with which the "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, has been received, and the verdict of the Boston audiences on this work has been repeated in each one of the cities visited, the rule regarding encores having been necessarily ignored wherever it has been played. The Boston critic who pronounced the "Phedre" overture "vulgar" has been shown to be at odds with his fellow scribes in Philadelphia who have heard this charming composition of the French school, for one of the ablest musical writers there says of this overture: "Massenet's overture is a striking piece of composition, full of dignity and a weird feeling which fits the subject it exemplified. It is scored in a very musicianly manner, and displays no lack of ideas or of power to develop them"; while another equally competent critic wrote of it: "Massenet's 'Phedre' overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective." Joseffy, the pianist, was the soloist at the New York concert and, when complimented upon his performance of the Liszt concerto No. 2, said: "Who could not play with such an accompaniment as your orchestra?" a comment which means much coming from a pianist who has had such superb accompaniments in his time. Altogether, this third tour has been a remarkable one for the Boston orchestra, and it is universally conceded that Mr. Nikisch has supplemented his successes at the head of his organization by gaining general favor in the best musical and social circles wherever the orchestra has appeared.

NEW YORK HERALD
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12,

APPLAUDING BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

The third of the series of four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives in Steinway Hall this winter took place last night in the presence of an audience of unusual size and was applauded with more than common warmth.

Perhaps it was in order to show that the orchestra has lost none of the delicacy and nice balance of parts for which it became famous under his predecessor that Mr. Nikisch began last night's concert with Haydn's archaic symphony, No. 13, in G major, for the choice can scarcely be explained otherwise. Certainly it was well played, far better in all probability than Father Haydn ever heard it played, but it was scarcely worth while.

Mr. Joseffy, who has seldom played better, gave a spirited and dignified interpretation of Liszt's A major concerto, one of the things he does best, and was deservedly applauded with such persistent heartiness that he had to play again.

The second part of the programme consisted of Grieg's quaint suite, "Peer Gynt," with which Mr. Thomas has made New York familiar, and an overture of Tschaikowsky entitled "Romeo and Juliet." In the "Perr Gynt" suite, which consists of selections from the music that Gregg wrote for Ibsen's drama of that name, the orchestra did wonders and gave a performance really remarkable for finish and technical brilliancy.

The Tschsakowsky overture is sombre work, but of decided interest, in the immense difficulties of which the orchestra revelled.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, Feb. 13, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Lincoln Music Hall,
Washington
SEASON OF 1889–90.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Second Concert,
Thursday Evening, February 13,
At 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark - - - - - - Overture, "Sakuntala"

Brahms - - - First Movement from Concerto in D, Op. 77

For Violin and Orchestra. Allegro non troppo.—Cadenza written by Mr. Kneisel.
* (First Time.)

Grieg - - - - - Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46

"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

Solo for Violin:

Ernst - - - - - - - Air "Hongrois"

Schumann - - - - Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120

Introduction (Adagio non troppo).
Allegro.
Romance (Adagio non troppo).
Scherzo.
Finale (Allegro).

Soloist, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

* By particular request this concerto is substituted for the one announced in the programme books.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A novelty which was interesting, at times fascinating, rather than beautiful, concluded the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night. It was a kind of symphonic poem entitled "Romeo and Juliet," and described by its composer, Tschaikowsky, as an "overture fantasia," which is a somewhat fantastic designation, but evidently means a piece of music designed as an introduction, but freer in form than the customary overture. There is much effective music in the work, though the popular conception of what ought to be the contents of a composition with such a title is little considered. The hatred of the warring houses and a colossal yearning darkly tinged with melancholy seem to have been the elements of the tale which the composer had before him, and as a result the lovers of Verona appear in a profoundly tragic garb in this tone-poem. The audience could not be pleasantly impressed by such a work, but it was evident enough that the professional musicians present (and there were many of them) derived increased admiration for the constructive skill and inventive ingenuity of Tschaikowsky from the performance.

Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second pianoforte concerto in a style which showed a determination to achieve brilliancy at any cost; but as there is precious little poetry or feeling to be sacrificed in the composition, we do not know that there was any room for disappointment. The brilliant sonority of his performance offered compensation under the circumstances. Not so, however, in the case of the Chopin nocturne, which he played in compliance with an enthusiastic call for more. Here an evident desire to imbue the composition with masculinity and strength resulted in a hard and angular performance, in which we could find no charm. The rest of the programme consisted of Haydn's familiar symphony in G (No. 13 in Breitkopf and Haertel's edition), and the same four numbers from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Thomas has made popular here. In both of the numbers Mr. Nikisch delighted the audience with a display of virtuosoship in conducting. In the case of the symphony the appeal was made very legitimately through the eloquent beauty of the music. In the other case it partook a little of undignified sensationalism. His working up of the climax in the grotesque march which brings the selection to a close was a splendid feat, but it was rather disappointing to observe that the sharp clashing of cymbals, accentuated by incisive, yet graceful, movements of the arms, should have been accepted by the public as the theme most worthy of demonstrative approval.

Clipping from The American
Phila. Pa.
Date 2/13

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

The Boston Orchestra's Concert at the Academy of Music.

There was a great crowd of cultivated people at the Academy of Music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its third concert here for the current season. The music on the programme was new in a double sense. Much of it was given here for the first time, and all of it belonged to the distinctively modern and romantic school of composition. Among the novelties the most important was Grieg's suite "Peer Gynt," which is a highly colored, romantic and exceedingly effective piece of work. Unless the writer's memory is at fault, this suite is not absolutely new, but was given here on one of Mr. Gericke's programmes; but it is less familiar than one could wish considering its merit and its interest. It is in four parts. The first, entitled "Daybreak," is full of poetic feeling and suggestiveness. A funeral march, rather distinguished by pathos than solemnity, comes next, and this is succeeded by an exceedingly graceful and piquant dance in the manner of a mazourka. The last number, descriptive of the imps chasing Peer Gynt, is worthy of Berlioz in its weird suggestion of the supernatural. It pleased the audience mightily, thanks in great measure to the superb vigor and swing with which Mr. Nikisch gave the "crescendo e accelerando" with which it closes, and it was found necessary to repeat it. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" proved to be rather a flimsy affair, but it includes some showy and well-written passages for the violin solo, which enabled Mr. C. M. Loeffler to display a high degree of virtuosity. He produced a beautiful quality of tone, and played with a brilliancy and elegance of execution which brought out three rounds of hearty applause. The "Phedre" overture by Massenet, an impressive and admirably written composition, symmetrical in form, sincere in sentiment and admirable in its development, began the concert, which closed with a magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's lovely "Italian" Symphony. This glorious work was played to perfection, with unsurpassable brilliancy of execution and with the utmost fervor of feeling. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the rendering of the lovely andante. It was indeed heavenly sweet. Altogether the concert was a great success, and Mr. Nikisch has firmly established himself in the favor of our musical public.

[74]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON HERALD.
BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 1890.

Another Successful Tour of the Boston Orchestra.

The Organ Issue at Music Hall and Its Effect—Facts About the Worcester Festival and Common Sense Comments on Its Programmes—Concerts of the Week—News and Gossip.

The third of the season's tours by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, has occupied the time of this organization during the week just ended, and again the record made has been one most gratifying to local pride. The concerts of the tour have been given in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and, in addition to the high degree of artistic success attained, it is pleasant to know that the financial results of the tour have materially exceeded those of any former visit of the orchestra to the several cities named. The concerts given in the city of Philadelphia by the orchestra have come to be almost duplicates of the Boston concerts in the size and character of the audiences that attend, and the interest shown in the success of the visits of the organization almost equals that attending the regular home appearances of the orchestra. The entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music is utilized in the Philadelphia concerts, even the top gallery being crowded by the same enthusiastic class of music lovers as that found patiently waiting the opening of the Music Hall doors for the Friday rehearsals here. In Washington the orchestra has simply got the following of the very best elements in society circles, and its appearances there are honored by the attendance of immense audiences in full dress. The New York concerts call out a general attendance of all the musical notabilities of that city, and so it will be seen that the Boston orchestra is winning a firm hold upon the musical publics of all these cities. A curious feature of the tour has been the universal favor with which the "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, has been received, and the verdict of the Boston audiences on this work has been repeated in each one of the cities visited, the rule regarding encores having been necessarily ignored wherever it has been played. The Boston critic who pronounced the "Phedre" overture "vulgar" has been shown to be at odds with his fellow scribes in Philadelphia who have heard this charming composition of the French school, for one of the ablest musical writers there says of this overture: "Massenet's overture is a striking piece of composition, full of dignity and a weird feeling which fits the subject it exemplified. It is scored in a very musicianly manner, and displays no lack of ideas or of power to develop them"; while another equally competent critic wrote of it: "Massenet's 'Phedre' overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective." Joseffy, the pianist, was the soloist at the New York concert and, when complimented upon his performance of the Liszt concerto No. 2, said: "Who could not play with such an accompaniment as your orchestra?" a comment which means much coming from a pianist who has had such superb accompaniments in his time. Altogether, this third tour has been a remarkable one for the Boston orchestra, and it is universally conceded that Mr. Nikisch has supplemented his successes at the head of his organization by gaining general favor in the best musical and social circles wherever the orchestra has appeared.

NEW YORK HERALD
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12,

APPLAUDING BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

The third of the series of four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives in Steinway Hall this winter took place last night in the presence of an audience of unusual size and was applauded with more than common warmth.

Perhaps it was in order to show that the orchestra has lost none of the delicacy and nice balance of parts for which it became famous under his predecessor that Mr. Nikisch began last night's concert with Haydn's archaic symphony, No. 13, in G major, for the choice can scarcely be explained otherwise. Certainly it was well played, far better in all probability than Father Haydn ever heard it played, but it was scarcely worth while.

Mr. Joseffy, who has seldom played better, gave a spirited and dignified interpretation of Liszt's A major concerto, one of the things he does best, and was deservedly applauded with such persistent heartiness that he had to play again.

The second part of the programme consisted of Grieg's quaint suite, "Peer Gynt," with which Mr. Thomas has made New York familiar, and an overture of Tschaikowsky entitled "Romeo and Juliet." In the "Perr Gynt" suite, which consists of selections from the music that Gregg wrote for Ibsen's drama of that name, the orchestra did wonders and gave a performance really remarkable for finish and technical brilliancy.

The Tschsakowsky overture is sombre work, but of decided interest, in the immense difficulties of which the orchestra revelled.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, Feb. 13, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Lincoln Music Hall,
Washington
SEASON OF 1889–90.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Second Concert,
Thursday Evening, February 13,
At 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark - - - - - - - Overture, "Sakuntala"

Brahms - - - First Movement from Concerto in D, Op. 77

For Violin and Orchestra. Allegro non troppo.—Cadenza written by Mr. Kneisel.
* (First Time.)

Grieg - - - - - Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46

"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

Solo for Violin:

Ernst - - - - - - - - Air "Hongrois"

Schumann - - - - Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120

Introduction (Adagio non troppo).
Allegro.
Romance (Adagio non troppo).
Scherzo.
Finale (Allegro).

Soloist, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

* By particular request this concerto is substituted for the one announced in the programme books.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 18[illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A novelty which was interesting, at times too [illegible] posing, rather than beautiful, concluded the [illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night. It was a kind of symphonic poem entitled "Romeo and Juliet," and described by its composer, Tschaikowsky, as an "overture fantasia," which is a somewhat fantastic designation, but evidently means a piece of music designed as an introduction, but freer in form than the customary overture. There is much effective music in the work though the popular conception of what ought to be the contents of a composition with such a title is little considered. The hatred of the warring houses and a colossal yearning darkly tinged with melancholy seem to have been the elements of the tale which the composer had before him, and as a result the lovers of Verona appear in a profoundly tragic garb in this tone-poem. The audience could not be pleasantly impressed by such a work, but it was evident enough that the professional musicians present (and there were many of them) derived increased admiration for the constructive skill and inventive ingenuity of Tschaikowsky from the performance.

Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second pianoforte concerto in a style which showed a determination to achieve brilliancy at any cost; but as there is precious little poetry or feeling to be sacrificed in [illegible] position, we do not know that there was any [illegible] for disappointment. The brilliant sonority of his performance offered compensation under the circumstances. Not so, however, in the case of the Chopin nocturne, which he played in compliance with an enthusiastic call for more. Here an evident desire to imbue the composition with masculinity and strength resulted in a hard and angular performance, in which we could find no charm. The rest of the programme consisted of Haydn's familiar symphony in G (No. 1 in Breitkopf and Haertel's edition), and the same four numbers from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Thomas has made popular here. In both of the numbers Mr. Nikisch delighted the audience with a display of virtuosoship in conducting. In the case of the symphony the appeal was made very legitimately through the eloquent beauty of the music. In the other case it partook a little of undignified sensationalism. His working up of the climax in the grotesque march which brings the selection to a close was a splendid feat, but it was rather disappointing to observe that the sharp clashing of cymbals, accentuated by incisive, yet graceful, movements of the arms should have been accepted by the public as the most worthy of demonstrative approval.

Clipping from The American Phil. Pa.
Date 2/13

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

The Boston Orchestra's Concert at the Academy of Music.

There was a great crowd of cultivated people at the Academy of Music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its third concert here for the current season. The music on the programme was new in a double sense. Much of it was given here for the first time, and all of it belonged to the distinctively modern and romantic school of composition. Among the novelties the most important was Grieg's suite "Peer Gynt," which is a highly colored, romantic and exceedingly effective piece of work. Unless the writer's memory is at fault, this suite is not absolutely new, but was given here on one of Mr. Gericke's programmes; but it is less familiar than one could wish considering its merit and its interest. It is in four parts. The first, entitled "Daybreak," is full of poetic feeling and suggestiveness. A funeral march, rather distinguished by pathos than solemnity, comes next, and this is succeeded by an exceedingly graceful and piquant dance in the manner of a mazourka. The last number, descriptive of the imps chasing Peer Gynt, is worthy of Berlioz in its weird suggestion of the supernatural. It pleased the audience mightily, thanks in great measure to the superb vigor and swing with which Mr. Nikisch gave the "crescendo e accelerando" with which it closes, and it was found necessary to repeat it. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" proved to be rather a flimsy affair, but it includes some showy and well-written passages for the violin solo, which enabled Mr. C. M. Loeffler to display a high degree of virtuosity. He produced a beautiful quality of tone, and played with a brilliancy and elegance of execution which brought out three rounds of hearty applause. The "Phedre" overture by Massenet, an impressive and admirably written composition, symmetrical in form, sincere in sentiment and admirable in its development, began the concert, which closed with a magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's lovely "Italian" Symphony. This glorious work was played to perfection, with unsurpassable brilliancy of execution and with the utmost fervor of feeling. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the rendering of the lovely andante. It was indeed heavenly sweet. Altogether the concert was a great success, and Mr. Nikisch has firmly established himself in the favor of our musical public.

[74]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 1890.

Another Successful Tour of the Boston Orchestra.

The Organ Issue at Music Hall and Its Effect—Facts About the Worcester Festival and Common Sense Comments on Its Programmes—Concerts of the Week—News and Gossip.

The third of the season's tours by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, has occupied the time of this organization during the week just ended, and again the record made has been one most gratifying to local pride. The concerts of the tour have been given in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and, in addition to the high degree of artistic success attained, it is pleasant to know that the financial results of the tour have materially exceeded those of any former visit of the orchestra to the several cities named. The concerts given in the city of Philadelphia by the orchestra have come to be almost duplicates of the Boston concerts in the size and character of the audiences that attend, and the interest shown in the success of the visits of the organization almost equals that attending the regular home appearances of the orchestra. The entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music is utilized in the Philadelphia concerts, even the top gallery being crowded by the same enthusiastic class of music lovers as that found patiently waiting the opening of the Music Hall doors for the Friday rehearsals here. In Washington the orchestra has simply got the following of the very best elements in society circles, and its appearances there are honored by the attendance of immense audiences in full dress. The New York concerts call out a general attendance of all the musical notabilities of that city, and so it will be seen that the Boston orchestra is winning a firm hold upon the musical publics of all these cities. A curious feature of the tour has been the universal favor with which the "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, has been received, and the verdict of the Boston audiences on this work has been repeated in each one of the cities visited, the rule regarding encores having been necessarily ignored wherever it has been played. The Boston critic who pronounced the "Phedre" overture "vulgar" has been shown to be at odds with his fellow scribes in Philadelphia who have heard this charming composition of the French school, for one of the ablest musical writers there says of this overture: "Massenet's overture is a striking piece of composition, full of dignity and a weird feeling which fits the subject it exemplified. It is scored in a very musicianly manner, and displays no lack of ideas or of power to develop them"; while another equally competent critic wrote of it: "Massenet's 'Phedre' overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective." Joseffy, the pianist, was the soloist at the New York concert and, when complimented upon his performance of the Liszt concerto No. 2, said: "Who could not play with such an accompaniment as your orchestra?" a comment which means much coming from a pianist who has had such superb accompaniments in his time. Altogether, this third tour has been a remarkable one for the Boston orchestra, and it is universally conceded that Mr. Nikisch has supplemented his successes at the head of his organization by gaining general favor in the best musical and social circles wherever the orchestra has appeared.

NEW YORK HERALD

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12,

APPLAUDING BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

The third of the series of four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives in Steinway Hall this winter took place last night in the presence of an audience of unusual size and was applauded with more than common warmth.

Perhaps it was in order to show that the orchestra has lost none of the delicacy and nice balance of parts for which it became famous under his predecessor that Mr. Nikisch began last night's concert with Haydn's archaic symphony, No. 13, in G major, for the choice can scarcely be explained otherwise. Certainly it was well played, far better in all probability than Father Haydn ever heard it played, but it was scarcely worth while.

Mr. Joseffy, who has seldom played better, gave a spirited and dignified interpretation of Liszt's A major concerto, one of the things he does best, and was deservedly applauded with such persistent heartiness that he had to play again.

The second part of the programme consisted of Grieg's quaint suite, "Peer Gynt," with which Mr. Thomas has made New York familiar, and an overture of Tschaikowsky entitled "Romeo and Juliet." In the "Perr Gynt" suite, which consists of selections from the music that Gregg wrote for Ibsen's drama of that name, the orchestra did wonders and gave a performance really remarkable for finish and technical brilliancy.

The Tschsakowsky overture is sombre work, but of decided interest, in the immense difficulties of which the orchestra revelled.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, Feb. 13, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Lincoln Music Hall,
Washington
SEASON OF 1889–90.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Second Concert,
Thursday Evening, February 13,
At 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark - - - - - - - Overture, "Sakuntala"

Brahms - - - First Movement from Concerto in D, Op. 77

For Violin and Orchestra. Allegro non troppo.—Cadenza written by Mr. Kneisel.
* (First Time.)

Grieg - - - - - - Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46

"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

Solo for Violin:

Ernst - - - - - - - - - Air "Hongrois"

Schumann - - - - - Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120

Introduction (Adagio non troppo).
Allegro.
Romance (Adagio non troppo).
Scherzo.
Finale (Allegro).

Soloist, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

* By particular request this concerto is substituted for the one announced in the programme books.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A novelty which was interesting, at times too imposing, rather than beautiful, concluded the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night. It was a kind of symphonic poem entitled "Romeo and Juliet," and described by its composer, Tschaikowsky, as an "overture fantasia," which is a somewhat fantastic designation, but evidently means a piece of music designed as an introduction, but freer in form than the customary overture. There is much effective music in the work though the popular conception of what ought to be the contents of a composition with such a title is little considered. The hatred of the warring houses and a colossal yearning darkly tinged with melancholy seem to have been the elements of the tale which the composer had before him, and as a result the lovers of Verona appear in a profoundly tragic garb in this tone-poem. The audience could not be pleasantly impressed by such a work, but it was evident enough that the professional musicians present (and there were many of them) derived increased admiration for the constructive skill and inventive ingenuity of Tschaikowsky from the performance.

Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second pianoforte concerto in a style which showed a determination to achieve brilliancy at any cost; but as there is precious little poetry or feeling to be sacrificed in the composition, we do not know that there was any cause for disappointment. The brilliant sonority of his performance offered compensation under the circumstances. Not so, however, in the case of the Chopin nocturne, which he played in compliance with an enthusiastic call for more. Here an evident desire to imbue the composition with masculinity and strength resulted in a hard and angular performance, in which we could find no charm. The rest of the programme consisted of Haydn's familiar symphony in G (No. 13 in Breitkopf and Haertel's edition), and the same four numbers from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Thomas has made popular here. In both of the numbers Mr. Nikisch delighted the audience with a display of virtuosoship in conducting. In the case of the symphony the appeal was made very legitimately through the eloquent beauty of the music. In the other case it partook a little of undignified sensationalism. His working up of the climax in the grotesque march which brings the selection to a close was a splendid feat, but it was rather disappointing to observe that the sharp clashing of cymbals, accentuated by incisive, yet graceful, movements of the arms, should have been accepted by the public as the thing most worthy of demonstrative approval.

Clipping from The American Phila. Pa.
Date 2/13

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

The Boston Orchestra's Concert at the Academy of Music.

There was a great crowd of cultivated people at the Academy of Music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its third concert here for the current season. The music on the programme was new in a double sense. Much of it was given here for the first time, and all of it belonged to the distinctively modern and romantic school of composition. Among the novelties the most important was Grieg's suite "Peer Gynt," which is a highly colored, romantic and exceedingly effective piece of work. Unless the writer's memory is at fault, this suite is not absolutely new, but was given here on one of Mr. Gericke's programmes; but it is less familiar than one could wish considering its merit and its interest. It is in four parts. The first, entitled "Daybreak," is full of poetic feeling and suggestiveness. A funeral march, rather distinguished by pathos than solemnity, comes next, and this is succeeded by an exceedingly graceful and piquant dance in the manner of a mazourka. The last number, descriptive of the imps chasing Peer Gynt, is worthy of Berlioz in its weird suggestion of the supernatural. It pleased the audience mightily, thanks in great measure to the superb vigor and swing with which Mr. Nikisch gave the "crescendo e accelerando" with which it closes, and it was found necessary to repeat it. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" proved to be rather a flimsy affair, but it includes some showy and well-written passages for the violin solo, which enabled Mr. C. M. Loeffler to display a high degree of virtuosity. He produced a beautiful quality of tone, and played with a brilliancy and elegance of execution which brought out three rounds of hearty applause. The "Phedre" overture by Massenet, an impressive and admirably written composition, symmetrical in form, sincere in sentiment and admirable in its development, began the concert, which closed with a magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's lovely "Italian" Symphony. This glorious work was played to perfection, with unsurpassable brilliancy of execution and with the utmost fervor of feeling. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the rendering of the lovely andante. It was indeed heavenly sweet. Altogether the concert was a great success, and Mr. Nikisch has firmly established himself in the favor of our musical public.

[74]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - Baltimore,

Friday Evening, Feb. 14, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

F. A. NORTH & CO.,

Representing the Celebrated

KNABE PIANOS.

The Standard of Excellence for 50 Years. Used by VON BULOW, and the World's Greatest Musicians.

CONOVER PIANOS.

Undoubtedly one of the Finest Pianos ever placed before the Philadelphia public. See our list of testimonials from purchasers in our own City.

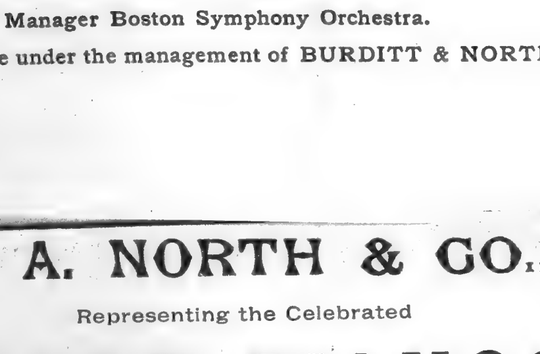
LESTER PIANOS.

A Fine Instrument at Medium Price. Doubly Guaranteed. Examination Invited.

1308 CHESTNUT STREET.

THE CALIGRAPH

LEADS THEM ALL.



1003 ARCH ST.

American Writing Machine Company.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Clipping from New York Mail
Date 2/12

[75]

...AND THE DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The [illegible] musical public is on again indebted to the Boston Symphon Orchestra for an evening of unalloyed e joyment, and of such perfect accomplis ment as is granted to even the finest ban but once or twice in a season. Wi the exception of the most frequent played of Haydn's symphonies, t one in G major, of the so-call Paris collection, the program had an esse tially modern character, such as, from wh is known of Mr. Nikisch's individual taste one would imagine to be peculiarly expre sive of his musical predilections. His br liant services abroad in the cause of Lis are familiar to all, and with a work like t A major concerto, that expresses in eve bar its composer's musical nature, could not fail to be in close sympathy. In like manner personal acquaintanceship with Grieg u doubtedly stood him in good stead in his i terpretation of the fascinating "Pe Gynt" excerpts; while, finally, the Tscha kowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture e bodies above all the most striking featur of contemporaneous musical thought, a for this no living conductor has a mo responsive understanding than the prese leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestr From the standpoint of personal sympath therefore, he could not fail to do justice yesterday evening's program, while tho who were familiar with his former achiev ments in the previous concerts need not told that he well knows how impart his intentions to the men under hi and that they are fully prepared to execu them. Of the performances of the famou band it is quite impossible to speak save warmest praise—in Boston their pla ing is always on the highest plan of excellence, and the selection presented here are chosen from amon the most successful of their uniformly a mirable achievements. There was a d lightful simplicity and absence of all stri ing after effect in the Haydn symphon which accorded well with the nature of t ever youthful work. The "Peer Gynt music, which was first introduced t us by Mr. Thomas, and whic during the past summer month has frequently been heard under Mr. Seidl baton, has firmly established itself as prim favorite on our concert programs. Mr. N kisch not only gave a peculiarly finishe interpretation to the work, but brough out some hitherto unnoticed orchestral ef fects that lent an added charm to the wel contrasted numbers, of which the sec ond and fourth—"Death of Aase" an "In the Halls of the Mountain King" seemed to create the strongest impression indeed the latter had to be repeated. Th "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia b Tschaikowsky, like many of his compos tions, will grow upon the listener the oftene it is heard, and unlike many is strik ingly interesting from first to last Noble inspiration and great techni cal resource combine to create a art work of highest value and signifi cance. Herein the powers of the orchestra were put to the severest test, and herein also they gained their completest triumph. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who played the A major concerto by Liszt, with greater finish, power and brilliancy than ever before. Mr. Joseffy has not been very prodigal of his appearances in concerts of late, which is all the more surprising, inasmuch as our audiences, so frequently accused of fickleness and lack of appreciation, whenever he does play in public, try to prove to him, as last evening, that, however distinguished may be the various pianistic visitors to our shores, he still remains the favorite he has been from the first. He should feel convinced that he can never lose his hold on all true music lovers, since in many ways s art is unsurpassed and inimitable. reat in every branch of pianism, e possesses certain excellences all his wn. Being recalled again and again fter the concerto, which was magnifi ently accompanied, he amiably added as ncore the seldom played Chopin nocturne B major, op. 62, No. 1, which was recent y heard from d'Albert, and with whose in erpretation it was interesting to compare he exquisitely poetical conception of Jo seffy's. The last concert by the Boston band is announced for the 18th prox., and the future holds no surer promise of musical enjoyment.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Press St Paul Minn
Date 2/2

MINNEAPOLIS MUSIC.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming—Some Organ Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to ap ear in Minneapolis early in May. Mr. ouis Miller, one of the favorite tenors of oston, will undertake the management of he concert here, and it is to him that Min eapolis owes it that our people are at ength to hear this famous band of musi ians. Mr. Miller arrived in town yester lay, and is the guest of Mayor Babb.

Mr. Miller comes here thus early to per ect the arrangements. The concert will be iven at the exposition, and the date will e May 12. It has been the custom for the rchestra, at the close of their Boston sea on, to make an annual spring tour. This our has included every year St. Louis and hicago. The orchestra comes seventy rtists strong. Mr. Arthur Nikish is con uctor, ably supported by Loeffler, Adam wski and Kneisel at the head of the vio ns; Hekking and Schultz, the 'cellists. its ranks will be found representatives om the leading orchestras of Vienna, Leip , Berlin, Paris and London.

The Press

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert at the Academy.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music in presence of an immense audience. The programme consisted of Massent's overture, "Phedre," Lalo's "Symphonie," Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Greig's suite "Peer Gynt," and Mendelsshon's "Italian" symphony.

This programme would be admirably suited for Boston which is fortunate enough to have between twenty and thirty orchestral concerts during the season, or for New York which has two or three excellent orchestras to supply the demand for his class of entertainment but it is not so well adapted to this city. During this season we shall have in all precisely eight orchestral concerts during exactly as many months, and this is not much below the average of recent seasons. It must be apparent then, that our musical thirst is not so much for novelties as for standard works which we have far too few opportunities of hearing. In saying this there is no desire to condemn last night's programme in itself. It consisted of good music, but there is better music that might have been chosen even if it had not the doubtful charm of novelty. Another improvement which Mr. Nikisch could readily achieve is the placing of the symphony second on the programme instead of last. Many people only care to hear the symphony and they are forced to wait until the end with perhaps jaded appetites and lessened interest before their desires can be gratified.

Massenet's overture is a striking piece of composition full of dignity and a weird feeling which fits the subject it exemplified. It is scored in a very musicianly manner and displays no lack of ideas or of power to develop them.

Greig's suite is adapted from the music written for one of Ibsen's plays. It is in four movements, of which the first is a beautiful flowing melody, quite suggestive of its title "Daybreak." The next three movements are, it is safe to say, inspired by Berlioz's writing. They are theatrical to an extreme degree and Mr. Nikisch did not fail to brighten the effects of this nature in a surprising manner. For instance, in the second movement one of the themes was played pianissimo until the hearer was only aware that the movement was still being played by the movement of the conductor's baton. This may not be art, but it certainly pleased the audience, who applauded vociferously. As a whole, the suite is very melodious, the themes, though few, are quaint, and the frequent pizzicatto passages, exquisitely played as they were, were decidedly odd.

After what had gone before Mendelssohus "Italian" symphony came like a breath of fresh air into a hot-house. There is no more joyous and bright work in the whole range of orchestral music than his. Though not as great as the "Scotch" symphony, its romantic beauty, lyrical smoothness, and well marked themes combine to make it most deservedly popular. It was beautifully performed throughout, the last movement especially with its taking dance theme being given with a crispness that was altogether delightful. It was not, however, in the symphony alone that the orchestra excelled; its playing throughout was worthy of its splendid reputation.

The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra, who played the violin music in Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra. Although Lalo is nearly 70 years of age his music is but little known in this country. The programme states that he is of Spanish birth, but this is a mistake, as he was born in Lille, the ancient capital of Flanders. The Spanish symphony was written for Sarasate and first played by him in 1875. The first movement (allegro) is decidedly disappointing, but the others, especially the Scherzando, are highly characteristic and very melodious. The themes are quaint and some of the effects are decidedly bizarre. Mr. Loeffler evidently possesses no small amount of courage, first, to attempt a work written for the greatest violinist of the age, and next to present it before an audience which had so recently had more than one opportunity of hearing that artist. It says much for Mr. Loeffler's playing that he was able to thoroughly interest his audience and the very hearty applause he received for his effort surely justified his boldness. It is probable that the introduction of one or two vocal solos would please a majority of the audiences at these concerts more than instrumental solo numbers.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 13, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Gives a Widely-Assorted Programme.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night before a very large audience at the Academy of Music, proved one of the most interesting of the season. The programme included three novelties and one classic work, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony. Massanet's "Phedre" overture is a dignified composition, well arranged and evenly developed and sufficiently effective. The "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, for violin and orchestra, is hardly a symphony, though it is in four movements. It is a conscientious treatment of themes presumably Spanish, and though it begins rather aimlessly the later movements are exceedingly poetical and graceful. The solo part was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler with great purity of tone and smoothness of execution, and the performance won warm applause.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is a fanciful bit of writing that served best to show the discipline of the orchestra. If delicacy of execution is the test of a conductor, as many persons seem to think, Mr. Nikisch may be said to have beaten the record of Mr. Gericke. The extraordinary pianissimo of the funeral march made the audience enthusiastic and the accurate bang of the cymbals in the final movement awakened such plaudits that Mr. Nikisch was compelled to give this Berliozesque bit over again.

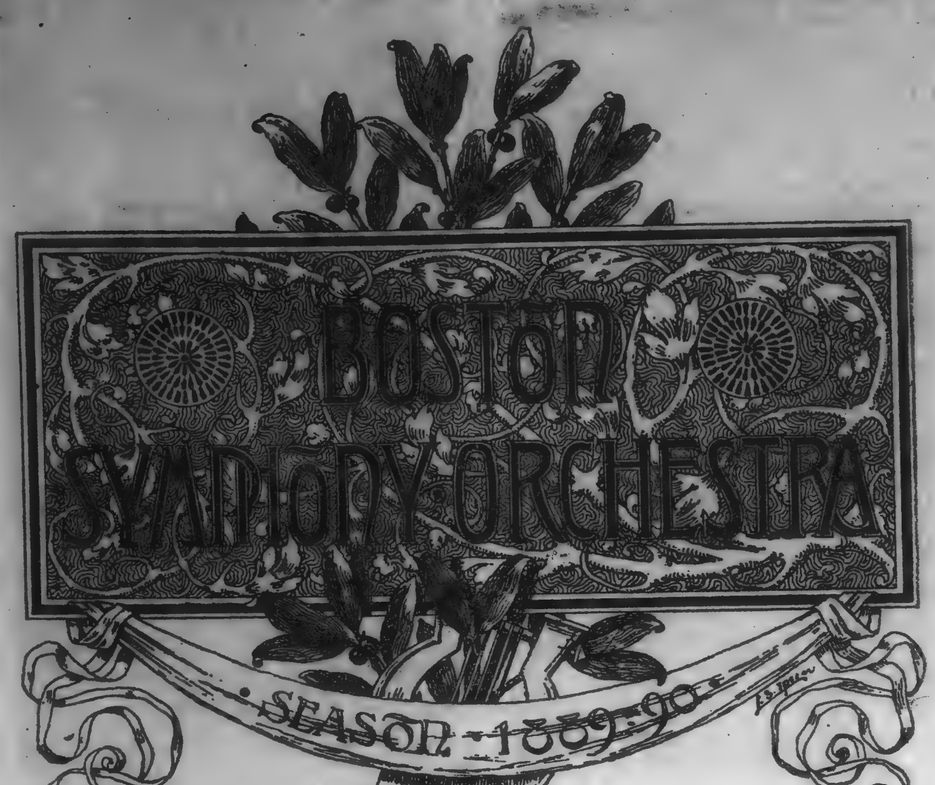
It was a peculiar judgment that placed this theatrical claptrap immediately before the Symphony, but perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought it would make his audience appreciate Mendelssohn the more. It should have done so and it certainly had that effect upon some, but not on those that made the loudest noise.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.



PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch Gives His Third Symphony Concert to a Large Audience.

The third symphony concert of the Boston Orchestra for this season was given last evening at the Academy of Music. There was, as heretofore, a very large audience in attendance, filling nearly every seat. The programme for the evening comprised only four numbers, all of which are to be considered important compositions, and two of them were new to our audiences. The rather novel methods of direction which Mr. Nikisch employs became, as usual, an object of considerable interest, and the results seemed to justify the methods. Perfect assimilation in the individual parts in a large orchestra like this has rarely been so nearly approached. The quality of the players remains almost unchanged, and the astonishing power of the string department forbids any rivalry.

The opening selection was Massanet's concert overture, "Phedre." It is richly scored, all the familiar modern effects are realized and there is a firm grasp of the different subjects which indicates thorough musical erudition. But when these subjects come to be analyzed it is soon evident that they belong to the same school as the other writings of Massanet. They are not broad or thoughtful and have a strong suggestion of light opera, which the grand weight of the orchestra fails to strengthen. The second piece was virtually a violin solo, with a more or less important orchestral accompaniment. It is entitled "Symphonie Espagnole," written by Lalo, a Spanish composer, now coming into notice in this country. The composition is in four movements. The violinist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra. His playing, while deficient in volume, developed what may well be called an extraordinary amount of executive ability. Of the four parts the second, Scherzando, was the most successful. It was not merely characteristic of sunny Spain, all of the movements were that, but it was at once original, graceful and melodious. The fourth movement, Rondo, was almost as interesting, particularly for the fine orchestral effects. At the close Mr. Loeffler received quite an ovation from the audience, being three times recalled.

The Grieg Suite, opus 46, "Peer Gynt," was announced as "first time," which probably meant under Nr. Nikisch's direction. It has been heard here twice before. It is not particularly interesting. The two middle movements are the best. "The Death of Aase," played with muted instruments, produced a very solemn impression, although it would have been equally effective if not taken so slow. The fourth part, a grotesque march, full of queer deteriptive effects, received the one encore of the evening.

When at length the audience settled themselves down to hear Mendelssohn's symphony, which closed the concert, it was with a sense of rest after the preceding excitements. This second symphony, called by himself "Italian" and written in Italy, is one of his brightest and happiest productions. From beginning to end of its short progress it is a continual succession of beautiful ideas. The subjects are so well known that it is unnecessary to follow the work throughout as Sir George Grove has so eloquently done. But something should be said of the andante which Grove says has given more happiness to a greater number of people than any other single piece of music save only the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh. This andante was first played here just thirty years ago, when the late Carl Sentz was giving Saturday afternoon concerts with the second Germania Orchestra. It at once grew so popular that it was requested for weeks in succession. The closing saltarello last night was a splendid example of the precision and delicacy of the violins. The effect was finer than usual, and the whole performance was one to be long remembered.

[illegible] MUSICAL.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall.

Mr. Nikisch demonstrated the catholicity of his taste and the virtuosity of his conductorship at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The concert also evidenced that the popular mind harbors a love for tunefulness and for originality that is not easily eradicated. For the rich harmonies of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the classic grace of a Brahm's concerto, and the refreshing lyrical beauty of a Schumann symphony were almost as nought, beside a somewhat theatrical suite, composed by Edward Grieg to accompany Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt."

Mr. Nikisch did not play all of the music written by Grieg, but the four movements on the programme were sufficiently full of odd and even bizarre effects, which in the last number, "The Dance in the Hall of the King," bordered on sensationalism. The first movement, "Daybreak," was exquisitely poetic, but the remaining three appealed to the ear and not to the intelligence. The pianissimo effect, which concluded the funeral march illustrated the wonderful control and composure of the orchestra, while in the dance the extreme rapidity of tempo and the startling dynamic effects, commingled with a curious melodic rhythm, led to such prolonged applause that Mr. Nikisch repeated the movement just as he did in Boston.

Schumann's familiar symphony in D minor, which was the last number when it should have been heard earlier in the evening, was given an interesting and smooth interpretation, its chief feature apart from those characteristics of perfect playing which are inseparable from this orchestra, being the careful way in which the mellifluous themes were emphasized. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who played the first movement of Brahms' concerto in D for the violin in a thoroughly artistic manner. His tone, which at first seemed small, gradually grew to its accustomed roundness, depth, and purity, and the cadenza proved him to be as musicianly and masterly in composition as in technical execution. In the air "Hongroise" he was less in his element.

The hall was crowded, every seat being occupied, and even standing room being at a premium.

Clipping No. [illegible]

Clipping from New York [illegible]

Date 2/12

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM.

The third concert in Steinway Hall last evening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a very large audience that received several of the pieces with much enthusiasm. Haydn's symphony in G formed the solid basis of the programme that Mr. Nikisch arranged. Then came Liszt's second concerto for pianoforte in A major, played by Mr. Joseffy, which was followed by Grieg's suite on Ibsen's poem of "Peer Gynt," played by Mr. Thomas last Sunday evening, and Tschaikowski's "overture fantasie," "Romeo and Juliet."

A better arrangement would have been to end the concert with the Grieg suite, which was played with exquisite finish and a beautiful quality of tone, and the last division of which was vociferously redemanded. The pianissimo at the end of the second movement has rarely, if ever, been equaled on our local concert stage. It was the very refinement of orchestral playing. The splendid training of the band, as well as the fullness of its combined tone, was shown in the strong though somewhat startling ending of the last movement.

This number would have sent the audience away from the hall in a pleasurable frame of mind. The Tschaikowski "Romeo and Juliet" music did not. This piece has passages of power and of beauty; but as a whole it is disappointing. Its strange harmonies, its grotesque figures, its lack of melody, its weird, bizarre effects represent the extreme of what may be called musico intellectuality. Save in a few instances it is not in harmony with the spirit of Shakespeare's great love tragedy, and we doubt very much if it will have a long life on the concert stage.

A royal welcome was accorded to Mr. Joseffy, who played the Liszt concerto with all of the technical brilliancy, delicacy of touch and finish of phrasing of which he is the master. The applause was loud and long, and he finally yielded to the popular demand and played what sounded like a Chopin nocturne for an encore. The Haydn symphony emphasized the supreme excellencies of the band in its strings and its weakness in the woodwind choir. The tone of the oboe in the upper register appeared to be a shade at variance with its fellow instruments.

Clipping from Tribune Minneapolis, Minn

Date 2/2

theories. Address W. J. Dyer & Bro.

A FAMOUS ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Visit Minneapolis in May.

Mr. Louis Miller is in the city in the interest of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will bring to Minneapolis some time in May for a series of performances. Speaking of the organization Mr. Miller says: "The performances of the past season by the orchestra all over the East, and a general knowledge of the excellency of the organization, make it hardly necessary for me to speak of the foremost position which it now occupies in the musical world. The orchestra was formed in 1881 by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a public spirited and music-loving citizen of Boston, with the intention of giving his native city a permanent organization which should rank with the best orchestras of Europe. During the first three years Mr. George Henschel filled the part of conductor, who was succeeded in 1884 by Mr. Wilhelm Gerike, of Vienna, who held the position five years. Mr. Arthur Nekish, the present conductor, came to Boston last September from Leipzig. In the ranks of the orchestra may be found artists picked from the leading orchestras of Vienna, Leipzig, Berlin, Paris, London, Boston and New York.

"It is impossible for me to say so far in advance just who the soloist will be. Only last Tuesday Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, informed me that he was in requisition with a celebrated European singer. But I can say this much, the artist will be a great one. I feel certain that the same flattering success that has attended the concerts elsewhere given by the Boston orchestra awaits them here in Minneapolis. I shall certainly leave nothing undone to make this concert the great and notable event of the musical season, and worthy of the attention of every lover of good music."

Mr. Miller is the guest of Mayor E. C.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 13, 1890.

Academy of Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last night an audience scarcely less in numbers than those of the previous concerts of the current series. It may be questioned whether the enjoyability, "the solid comfort" of the entertainment was up to the standard, either for the amateur or the trained listener. There were four numbers, the opening one, Massenet's "Phèdre" overture, in which there is freshness, warmth and variety of color and much elegance of workmanship. Then came Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, a rather pretentious symphonic construction of music that would be far more acceptable as a concerto for violin and orchestra, and, so far as original ideas are concerned, divested of what is simply ingenious and often bizarre treatment and elaboration of themes, it would not make a very long concerto. It served to show off the virtuosity of the orchestra, however, except in the final movement, a rondo, in which the band played with uncertainty, not to say raggedness. The solo violin part was taken by C. M. Loeffler (a member of the orchestra), whom it was one of the chief pleasures of the evening to hear. It presented few real technical difficulties, except in the concluding movement, and these he met with ease, and his general work was marked by clearness and beauty of tone and musical expressiveness in execution. Mr. Loeffler was treated very cordially by the audience.

The next number, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (op. 46), and was on the programme as given for the first time. This was true so far as the title and the Boston organization are concerned, but it must have proved more or less familiar to a considerable portion of the audience. Like the preceding composition it is programme music, but of much better material, and scored with masterly skill. The audience was so taken with the final movement (the pursuit of Peter by the Imps), into which Mr. Nikisch put the spirit of the chase with a marvellous spirit, no less wonderfully responded to by his men, that a repetition was demanded and accorded.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's beautiful "Italian" (A) Symphony, in the reading of which Mr. Nikisch does not depart in any marked degree from other conductors whose interpretations of it have been heard here. The orchestra's playing was almost flawless during the entire concert, and marked by more than ordinary spirit as well as pure quality of tone.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1890.

The third trip along the seaboard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occupied last week. It resulted in an extension of the chorus of praise, which has gathered strength since the initial tour in December. In New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington vast audiences greeted Mr. Nikisch and were enthusiastic over the performances of the band. Strange as it may appear, the visitations of the Boston orchestra are having a perceptible effect on criticism; in such cities as Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where heretofore the commonest report has answered, the leading papers now furnish thoughtful reviews of works performed and the manner of performance. In Washington, the Post has been able to secure the services of Richard Aldrich, formerly of the Providence Journal, whose critical work will prove an influence of the best kind in a city fast awakening from musical torpor.

Clipping from State Richmond Va

Date 2/9

[illegible]ng [illegible]ng [illegible]4 [illegible]ion [illegible]ich [illegible]ike the [illegible]rn. [illegible]an the [illegible]en- [illegible]he the [illegible]ed.

THE STATE once or soon to it will be remitted at once to these suffering people.

GRAND MAY FESTIVAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Engaged.

The Mozart Board of Governors last night decided to engage the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for a music festival to be held Friday and Saturday nights, May 2d and 3d. There will be vocal soloists and a Richmond chorus of 150.

The orchestra numbers over 60 performers, and is larger than any orchestra ever booked for Richmond.

Each member of the Mozart will be entitled to buy three seats for each night at 75c. per ticket. Outsiders will be charged about $1 25 or $1 50 per seat.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1890.

The advance sale of admission tickets for the approaching Symphony concert is something quite unprecedented in the history of these concerts. Mr. Joseffy has not played in Boston for some years, and the desire to hear this genial artist again seems to be very strong. People who wish to obtain admission tickets should apply as soon as possible, as in all probability the supply will be exhausted much earlier than usual. Mr. Joseffy will play the A major concerto by Liszt.

INCOMPLETE

[76]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch Gives His Third Symphony Concert to a Large Audience.

The third symphony concert of the Boston Orchestra for this season was given last evening at the Academy of Music. There was, as heretofore, a very large audience in attendance, filling nearly every seat. The programme for the evening comprised only four numbers, all of which are to be considered important compositions, and two of them were new to our audiences. The rather novel methods of direction which Mr. Nikisch employs became, as usual, an object of considerable interest, and the results seemed to justify the methods. Perfect assimilation in the individual parts in a large orchestra like this has rarely been so nearly approached. The quality of the players remains almost unchanged, and the astonishing power of the string department forbids any rivalry.

The opening selection was Massanet's concert overture, "Phedre." It is richly scored, all the familiar modern effects are realized and there is a firm grasp of the different subjects which indicates thorough musical erudition. But when these subjects come to be analyzed it is soon evident that they belong to the same school as the other writings of Massanet. They are not broad or thoughtful and have a strong suggestion of light opera, which the grand weight of the orchestra fails to strengthen. The second piece was virtually a violin solo, with a more or less important orchestral accompaniment. It is entitled "Symphonie Espagnole," written by Lalo, a Spanish composer, now coming into notice in this country. The composition is in four movements. The violinist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra. His playing, while deficient in volume, developed what may well be called an extraordinary amount of executive ability. Of the four parts the second, Scherzando, was the most successful. It was not merely characteristic of sunny Spain, all of the movements were that, but it was at once original, graceful and melodious. The fourth movement, Rondo, was almost as interesting, particularly for the fine orchestral effects. At the close Mr. Loeffler received quite an ovation from the audience, being three times recalled.

The Grieg Suite, opus 46, "Peer Gynt," was announced as "first time," which probably meant under Nr. Nikisch's direction. It has been heard here twice before. It is not particularly interesting. The two middle movements are the best. "The Death of Aase," played with muted instruments, produced a very solemn impression, although it would have been equally effective if not taken so slow. The fourth part, a grotesque march, full of queer descriptive effects, received the one encore of the evening.

When at length the audience settled themselves down to hear Mendelssohn's symphony, which closed the concert, it was with a sense of rest after the preceding excitements. This second symphony, called by himself "Italian" and written in Italy, is one of his brightest and happiest productions. From beginning to end of its short progress it is a continual succession of beautiful ideas. The subjects are so well known that it is unnecessary to follow the work throughout as Sir George Grove has so eloquently done. But something should be said of the andante which Grove says has given more happiness to a greater number of people than any other single piece of music save only the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh. This andante was first played here just thirty years ago, when the late Carl Sentz was giving Saturday afternoon concerts with the second Germania Orchestra. It at once grew so popular that it was requested for weeks in succession. The closing saltarello last night was a splendid example of the precision and delicacy of the violins. The effect was finer than usual, and the whole performance was one to be long remembered.

[illegible] FRIDAY, FEBRUARY [illegible]

A MUSICAL FEAST.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall.

Mr. Nikisch demonstrated the catholicity of his taste and the virtuosity of his conductorship at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The concert also evidenced that the popular mind harbors a love for tunefulness and for originality that is not easily eradicated. For the rich harmonies of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the classic grace of a Brahm's concerto, and the refreshing lyrical beauty of a Schumann symphony were almost as nought, beside a somewhat theatrical suite, composed by Edward Grieg to accompany Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt."

Mr. Nikisch did not play all of the music written by Grieg, but the four movements on the programme were sufficiently full of odd and even bizarre effects, which in the last number, "The Dance in the Hall of the King," bordered on sensationalism. The first movement, "Daybreak," was exquisitely poetic, but the remaining three appealed to the ear and not to the intelligence. The pianissimo effect, which concluded the funeral march illustrated the wonderful control and composure of the orchestra, while in the dance the extreme rapidity of tempo and the startling dynamic effects, commingled with a curious melodic rhythm, led to such prolonged applause that Mr. Nikisch repeated the movement just as he did in Boston.

Schumann's familiar symphony in D minor, which was the last number when it should have been heard earlier in the evening, was given an interesting and smooth interpretation, its chief feature apart from those characteristics of perfect playing which are inseparable from this orchestra, being the careful way in which the mellifluous themes were emphasized. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who played the first movement of Brahms' concerto in D for the violin in a thoroughly artistic manner. His tone, which at first seemed small, gradually grew to its accustomed roundness, depth, and purity, and the cadenza proved him to be as musicianly and masterly in composition as in technical execution. In the air "Hongroise" he was less in his element.

The hall was crowded, every seat being occupied, and even standing room being at a premium.

Clipping No. [illegible]

Clipping from Times
New York N.Y.

Date 2/12

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM.

The third concert in Steinway Hall last evening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a very large audience that received several of the pieces with much enthusiasm. Haydn's symphony in G formed the solid basis of the programme that Mr. Nikisch arranged. Then came Liszt's second concerto for pianoforte in A major, played by Mr. Joseffy, which was followed by Grieg's suite on Ibsen's poem of "Peer Gynt," played by Mr. Thomas last Sunday evening, and Tschaikowski's "overture fantasie," "Romeo and Juliet."

A better arrangement would have been to end the concert with the Grieg suite, which was played with exquisite finish and a beautiful quality of tone, and the last division of which was vociferously redemanded. The pianissimo at the end of the second movement has rarely, if ever, been equaled on our local concert stage. It was the very refinement of orchestral playing. The splendid training of the band, as well as the fullness of its combined tone, was shown in the strong though somewhat startling ending of the last movement.

This number would have sent the audience away from the hall in a pleasurable frame of mind. The Tschaikowski "Romeo and Juliet" music did not. This piece has passages of power and of beauty; but as a whole it is disappointing. Its strange harmonies, its grotesque figures, its lack of melody, its weird, bizarre effects represent the extreme of what may be called musico intellectuality. Save in a few instances it is not in harmony with the spirit of Shakespeare's great love tragedy, and we doubt very much if it will have a long life on the concert stage.

A royal welcome was accorded to Mr. Joseffy, who played the Liszt concerto with all of the technical brilliancy, delicacy of touch and finish of phrasing of which he is the master. The applause was loud and long, and he finally yielded to the popular demand and played what sounded like a Chopin nocturne for an encore. The Haydn symphony emphasized the supreme excellencies of the band in its strings and its weakness in the woodwind choir. The tone of the oboe in the upper register appeared to be a shade at variance with its fellow instruments.

Clipping from Tribune
Minneapolis, Minn
2/2

Date

theories. Address W. J. Dyer & Bro.

A FAMOUS ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Visit Minneapolis in May.

Mr. Louis Miller is in the city in the interest of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will bring to Minneapolis some time in May for a series of performances. Speaking of the organization Mr. Miller says: "The performances of the past season by the orchestra all over the East, and a general knowledge of the excellency of the organization, make it hardly necessary for me to speak of the foremost position which it now occupies in the musical world. The orchestra was formed in 1881 by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a public spirited and music-loving citizen of Boston, with the intention of giving his native city a permanent organization which should rank with the best orchestras of Europe. During the first three years Mr. George Henschel filled the part of conductor, who was succeeded in 1884 by Mr. Wilhelm Gerike, of Vienna, who held the position five years. Mr. Arthur Nekish, the present conductor, came to Boston last September from Leipzig. In the ranks of the orchestra may be found artists picked from the leading orchestras of Vienna, Leipzig, Berlin, Paris, London, Boston and New York.

"It is impossible for me to say so far in advance just who the soloist will be. Only last Tuesday Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, informed me that he was in requisition with a celebrated European singer. But I can say this much, the artist will be a great one. I feel certain that the same flattering success that has attended the concerts elsewhere given by the Boston orchestra awaits them here in Minneapolis. I shall certainly leave nothing undone to make this concert the great and notable event of the musical season, and worthy of the attention of every lover of good music."

Mr. Miller is the guest of Mayor E. C. [illegible]

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 13, 1890.

Academy of Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last night an audience scarcely less in numbers than those of the previous concerts of the current series. It may be questioned whether the enjoyability, "the solid comfort" of the entertainment was up to the standard, either for the amateur or the trained listener. There were four numbers, the opening one, Massenet's "Phédre" overture, in which there is freshness, warmth and variety of color and much elegance of workmanship. Then came Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, a rather pretentious symphonic construction of music that would be far more acceptable as a concerto for violin and orchestra, and, so far as original ideas are concerned, divested of what is simply ingenious and often bizarre treatment and elaboration of themes, it would not make a very long concerto. It served to show off the virtuosity of the orchestra, however, except in the final movement, a rondo, in which the band played with uncertainty, not to say raggedness. The solo violin part was taken by C. M. Loeffler (a member of the orchestra), whom it was one of the chief pleasures of the evening to hear. It presented few real technical difficulties, except in the concluding movement, and these he met with ease, and his general work was marked by clearness and beauty of tone and musical expressiveness in execution. Mr. Loeffler was treated very cordially by the audience.

The next number, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (op. 46), and was on the programme as given for the first time. This was true so far as the title and the Boston organization are concerned, but it must have proved more or less familiar to a considerable portion of the audience. Like the preceding composition it is programme music, but of much better material, and scored with masterly skill. The audience was so taken with the final movement (the pursuit of Peter by the Imps), into which Mr. Nikisch put the spirit of the chase with a marvellous spirit, no less wonderfully responded to by his men, that a repetition was demanded and accorded.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's beautiful "Italian" (A) Symphony, in the reading of which Mr. Nikisch does not depart in any marked degree from other conductors whose interpretations of it have been heard here. The orchestra's playing was almost flawless during the entire concert, and marked by more than ordinary spirit as well as pure quality of tone.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1890.

The third trip along the seaboard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occupied last week. It resulted in an extension of the chorus of praise, which has gathered strength since the initial tour in December. In New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington vast audiences greeted Mr. Nikisch and were enthusiastic over the performances of the band. Strange as it may appear, the visitations of the Boston orchestra are having a perceptible effect on criticism; in such cities as Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where heretofore the commonest report has answered, the leading papers now furnish thoughtful reviews of works performed and the manner of performance. In Washington, the Post has been able to secure the services of Richard Aldrich, formerly of the Providence Journal, whose critical work will prove an influence of the best kind in a city fast awakening from musical torpor.

Clipping from State
Richmond Va
2/9

Date

ng ng ion ich ike the rn.
aan
the en-
the the ed.

THE STATE once or sent to it will be remitted at once to these suffering people.

GRAND MAY FESTIVAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Engaged.

The Mozart Board of Governors last night decided to engage the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for a music festival to be held Friday and Saturday nights, May 2d and 3d. There will be vocal soloists and a Richmond chorus of 150.

The orchestra numbers over 60 performers, and is larger than any orchestra ever booked for Richmond.

Each member of the Mozart will be entitled to buy three seats for each night at 75c. per ticket. Outsiders will be charged about $1 25 or $1 50 per seat.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1890.

The advance sale of admission tickets for the approaching Symphony concert is something quite unprecedented in the history of these concerts. Mr. Joseffy has not played in Boston for some years, and the desire to hear this genial artist again seems to be very strong. People who wish to obtain admission tickets should apply as soon as possible, as in all probability the supply will be exhausted much earlier than usual. Mr. Joseffy will play the A major concerto by Liszt.

INCOMPLETE

[76]

[77]

THE

STEINWAY HALL

PROGRAMME.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11TH, 1890.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 11th, 1890,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

Soloist:

MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

PROGRAMME.

1. SYMPHONY in G major, (No. 13, B. and H.,) ..... HAYDN
   1. Adagio; Allegro.
   2. Largo.
   3. Minuet (Allegretto).
   4. Allegro con spirito.
2. CONCERTO in A, No. 2, ... LISZT
3. SUITE—"Peer Gynt," ..... GRIEG
   1. Day-break.
   2. The Death of Asa.
   3. Anitra's Dance.
   4. In the Halls of the Mountain King.
4. "ROMEO AND JULIET"—Ouverture Fantaisie, ... TSCHAIKOWSKY

THE FOURTH AND LAST SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT will take place on TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 18th, 1890.

Manager, ... CHARLES A. ELLIS.

Steinway & Sons' Pianos used.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 2/

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

Clipping from Post
Washington DC
Date 2/3

will be on sale this morning.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

To-night is the occasion of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Music Hall. The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch from the lovely Sakuntala overture, through the novel Peer Gynt suite so pleasing to Bostonians, to Schumann's lovely and romantic symphony, fairly bristles with interest and promise. An act of courtesy which should find hearty appreciation is that of Mr. Nikisch in changing his programme, and of Mr. Kneisel in changing his concerto, so that this community may hear a work new to it, the Brahms concerto. The concert will be somewhat noteworthy, as an opportunity to hear for the first time music of Mr. Kneisel's composition, the cadenza used in the concerto having been written by him. Only the largest audience that Lincoln Hall can hold will do justice to this brilliant musical occasion.

Clipping from Register
New Haven Conn
Date 2/11

course about it. It deserves crowded houses this and to-morrow evening and to-morrow afternoon.

The music loving people of New Haven were given a rare treat yesterday, when they were allowed to continue the delightful hours of the afternoon that were spent with Mr. Damrosch, by the rare treat of another performance by the Boston [redacted] phony orchestra, under Herr Nikisch's splendid leadership. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture opened last night's concert, and this was followed by Mlle. De Vere's rendition, in a most delightful manner, of the aria from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She received four recalls after her first appearance, and repeated the selection from the "Pearls of Brazil" after her second. The Grieg Suite proved the most striking feauture of the evening. The first movement, "Daybreak," was played with beautiful effect. The second movement, that magnificent dead march of the Norwegian composer, was applauded last night until an encore was forced. The last piece on the program was Schumann's D Minor Symphony, which was rendered with peculiar accuracy and decided spirit

[77]

THE

STEINWAY HALL

PROGRAMME.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11TH, 1890.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 11th, 1890,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

Soloist:

MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

PROGRAMME.

1. SYMPHONY in G major, (No. 13, B. and H.,) ..... HAYDN
   1. Adagio; Allegro.
   2. Largo.
   3. Minuet (Allegretto).
   4. Allegro con spirito.
2. CONCERTO in A, No. 2, ... LISZT
3. SUITE—"Peer Gynt," ..... GRIEG
   1. Day-break.
   2. The Death of Asa.
   3. Anitra's Dance.
   4. In the Halls of the Mountain King.
4. "ROMEO AND JULIET"—Ouverture Fantaisie, ... TSCHAIKOWSKY

THE FOURTH AND LAST SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT will take place on TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 18th, 1890.

Manager, ... CHARLES A. ELLIS.

Steinway & Sons' Pianos used.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 2/

Clipping from Post
Washington DC
2/13

Clipping from Tribune
[illegible]
2/

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

will be on sale this morning.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

To-night is the occasion of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Music Hall. The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch from the lovely Sakuntala overture, through the novel Peer Gynt suite so pleasing to Bostonians, to Schumann's lovely and romantic symphony, fairly bristles with interest and promise. An act of courtesy which should find hearty appreciation is that of Mr. Nikisch in changing his programme, and of Mr. Kneisel in changing his concerto, so that this community may hear a work new to it, the Brahms concerto. The concert will be somewhat noteworthy, as an opportunity to hear for the first time music of Mr. Kneisel's composition, the cadenza used in the concerto having been written by him. Only the largest audience that Lincoln Hall can hold will do justice to this brilliant musical occasion.

[illegible] course about it. It deserves crowded houses this and to-morrow evening and to-morrow afternoon.

The music loving people of New Haven were given a rare treat yesterday, when they were allowed to continue the delightful hours of the afternoon that were spent with Mr. Damrosch, by the rare treat of another performance by the Boston [illegible] phony orchestra, under Herr Nikisch's splendid leadership. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture opened last night's concert, and this was followed by Mlle. De Vere's rendition, in a most delightful manner, of the aria from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She received four recalls after her first appearance, and repeated the selection from the "Pearls of Brazil" after her second. The Grieg Suite proved the most striking feauture of the evening. The first movement, "Daybreak," was played with beautiful effect. The second movement, that magnificent dead march of the Norwegian composer, was applauded last night until an encore was forced. The last piece on the program was Schumann's D Mimor Symphony, which was rendered with peculiar accuracy and decided spirit

REDUCTION RATIO 15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

NEW YORK AND LONDON,

Music Publishers and Importers.

NEW COMPOSITIONS BY

ANTON DVORAK,

THIRTEEN PIANOFORTE PIECES,

OP. 85,

IN THREE BOOKS, EACH $1.50.

LIEBESLIEDER,

(LOVE SONGS,)

For Voice, with Piano Accompaniment, Op. 83, $1.50.

Special Depot of the Publications of ARTHUR P. SCHMIDT, of Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED:

BRUNO OSCAR KLEIN,

ALBUM POETIQUE,

No. 1.	Spring Morning,	40 Cents
" 2.	Evening in the Woods,	40 "
" 3.	Night on the Rhine,	40 "
" 4.	Angelus,	35 "
" 5.	Slavonian Cradle Song,	50 "
" 6.	Capricietto,	50 "

Eastern Agents for the Publications of

WM. ROHLFING & CO., MILWAUKEE, WISC.

All music performed at Steinway Hall constantly in stock in the best and cheapest standard editions. Lists and Catalogues mailed free.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

21 E. 17th St. (3 doors W. of B'way),

NEW YORK.

GEO. GEMÜNDER, Jr.,

27 Union Sq., NEW YORK.

FINE VIOLINS, BOWS, CASES, &C.

REPAIRING & RECONSTRUCTING.

THE BEST

MUSICAL

INSTRUCTION TO BE OBTAINED AT THE

METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY

21 E. 14TH STREET, NEW YORK.

The Most Select Musical School in the United States.

EXCEPTIONAL ADVANTAGES.

ALL BRANCHES TAUGHT.

Among the eminent musicians actually employed at the Conservatory are:

Dudley Buck, Albert R. Parsons, Director Pianoforte Department; Harry Rowe Shelley, Paolo Giorza, Silas G. Pratt and Etelka Utassi.

Applicants without musical talent not accepted.

Send for Circular.

H. W. GREENE, General Manager. C. B. HAWLEY, Musical Director.

THE AMERICAN MUSICIAN.

EDITORS:

JNO. C. FREUND and J. TRAVIS QUIGG.

An illustrated 32 page paper, published every Saturday at

835 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

For Sale by all News Agents at ten cents per copy. Mailed to Subscribers at $4.00 a year in advance.

Largest Musical Paper with Largest Circulation in America.

The Steinway Hall Programme.

OFFICE, 109 & 111 E. 14TH STREET.

ADELINA PATTI AND CHARLES GOUNOD.

(CABLEGRAM.)

PARIS, Dec. 1, 1888.

Messrs. Steinway, New York:

Maestro Gounod enthusiastic over your piano at rehearsal of "Romeo and Juliet," held at my hotel. He would like to know price of same. Answer paid.

ADELINA PATTI, Hotel Bristol.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1888.

Adelina Patti, Hotel Bristol, Paris:

Please cable number stamped on piano to Steinway, New York. Answer paid.

PARIS, Dec. 2, 1888.

Steinway, New York:

Piano 59,951. Compliments.

ADELINA PATTI.

The instrument proved to be a Steinway concert parlor grand; price was cabled over, at once accepted, and piano ordered by cable to be delivered to Maestro Charles Gounod, who sent the following cable dispatch:

PARIS, Dec. 6, 1888.

Mess. Steinway, Facteur Pianos, New York:

Mille graces, lettre suit. GOUNOD.

(TRANSLATION.)

Thousand thanks, letter follows.

GOUNOD.

Letter from the Celebrated Composer CHARLES GOUNOD.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, December 6th, 1888.

My dear Mr. STEINWAY:

I caused a cablegram to be sent to you this very day to transmit to you in the quickest way all my thanks for the superb Grand Piano and the liberal terms that you have made me thereon, and by which you respond in the most generous and princely manner to the wish of my delicious interprète, Mme. Adelina Patti, and to my lifelong admiration for your magnificent instruments.

Although I have not the talent of execution to develop all the resources of this Steinway Grand, nevertheless I hope that as artist I possess at least everything requisite to appreciate all its wonderful qualities and merits, and above all to realize your consideration enabling me to be the possessor of so perfect an instrument which your graciousness makes still more precious to me.

Accept, I beg of you, the assurance of my kindest regards with which I remain

sincerely yours,

CHARLES GOUNOD.

LONDON DAILY TELEGRAPH, Nov. 27, 1888.

[Paris Correspondence.]

M. Gounod—whom I have just met at Madame Adelina Patti's—is most enthusiastic on the rendering of his music by the diva. I mentioned yesterday that he went through at her hotel the principal scenes in which Juliet appears, singing the part of Romeo as only M. Gounod knows how to sing. None who have not heard the composer at the piano can realize what effect can be produced by a singer who has no voice. This afternoon he contented himself with merely running his fingers over the keys in order to show how fine was the tone of the Steinway piano, and he was loud in its praise. The stories about M. Gounod being in bad health are quite unfounded.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

GRAND OPERA IN GERMAN.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 12th, 1890,

First performance this season of

WAGNER'S OPERA,

DIE WALKURE.

FRIDAY, FEB. 14, WAGNER.	WAGNER'S OPERA, LOHENGRIN.
SATURDAY, FEB. 15, MATINEE.	Die Goetterdaemmerung.

—SPECIAL.—

Commencing Wednesday, Feb. 26th, the Wagner operas will be given in chronological order:

WED., FEB. 26 ..... Rienzi
FRI., FEB. 28 ..... Flying Dutchman
MON., MARCH 3 ..... Tannhaeuser
WED., MARCH 5 ..... Lohengrin
FRI., MARCH 7 ..... Die Meistersinger
MON., MARCH 10 ..... Tristan and Isolde
WED., MARCH 12 ..... Rheingold
FRI., MARCH 14 ..... Die Walkure
MON., MARCH 17 ..... Siegfried
WED., MARCH 19... Die Goetterdaemmerung

☞ Tickets for the series ONLY may be had on application to the Box Office or by letter enclosing the proper amount.

☞ Tickets will be ready for delivery on and after February 15th.

BOX OFFICE OPEN DAILY FROM 9 TO 6.

STEINWAY'S PIANOS USED EXCLUSIVELY.

1863 Twenty-Seventh Year. 1890

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL,

23 UNION SQUARE.

A Weekly Critical Review of Musical Art.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

Published Every Saturday. Quoted as an Authority on Musical Matters all over the World. Subscription, $3.00 per annum.

A CORDIAL INVITATION IS EXTENDED BY

Mr. J. W. CURRIER

TO ALL LOVERS OF MUSIC TO CALL AT

No. 18 East Seventeenth Street

AND HEAR THE

MASON & RISCH

New Improved Vocalion.

The best interpreter of Sacred, Orchestral, Operatic Music and Music Drama. The instrument is particularly adapted for Churches, Lodges, Private Music Rooms, Etc.

WOLFSOHN'S MUSICAL BUREAU, 331 EAST 14TH ST.

Concerts, Receptions, Musicales, &c., arranged.

JUST PUBLISHED:

"FROM THE TONE WORLD."

ESSAYS BY LOUIS EHLERT.

Translated from the German by HELEN D. TRETBAR.

CONTENTS:

Carl Tausig.—Robert Schumann and his School.—Frederic Chopin.—Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdi.—Robert Volkmann.—Tristan and Isolde, by Richard Wagner (2 Essays).—The Stage Festival at Baireuth.—A Scene from "Die Meistersinger."—Offenbach and the Second Empire.—Gervinus and purely Instrumental Music.—Music Teaching and the Public.—Wagner, Makart and Hamerling. A Parallel.—Gounod contra Wagner.

288 Pages.—Cloth, $1.50.

MAILED UPON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

Published by

C. F. TRETBAR,

109 E. 14th Street, New York.

For sale at G. Schirmer's, 35 Union Sq.; Edw. Schuberth & Co.'s, 23 Union Sq.; and at the Music and Book Stores.

Miss LILLIE BERG,

The leading exponent in America of "LAMPERTI'S METHOD." European masters and composers annually consulted for style and interpretation. DELSARTE studies. Teachers for vocal and piano under Miss Berg's direct supervision at moderate rates. 337 West 59th Street. Send for Circular.

THE NATIONAL Conservatory of Music

OF AMERICA,

Nos. 126 & 128 East 17th Street,

NEW YORK.

OFFICERS:

President, JEANNETTE M. THURBER.
Treasurer, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.
Secretary, CHAS. INSLEE PARDEE, A. M.

INCORPORATORS:

Mrs. AUGUST BELMONT, Mrs. RICHARD IRVIN, Jr., Mrs. WM. T. BLODGETT, Mrs. F. B. THURBER, Mrs. THOMAS W. WARD, AUGUST BELMONT, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr., ANDREW CARNEGIE, HENRY G. MARQUAND, WILLIAM G. CHOATE, JESSE SELIGMAN, †JOSEPH W. DREXEL, FRANCIS B. THURBER, PARKE GODWIN WILLIAM K. VANDERBILT, WILLIAM R. GRACE.

Founded for the benefit of Musical Talent in the United States, and conferring its benefits free upon all applicants sufficiently gifted to warrant the prosecution of a thorough course of studies and unable to pay for the same; and upon others of the requisite aptitude on the payment of a small fee.

THE COURSE

Embraces, as that of all European Conservatories of note, instruction in Singing, operatic and miscellaneous, Solfeggio, Stage Deportment, Elocution, Piano, Violin, Cello, Harmony, Counterpoint and Composition, Fencing, Italian, History of Music, Chorus and Orchestral Classes, etc. The

LIST OF PROFESSORS

Includes Monsieur Theophile Manoury, Principal of Vocal Department, Miss Eleanor Warner Everest, Mr. Christian Fritsch; Messrs. Frencelli, Pizzarello, Dulcken and Perrot, Messrs. Klein and Finck, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Misses Pinney, Marquiles and Comstock, Messrs. Huneker and Winkler, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, Mr. Jan Koert, Mr. Victor Herbert, Mr. W. V. Holt, Messrs. Senac and Bibeyran, Signor Cianelli, Mr. John Cheshire, Harp; Mr. Otto Oesterle, Flute; Mr. Joseph Schreurs, Clarinet; Mr. Rudolph Reuter, Bassoon; Mr. Arthur Trepte, Oboe; Mr. Ludwig Manoly, Contra-basso.

Children's classes in Solfeggio are held bi-weekly; Mr. F. Van der Stucken, Chorus Master and Leader of the Orchestra holds weekly Rehearsals.

THE NATIONAL CONSERVATORY

IS THE

ONLY MUSICAL INSTITUTE

In America in which the ground work of a thorough musical education is laid, and the structure afterward carried to completion. Its professors have been appointed without consideration of expense and wholly on their merits and reputation, and they form an

ADMIRABLE FACULTY

With no end in view but the impartment of knowledge and the consequent elevation of the public taste, with no other revenue than that contributed by lovers of music and the very small returns derived from the nominal tuition charged, and with no contribution whatever from talented candidates for admission unable to pay for high class tuition, it is believed that the National Conservatory addresses itself to all patriotic and music loving Americans as a

NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Of the utmost importance to the artistic future of the land.

The Semi-Annual Entrance Examinations will take place as follows: VOICE, Monday, January 6th, 1890, from 10 to 12 A. M., 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. PIANO, Tuesday, January 7th, from 10 to 12 A. M. and 2 to 5 P. M. VIOLIN and 'CELLO, Wednesday, January 8th, from 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. CHORUS, Wednesday Eve'g, January 8th, from 8 to 10 o'clock. ORCHESTRA, Saturday Evening, January 11th, from 8 to 10 o'clock.

All communications to

CHAS. INSLEY PARDEE, A. M., Sec'y,
126 & 128 E. 17th St., NEW YORK

AMERICAN PIANOS IN TROPICAL CLIMATES.

Via Brindisi.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

New York, U. S. A.

DEAR SIRS: I feel that I ought to tell you how much we prize your piano. It has been tuned but once since we came to this country in 1883, and so far as I can see, is just as good as when we got it in 1876. I would not take $1000 for it if I could not get another like it. All my daughters play and would hardly know what to do without it. You are doing grand work in giving such grand instruments to the music loving world. Wishing you still greater success,

Yours very truly,

B. D. WYCKOFF.

Subathee Panjab, India, March 15th, 1887.

Mme. ADELINA PATTI.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 4th, 1882.

To Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

NEW YORK.

DEAR SIRS: Allow me to express to you the great satisfaction and pleasure that I have experienced from the use of your famous Pianos, which you have placed at my disposal during the concert tour now in course of progress in the United States.

During my artistic career in the art centres of the world, I have used the pianos of nearly all celebrated manufacturers, but none of them can be compared to yours—none possess to such a marvelous degree that sympathetic, poetic and singing tone quality which distinguishes the Steinway as peerless among them all. Before returning to Europe, I shall select and purchase one of your Grand pianos for Craig-y-nos Castle, my residence in South Wales.

Respectfully yours,

ADELINA PATTI.

FRANZ ABT.

NEW YORK, July 6th, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

GENTLEMEN: Permit me to thank you for the magnificent Upright Piano which you kindly placed at my disposal during my brief sojourn in New York, and I can only repeat what I have so often expressed verbally—that during my long career as Artist and Composer, I have met with many fine European and American Piano-Fortes, but none that combine grandeur and poetry of tone, elasticity of touch, in short, everything that renders a piano perfect, to such a high degree as your celebrated Piano-Fortes.

Very truly yours,

FRANZ ABT.

FELICIEN DAVID.

PARIS, June 28th, 1867.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN: I am only too happy to give you, in these lines, a very sincere testimonial of my admiration for the Pianos manufactured by your House.

In my idea they are superior to all that I have heard or tried to the present day, and in giving you this certificate, I not only fulfill a duty of conscience, but at the same time do render justice to the man and manufacturer who has realized in his productions the greatest progress in the art of Piano-making.

Accept, gentlemen, my best wishes for your well-merited success, and believe me

Your devoted

FELICIEN DAVID.

A. BRAUTICAM,

MANUFACTURER OF AND DEALER IN

Upright, Square and Grand Piano-Fortes,

8 EAST 17th STREET,

Near 5th Ave., NEW YORK.

STEINWAY PIANOS TO RENT.

Rare Old Violins for Sale.

MME. DÉSIRÉE ARTÔT-DE PADILLA

Begs to announce that her address is

64 RUE JAUFFRAY, PARIS, FRANCE,

And that she is prepared to receive pupils professional and amateur.

Kuyler's

BONBONS, CHOCOLATES,

NOVELTIES IN FANCY BASKETS AND BONBONNIERES,

863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

TRY OUR

COCOA

FOR BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

PURE!! HEALTHFUL!!!

SOLD BY LEADING GROCERS.

Miss MARIE KREBS.

NEW YORK, May 17, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN:—Ere leaving America to fulfill engagements in Europe, permit me to thank you for the many courtesies extended to me, but above all for your kindness in furnishing for my Concerts, during the last two seasons, your magnificent Concert Grands, the most perfect instruments I have met with during my artistic career.

Their tone is marvelously grand, of exquisite poetical and sympathetic quality, which was to me a perfect revelation when trying the Steinway Piano for the first time; and it is just this thoroughly musical quality of tone, invariably characterizing your Pianos, which so grows upon both the hearer and player, that a cultivated musical ear will prefer the tone of your Pianos to all others. The touch is simply perfect, elastic, pliable, and promptly responding to all and every demand made by the pianist.

After thoroughly testing your Pianos, both in private and public, I can conscientiously say that the Steinway Pianos are superior to all other American or European instruments known to me.

Yours sincerely,

MARIE KREBS.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

NEW YORK, July 19th, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

Possessing, as you do, the highest testimonials for your celebrated Pianos, from the greatest musicians of the age, it would be supererogation on my part to endorse the opinions of such Judges as Rubinstein and Liszt; but I cannot refrain from praising your pianos, for the wonderful manner in which they sustain the voice.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 1/5

Clipping from Post Washington D C

Date 1/3

Clipping from Register New Haven Conn

Date 1/11

Will be on sale this morning.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

To-night is the occasion of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Music Hall. The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch from the lovely Sakuntala overture, through the novel Peer Gynt suite so pleasing to Bostonians, to Schumann's lovely and romantic symphony, fairly bristles with interest and promise. An act of courtesy which should find hearty appreciation is that of Mr. Nikisch in changing his programme, and of Mr. Kneisel in changing his concerto, so that this community may hear a work new to the Beethoven concerto. The con- [illegible] somewhat noteworthy, as an [illegible] to hear for the first time mu- [illegible] composition, the ca- [illegible] concerto having been [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] audience [illegible] an [illegible] justice [illegible] course about it. It deserves crowded houses this and to-morrow evening and to-morrow afternoon.

The music loving people of New Haven were given a rare treat yesterday, when they were allowed to continue the delightful hours of the afternoon that were spent with Mr. Damrosch, by the rare treat of another performance by the Boston [illegible] phony orchestra, under Herr Nikisch's [illegible] splendid leadership. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture opened last night's concert, and this was followed by Mlle. De Vere's rendition, in a most delightful manner, of the aria from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She received four recalls after her first appearance, and repeated the selection from the "Pearls of Brazil" after her second. The Grieg Suite proved the most striking feature of the evening. The first movement, "Daybreak," was played with beautiful effect. The second movement, that magnificent dead march of the Norwegian composer, was applauded last night until an encore was forced. The last piece on the program was Schumann's [illegible] D Minor Symphony, which was rendered [illegible] accuracy and [illegible] spirit

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

NEW YORK AND LONDON,

Music Publishers and Importers.

NEW COMPOSITIONS BY

ANTON DVORAK,

THIRTEEN PIANOFORTE PIECES,

OP. 85,

IN THREE BOOKS, EACH $1.50.

LIEBESLIEDER,

(LOVE SONGS,)

For Voice, with Piano Accompaniment, Op. 83, $1.50.

Special Depot of the Publications of ARTHUR P. SCHMIDT, of Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED:

BRUNO OSCAR KLEIN,

ALBUM POETIQUE,

No. 1.	Spring Morning,	40	Cents
" 2.	Evening in the Woods,	40	"
" 3.	Night on the Rhine,	40	"
" 4.	Angelus,	35	"
" 5.	Slavonian Cradle Song,	50	"
" 6.	Capriccietto,	50	"

Eastern Agents for the Publications of

WM. ROHLFING & CO., MILWAUKEE, WISC.

All music performed at Steinway Hall constantly in stock in the best and cheapest standard editions. Lists and Catalogues mailed free.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

21 E. 17th St. (3 doors W. of B'way),

NEW YORK.

GEO. GEMÜNDER, Jr.,

27 Union Sq., NEW YORK.

FINE VIOLINS, BOWS, CASES, &C.

REPAIRING & RECONSTRUCTING.

THE BEST

MUSICAL

INSTRUCTION TO BE OBTAINED AT THE

METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY

21 E. 14TH STREET, NEW YORK.

The Most Select Musical School in the United States.

EXCEPTIONAL ADVANTAGES.

ALL BRANCHES TAUGHT.

Among the eminent musicians actually employed at the Conservatory are:

Dudley Buck, Albert R. Parsons, Director Pianoforte Department; Harry Rowe Shelley, Paolo Giorza, Silas G. Pratt and Etelka Utassi.

Applicants without musical talent not accepted.

Send for Circular.

H. W. GREENE, General Manager. C. B. HAWLEY, Musical Director.

THE AMERICAN MUSICIAN.

EDITORS:

JNO. C. FREUND and J. TRAVIS QUIGG.

An illustrated 32 page paper, published every Saturday at

835 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

For Sale by all News Agents at ten cents per copy. Mailed to Subscribers at $4.00 a year in advance.

Largest Musical Paper with Largest Circulation in America.

The Steinway Hall Programme.

OFFICE, 109 & 111 E. 14TH STREET.

ADELINA PATTI AND CHARLES GOUNOD.

(CABLEGRAM.)

PARIS, Dec. 1, 1888.

Messrs. Steinway, New York:

Maestro Gounod enthusiastic over your piano at rehearsal of "Romeo and Juliet," held at my hotel. He would like to know price of same. Answer paid.

ADELINA PATTI, Hotel Bristol.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1888.

Adelina Patti, Hotel Bristol, Paris:

Please cable number stamped on piano to Steinway, New York. Answer paid.

PARIS, Dec. 2, 1888.

Steinway, New York:

Piano 59,951. Compliments.

ADELINA PATTI.

The instrument proved to be a Steinway concert parlor grand; price was cabled over, at once accepted, and piano ordered by cable to be delivered to Maestro Charles Gounod, who sent the following cable dispatch:

PARIS, Dec. 6, 1888.

Mess. Steinway, Facteur Pianos, New York:

Mille graces, lettre suit. GOUNOD.

(TRANSLATION.)

Thousand thanks, letter follows. GOUNOD.

Letter from the Celebrated Composer CHARLES GOUNOD.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, December 6th, 1888.

My dear Mr. STEINWAY:

I caused a cablegram to be sent to you this very day to transmit to you in the quickest way all my thanks for the superb Grand Piano and the liberal terms that you have made me thereon, and by which you respond in the most generous and princely manner to the wish of my delicious interprète, Mme. Adelina Patti, and to my lifelong admiration for your magnificent instruments.

Although I have not the talent of execution to develop all the resources of this Steinway Grand, nevertheless I hope that as artist I possess at least everything requisite to appreciate all its wonderful qualities and merits, and above all to realize your consideration enabling me to be the possessor of so perfect an instrument which your graciousness makes still more precious to me.

Accept, I beg of you, the assurance of my kindest regards with which I remain

sincerely yours,

CHARLES GOUNOD.

LONDON DAILY TELEGRAPH, Nov. 27, 1888.

[Paris Correspondence.]

M. Gounod—whom I have just met at Madame Adelina Patti's—is most enthusiastic on the rendering of his music by the diva. I mentioned yesterday that he went through at her hotel the principal scenes in which Juliet appears, singing the part of Romeo as only M. Gounod knows how to sing. None who have not heard the composer at the piano can realize what effect can be produced by a singer who has no voice. This afternoon he contented himself with merely running his fingers over the keys in order to show how fine was the tone of the Steinway piano, and he was loud in its praise. The stories about M. Gounod being in bad health are quite unfounded.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

GRAND OPERA IN GERMAN.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 12th, 1890,

First performance this season of

WAGNER'S OPERA,

DIE WALKURE.

FRIDAY, FEB. 14, WAGNER.	WAGNER'S OPERA, LOHENGRIN.
SATURDAY, FEB. 15, MATINEE.	Die Goetterdaemmerung.

—SPECIAL.—

Commencing Wednesday, Feb. 26th, the Wagner operas will be given in chronological order:

WED., FEB. 26 ..... Rienzi
FRI., FEB. 28 ..... Flying Dutchman
MON., MARCH 3 ..... Tannhaeuser
WED., MARCH 5 ..... Lohengrin
FRI., MARCH 7 ..... Die Meistersinger
MON., MARCH 10 ..... Tristan and Isolde
WED., MARCH 12 ..... Rheingold
FRI., MARCH 14 ..... Die Walkure
MON., MARCH 17 ..... Siegfried
WED., MARCH 19 ... Die Goetterdaemmerung

☞ Tickets for the series ONLY may be had on application to the Box Office or by letter enclosing the proper amount.

☞ Tickets will be ready for delivery on and after February 15th.

BOX OFFICE OPEN DAILY FROM 9 TO 6.

STEINWAY'S PIANOS USED EXCLUSIVELY.

1863 Twenty-Seventh Year. 1890

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL,

23 UNION SQUARE.

A Weekly Critical Review of Musical Art.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

Published Every Saturday. Quoted as an Authority on Musical Matters all over the World. Subscription, $3.00 per annum.

A CORDIAL INVITATION IS EXTENDED BY

Mr. J. W. CURRIER

TO ALL LOVERS OF MUSIC TO CALL AT

No. 18 East Seventeenth Street

AND HEAR THE

MASON & RISCH

New Improved Vocalion.

The best interpreter of Sacred, Orchestral, Operatic Music and Music Drama. The instrument is particularly adapted for Churches, Lodges, Private Music Rooms, Etc.

WOLFSOHN'S MUSICAL BUREAU, 331 EAST 14TH ST.

Concerts, Receptions, Musicales, &c., arranged.

JUST PUBLISHED:

"FROM THE TONE WORLD"

ESSAYS BY LOUIS EHLERT.

Translated from the German by HELEN D. TRETBAR.

CONTENTS:

Carl Tausig.—Robert Schumann and his School.—Frederic Chopin.—Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdi.—Robert Volkmann.—Tristan and Isolde, by Richard Wagner (2 Essays).—The Stage Festival at Baireuth.—A Scene from "Die Meistersinger."—Offenbach and the Second Empire.—Gervinus and purely Instrumental Music.—Music Teaching and the Public.—Wagner, Makart and Hamerling. A Parallel.—Gounod contra Wagner.

288 Pages.—Cloth, $1.50.

MAILED UPON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

Published by

C. F. TRETBAR,

109 E. 14th Street, New York.

For sale at G. Schirmer's, 35 Union Sq.; Edw. Schuberth & Co.'s, 23 Union Sq.; and at the Music and Book Stores.

Miss LILLIE BERG,

The leading exponent in America of "LAMPERTI'S METHOD." European masters and composers annually consulted for style and interpretation. DELSARTE studies. Teachers for vocal and piano under Miss Berg's direct supervision at moderate rates. 337 West 59th Street. Send for Circular.

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

THE NATIONAL Conservatory of Music

OF AMERICA,

Nos. 126 & 128 East 17th Street,

NEW YORK.

OFFICERS:

President, JEANNETTE M. THURBER.
Treasurer, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.
Secretary, CHAS. INSLEE PARDEE, A. M.

INCORPORATORS:

Mrs. AUGUST BELMONT, Mrs. RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.,
Mrs. WM. T. BLODGETT, Mrs. F. B. THURBER,
Mrs. THOMAS W. WARD,
AUGUST BELMONT, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.,
ANDREW CARNEGIE, HENRY G. MARQUAND,
WILLIAM G. CHOATE, JESSE SELIGMAN,
†JOSEPH W. DREXEL, FRANCIS B. THURBER,
PARKE GODWIN WILLIAM K. VANDERBILT,
WILLIAM R. GRACE.

Founded for the benefit of Musical Talent in the United States, and conferring its benefits free upon all applicants sufficiently gifted to warrant the prosecution of a thorough course of studies and unable to pay for the same; and upon others of the requisite aptitude on the payment of a small fee.

THE COURSE

Embraces, as that of all European Conservatories of note, Instruction in Singing, operatic and miscellaneous, Solfeggio, Stage Deportment, Elocution, Piano, Violin, Cello, Harmony, Counterpoint and Composition, Fencing, Italian, History of Music, Chorus and Orchestral Classes, etc. The

LIST OF PROFESSORS

Includes Monsieur Theophile Manoury, Principal of Vocal Department, Miss Eleanor Warner Everest, Mr. Christian Fritsch; Messrs. Frenceili, Pizzarello, Dulcken and Perrot, Messrs. Klein and Finck, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Misses Pinney, Margulies and Comstock, Messrs. Huneker and Winkler, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, Mr. Jan Koert, Mr. Victor Herbert, Mr. W. V. Holt, Messrs. Senac and Bibeyran, Signor Cianelli, Mr. John Cheshire, Harp; Mr. Otto Oesterle, Flute; Mr. Joseph Schreurs, Clarinet; Mr. Rudolph Reuter, Bassoon; Mr. Arthur Trepte, Oboe; Mr. Ludwig Manoly, Contra-basso.

Children's classes in Solfeggio are held bi-weekly; Mr. F. Van der Stucken, Chorus Master and Leader of the Orchestra holds weekly Rehearsals.

THE NATIONAL CONSERVATORY

IS THE

ONLY MUSICAL INSTITUTE

In America in which the ground work of a thorough musical education is laid, and the structure afterward carried to completion. Its professors have been appointed without consideration of expense and wholly on their merits and reputation, and they form an

ADMIRABLE FACULTY

With no end in view but the impartment of knowledge and the consequent elevation of the public taste, with no other revenue than that contributed by lovers of music and the very small returns derived from the nominal tuition charged, and with no contribution whatever from talented candidates for admission unable to pay for high class tuition, it is believed that the National Conservatory addresses itself to all patriotic and music loving Americans as a

NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Of the utmost importance to the artistic future of the land.

The Semi-Annual Entrance Examinations will take place as follows: VOICE, Monday, January 6th, 1890, from 10 to 12 A. M., 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. PIANO, Tuesday, January 7th, from 10 to 12 A. M. and 2 to 5 P. M. VIOLIN and 'CELLO, Wednesday, January 8th, from 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. CHORUS, Wednesday Eve'g, January 8th, from 8 to 10 o'clock. ORCHESTRA, Saturday Evening, January 11th, from 8 to 10 o'clock.

All communications to

CHAS. INSLEY PARDEE, A. M., Sec'y,
126 & 128 E. 17th St., NEW YORK

AMERICAN PIANOS IN TROPICAL CLIMATES.

Via Brindisi.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

New York, U. S. A.

DEAR SIRS: I feel that I ought to tell you how much we prize your piano. It has been tuned but once since we came to this country in 1883, and so far as I can see, is just as good as when we got it in 1876. I would not take $1000 for it if I could not get another like it. All my daughters play and would hardly know what to do without it. You are doing grand work in giving such grand instruments to the music loving world. Wishing you still greater success,

Yours very truly,

B. D. WYCKOFF.

Subathee Panjab, India, March 15th, 1887.

Mme. ADELINA PATTI.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 4th, 1882.

To Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

NEW YORK.

DEAR SIRS: Allow me to express to you the great satisfaction and pleasure that I have experienced from the use of your famous Pianos, which you have placed at my disposal during the concert tour now in course of progress in the United States.

During my artistic career in the art centres of the world, I have used the pianos of nearly all celebrated manufacturers, but none of them can be compared to yours—none possess to such a marvelous degree that sympathetic, poetic and singing tone quality which distinguishes the Steinway as peerless among them all. Before returning to Europe, I shall select and purchase one of your Grand pianos for Craig-y-nos Castle, my residence in South Wales.

Respectfully yours,

ADELINA PATTI.

FRANZ ABT.

NEW YORK, July 6th, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

GENTLEMEN: Permit me to thank you for the magnificent Upright Piano which you kindly placed at my disposal during my brief sojourn in New York, and I can only repeat what I have so often expressed verbally—that during my long career as Artist and Composer, I have met with many fine European and American Piano-Fortes, but none that combine grandeur and poetry of tone, elasticity of touch, in short, everything that renders a piano perfect, to such a high degree as your celebrated Piano-Fortes.

Very truly yours,

FRANZ ABT.

FELICIEN DAVID.

PARIS, June 28th, 1867.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,

NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN: I am only too happy to give you, in these lines, a very sincere testimonial of my admiration for the Pianos manufactured by your House.

In my idea they are superior to all that I have heard or tried to the present day, and in giving you this certificate, I not only fulfill a duty of conscience, but at the same time do render justice to the man and manufacturer who has realized in his productions the greatest progress in the art of Piano-making.

Accept, gentlemen, my best wishes for your well-merited success, and believe me

Your devoted

FELICIEN DAVID.

A. BRAUTIGAM,

MANUFACTURER OF AND DEALER IN

Upright, Square and Grand Piano-Fortes,

8 EAST 17th STREET,

Near 5th Ave., NEW YORK.

STEINWAY PIANOS TO RENT.

Rare Old Violins for Sale.

MME. DÉSIRÉE ARTÔT-DE PADILLA

Begs to announce that her address is

64 RUE JAUFFRAY, PARIS, FRANCE,

And that she is prepared to receive pupils professional and amateur.

Kneipp's

BONBONS, CHOCOLATES,

NOVELTIES IN FANCY BASKETS AND BONBONNIERES,

863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

TRY OUR

COCOA

FOR BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

PURE!! HEALTHFUL!!!

SOLD BY LEADING GROCERS.

Miss MARIE KREBS.

NEW YORK, May 17, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN:—Ere leaving America to fulfill engagements in Europe, permit me to thank you for the many courtesies extended to me, but above all for your kindness in furnishing for my Concerts, during the last two seasons, your magnificent Concert Grands, the most perfect instruments I have met with during my artistic career.

Their tone is marvelously grand, of exquisite poetical and sympathetic quality, which was to me a perfect revelation when trying the Steinway Piano for the first time; and it is just this thoroughly musical quality of tone, invariably characterizing your Pianos, which so grows upon both the hearer and player, that a cultivated musical ear will prefer the tone of your Pianos to all others. The touch is simply perfect, elastic, pliable, and promptly responding to all and every demand made by the pianist.

After thoroughly testing your Pianos, both in private and public, I can conscientiously say that the Steinway Pianos are superior to all other American or European instruments known to me.

Yours sincerely,

MARIE KREBS.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

NEW YORK, July 19th, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

Possessing, as you do, the highest testimonials for your celebrated Pianos, from the greatest musicians of the age, it would be supererogation on my part to endorse the opinions of such Judges as Rubinstein and Liszt; but I cannot refrain from praising your pianos, for the wonderful manner in which they sustain the voice.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 1/5

Clipping from Post Washington D C

Date 1/3

Will be on sale this morning.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

To-night is the occasion of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Music Hall. The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch from the lovely Sakuntala overture, through the novel Peer Gynt suite so pleasing to Bostonians, to Schumann's lovely, and romantic symphony, fairly bristles with interest and promise. An act of courtesy which should find hearty appreciation is that of Mr. Nikisch in changing his programme, and of Mr. Kneisel in changing his concerto, so that this community may hear a work new to it, the Brahms concerto. The con- somewhat noteworthy, as an to hear for the first time mn- Boston's composition, the ca- used to the concerto having been by Bern. Only the largest audiences to this hall can hold will do justice

Clipping from Register New Haven Conn

Date 1/11

course about it. It deserves crowded houses this and to-morrow evening and to-morrow afternoon.

The music loving people of New Haven were given a rare treat yesterday, when they were allowed to continue the delightful hours of the afternoon that were spent with Mr. Damrosch, by the rare treat of another performance by the Boston phony orchestra, under Herr Nikisch's splendid leadership. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture opened last night's concert, and this was followed by Mlle. De Vere's rendition, in a most delightful manner, of the aria from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She received four recalls after her first appearance, and repeated the selection from the "Pearls of Brazil" after her second. The Grieg Suite proved the most striking feature of the evening. The first movement, "Daybreak," was played with beautiful effect. The second movement, that magnificent dead march of the Norwegian composer, was applauded last night until an encore was forced. The last piece on the program was Schumann's D Minor Symphony, which was rendered with pealing accuracy and dented spirit

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.5 mm

abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

RICHARD WAGNER.

TWO LETTERS FROM RICHARD WAGNER.

During the Grand Operatic Festival at Bayreuth in 1876, a number of new Grand pianos of the most celebrated European as well as of several American makers had been placed at Mr. Richard Wagner's disposal; among them a new Centennial Concert Grand piano made by "Steinway & Sons" of New York, which from its wonderful power, beauty and sympathetic quality far outshone all rival instruments and which Mr. Richard Wagner at once chose for his own private use.

In the beginning of 1879 Mr. Wagner was requested by Mr. Theo. Steinway to send this piano to the Steinway Central European depot, in order to receive the latest invention, the "Tone Pulsator," patented July, 1878. On sending the Grand, Mr. Wagner writes as follows:

"BAYREUTH, March 11th, 1879.

My dear Mr. Steinway.

I miss my Steinway Grand as one misses a beloved wife; it is wanting constantly, wanting everywhere. I no longer indulge in music since that Grand is gone, and trust its absence will not be too long protracted.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD WAGNER."

The following letter was written to Mr. Theodore Steinway by the great master shortly after the return of the Steinway Grand (now containing the Tone Pulsator) to his home:

"BAYREUTH, April 11th, 1879.

My dear Mr. Steinway.

Really, you ought personally to have witnessed the gratification which I experienced upon receiving back your magnificent Grand piano; you certainly would not have asked me to add another word.

I do indeed deem it humiliating for so many other branches of art, that this art of building piano-fortes alone should so closely approach such undeniable ideal perfection. I know of nothing in Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Literature and unfortunately also Music, which—since I have comprehension of same—could compare with the masterly perfection reached in piano forte building.

From your communication, however, I readily perceive with what enthusiastic love you seek to attain the incorporation of the most "spirituelle" tone into the piano which heretofore had only served as the exponent of actual musical sound. Our great Tone-Masters, when writing the grandest creations for the piano-forte, seem to have had a presentiment of the ideal Grand Piano, as now attained by yourselves. A Beethoven Sonata, a Bach Chromatic Fantasia can only be appreciated when rendered upon one of your piano-fortes.

Although I do not possess the slightest dexterity in piano-forte playing, I delight in being able to do justice to your assumption of my inborn and cultivated sense of tone. For Sounds of such Beauty as those coming from my Steinway Grand, flatter and coax the most agreeable Tone-picture from my harmonic melodic senses.

In a word, "I find your Grand piano of wondrous beauty. It is a noble work of Art." And with a thousand thanks for this attention, I delight in being able to call myself

Your friend,

RICHARD WAGNER."

FRANZ LISZT.

WEIMAR, September 3rd, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTS: The magnificent Steinway Grand Piano now stands in my music room, and presents a harmonic totality of admirable qualities, a detailed enumeration of which is the more superfluous, as this instrument fully justifies the world-wide reputation that for years you have everywhere enjoyed.

After so much well-deserved praise, permit me to also add my homage, and the expression of my undisguised admiration, with which I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

FRANZ LISZT.

THEODORE THOMAS.

CINCINNATI, July 19th, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN: I consider the Steinway Piano the best Piano at present made, and that is the reason why I use it in private and also in my public concerts. As long as the Pianos of Messrs. Steinway & Sons retain that high degree of excellence of manufacture, and those admirable qualities which have always distinguished them, I shall continue to use them, in preference to all other pianos.

Respectfully yours,

THEODORE THOMAS.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

NEW YORK, May 24th, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN: On the eve of returning to Europe, I deem it my pleasant duty to express to you my most heartfelt thanks for all the kindness and courtesy you have shown me during my stay in the United States; but also, and above all, for your unrivaled Piano-Fortes, which once more have done full justice to their world-wide reputation, both for excellence and capacity of enduring the severest trials. For during all my long and difficult journeys all over America, in a very inclement season, I used and have been enabled to use your Pianos exclusively in my two hundred and fifteen concerts, and also in private, with the most eminent satisfaction and effect.

Yours, very truly,

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

ANTON SEIDL.

BERLIN, June 4th, 1887.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,
NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN:—It affords me the greatest pleasure to express to you my delight in the grand piano that you have recently shipped to our mutual friend, Mr. Albert Niemann. The wondrous beauty of its tone and quality, its easy touch, its enchanting pianos and glorious fortes, the perfect evenness from the lowest tones to the very highest—the latter of a distinctness I have never met with heretofore—all produce an entrancing effect. Unrequested I am compelled to express to you my highest admiration. Upon this grand piano the world-famed musical authority, Heinrich Ehrlich, performed an adagio by Beethoven; friend Franz Rummel played a Beethoven sonata and some of Bach's titanic music, while I essayed to interpret the orchestral language of Wagner. Everything sounded entrancing and sublime.

In the admiration of this your masterwork, and in the expectation of a speedy, joyful meeting, I remain, with highest esteem, your devoted

ANTON SEIDL.

H. A. ROST, STEAM PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT 14 FRANKFORT STREET, NEW YORK.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 2/

Clipping from Post
Washington D C
Date 1/3

will be on sale this morning.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

To-night is the occasion of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Music Hall. The programme selected by Mr. Nikisch from the lovely Sakuntala overture, through the novel Peer Gynt suite so pleasing to Bostonians, to Schumann's lovely and romantic symphony, fairly bristles with interest and promise. An act of courtesy which should find hearty appreciation is that of Mr. Nikisch in changing his programme, and of Mr. Kneisel in changing his concerto, so that this community may hear a work new to it, the Brahms concerto. The con- somewhat noteworthy, as an to hear for the first time mu- comparison, the ca- concert having been by him [illegible]

Clipping from Register
Baltimore
Date

course about it. It des houses this and to-morrow morrow afternoon.

The music loving people were given a rare treat y they were allowed to conti ful hours of the afternoon with Mr. Damrosch, by t another performance by t phony orchestra, under splendid leadership. Bec lanus" overture opened cert, and this was follow Vere's rendition, in a mo ner, of the aria from the Mozart. She received f her first appearance, and lection from the "Pearls her second. The Gr most striking features of first movement, "[illegible] with beautiful effect. ment, that reminded us Norwegian composer

Clipping from Philadelphia Press

Date 2/11

Third Symphony Concert.

At eight o'clock the Hyperion audience was transferred almost intact to the Hyperion, and was joined by many others. Those who had just been listening to one of the most sympathetic and earnest musical interpreters the world has yet produced, were now to hear one of its most perfect orchestras, under one of its most inspired leaders. One great charm which both Mr. Damrosch and Herr Nikisch share in common is their youth. They are still fresh in their work, and their enthusiasm is still warm and deep. They are not of the men who, by lives of long and constant study, have in their latter years won a good practical understanding of music and an almost boundless store of technical knowledge. They have music "born in them;" they feel it, and the magetism of their earnest natures is imparted to their musicians and their audience. Both have faces of a marked and expressive character, faces of men who feel and live in the poetic beauty of the compositions they interpret.

Last evening's concert was opened by Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which, being familiar, needs no comment. It is scored almost entirely for the strings, and the preeminence of that position of the Boston orchestra is practically undisputed.

The second selection was a bit of coloratore singing by Mlle. De Vere, whose voice proved to be remarkably sweet, high and clear. She wore a white dress of Grecian design, with gold passamen erie on the bodice and down the front of the dress. She received four recalls after her first appear and was obliged to repeat the selection from "The Pearls of Brazil" after her second.

The Grieg Suite, however, was the feature of the evening. The opening "Daybreak" with the familiar flageolet music imitative of shepherds' pipes was exquisitely played. The second movement, "Asa's Death," however, was the most impressiv displaying a softness and volume in th strings that surpassed even all their forme fine work. Many dead marches hav been written, and many glorious one but none have surpassed the work of thi Norwegian composer in depicting horro and dignity. His is the silent, crushed fea that overpowers its victim, and in the las faint throbs of this great piece, one can al most hear the failing breath of the dying With remarkable versatility the compose takes us from the death bed of the Nor wegian mother to the dance of the Arabia siren, and in the third number we have truly oriental scene, with the languid ac companiment of lutes (a pizzicato on one half of the strings) and a peculiar effect o the triangle, while the dreamy melody o the eastern dance is played on the othe half of the strings. The closing scene "I the Halls of the King of the Doore Moun tains" is one of the weirdest marches eve written. It has a wildness and spirit rem iniscent of the famous "Rackocsy March," but there is a certain supernatural atmos phere, a rumbling the caverns of the imps and sounds of distant thunder, and other effects impossible to describe that give it a fascination all its own. This strange piece was loudly applauded, and, on being repeated, was loudly applauded again.

The last piece on the programme was Schumann's D Minor Symphony, which proved interesting throughout and called for the full resources of Herr Nickisch's musical forces. It was given not only with the proverbial accuracy of this great orchestra, but with a splendid spirit and inspiring volume. At one moment delightful romantic passages, recalling the composer's "Widmung" and other great love songs were heard, and at other, marching measures worthy of Wagner.

It is with regret that we realize there is only one more concert to be given here by this superb orchestra this season, and we hope that in this last appearance Herr Nikisch will give us an opportunity to enjoy some of the noble music Mr. Damrosch is lecturing on, in its full beauty, as interpreted by his great musical organization.

Clipping from Tribune
New York

Date 2/12

WORKED TO FEVER HEAT

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT'S EFFECT ON THE AUDIENCE.

HERR NIKISCH'S MAGIC BATON AT THE HYPERION—THE BRILLIANT SINGING OF CLEMENTINE DE VERE—WALTER DAMROSCH'S LECTURE-RECITAL.

The third of the Boston symphony concerts opened at the Hyperion last evening, under the baton of Herr Nikisch, with the overture to "Coriolanus" by Beethoven, Op. 62. This is considered to be the noblest of Beethoven's overtures, and opens in a very striking and impressive manner, followed by a feverish and forceful phrase, the "first subject." This in turn gives place to a "counter-subject," and throughout the whole is seen the masterly working out of the stringed instruments, with which Beethoven was so familiar. It closes most dramatically, illustrating the dying Coriolanus, and is finally lost in the exquisite pianissimo.

Mlle. Clementine de Vere in her usual brilliant manner rendered the "aria" from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She is renowned for her perfect execution and possesses a clear full voice of remarkable range. To continued applause she unfortunately did not respond.

Grieg's Suites, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46, 1 derived from a Norwegian folk legend an is worked out to climaxes most astonishin and interesting. This work fully deserved the reception it received in Boston last winter, and last evening's reception showe that it also captured the New Have musical people. The first movement repre senting "Daybreak"—allegretto pastorale—was very sweet and poetical, the bird song being represented and morning's gentl dawn illustrated by the gradual swelling of the strings to forte.

The second movement, "The death of Aase"—andante doloroso—the death of Peer Gynt's mother, leaves upon the mind the feeling of sadness but not of despair, and is brought to a close by a perfect diminuendo, illustrating the further flight of the spirit soaring into space. "Anitra's dance"—tempo di mazurka—was a bewitching movement and every one seemed filled with the pervading rythm of the dance; but finest of all the movements was the "alla marcia e molto marcato," and pictures the imps tormenting Peer Gynt. This is exceedingly grotesque, and simply worked the audience to fever-heat as it proceeded, increasing in speed till it reached an unmistakable "presto," and ending in a manner perfectly in harmony with the demoniac character of the movement. This was repeated after prolonged applause.

The next number was "Les Perles de Brazil," a vocal number by Mlle. de Vere, and in this she appeared to even greater advantage than in her earlier selection. Most prominent in her execution may be mentioned the duet with the flute in imitation of birds. She was heartily encored and responded by repeating the latter part of the number.

Closing the concert was the Symphony in D minor by Schumann. This shows most unmistakably that composer's peculiar style, and astonishes and confounds the minds of those trained in the usual mode of symphony, for Schumann entirely ignores the general plan in working out his composition. There is but little pause between the movements, and indeed they might be played continuously, they are of such similarity with the exception of the "finale," which works up to a considerable presto and fortissimo. Shumann treats the motifs in the composition in a very disjointed manner, and when repeating a former theme does not satisfy the hearer with its completion, but in a remarkable way reserves part to be played later. The sweetest themes appear in the romance (adagio non troppo) certainly the gem of the work.

Clipping from Tribune
New York

Date 2/12

MUSIC—THE DRAMA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A novelty which was interesting, at times too imposing, rather than beautiful, concluded the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night. It was a kind of symphonic poem entitled "Romeo and Juliet," and described by its composer, Tschaikowsky, as an "overture fantasia," which is a somewhat fantastic designation, but evidently means a piece of music designed as an introduction, but freer in form than the customary overture. There is much effective music in the work, though the popular conception of what ought to be the contents of a composition with such a title is little considered. The hatred of the warring houses and a colossal yearning darkly tinged with melancholy seem to have been the elements of the tale which the composer had before him, and as a result the lovers of Verona appear in a profoundly tragic garb in this tone-poem. The audience could not be pleasantly impressed by such a work, but it was evident enough that the professional musicians present (and there were many of them) derived increased admiration for the constructive skill and inventive ingenuity of Tschaikowsky from the performance.

Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second pianoforte concerto in a style which showed a determination to achieve brilliancy at any cost; but as there is precious little poetry or feeling to be sacrificed in the composition, we do not know that there was any cause for disappointment. The brilliant sonority of his performance offered compensation under the circumstances. Not so, however, in the case of the Chopin nocturne, which he played in compliance with an enthusiastic call for more. Here an evident desire to imbue the composition with masculinity and strength resulted in a hard and angular performance, in which we could find no charm. The rest of the programme consisted of Haydn's familiar symphony in G (No. 13 in Breitkopf and Haertel's edition), and the same four numbers from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Thomas has made popular here. In both of the numbers Mr. Nikisch delighted the audience with a display of virtuososhiip in conducting. In the case of the symphony the appeal was made very legitimately through the eloquent beauty of the music. In the other case it partook a little of undignified sensationalism. His working up of the climax in the grotesque march which brings the selection to a close was a splendid feat, but it was rather disappointing to observe that the sharp clashing of cymbals, accentuated by incisive, yet graceful, movements of the arms, should have been accepted by the public as the thing most worthy of demonstrative approval.

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass

Date 2/12

The Boston Symphony.

The committee appointed to canvass the city for the sale of tickets enough to assure the success of the enterprise met Saturday afternoon at the Y. M. C. A. to report progress. It was found that about 550 tickets had been taken, leaving fully 150 more to be subscribed for to make the matter certain. It is hoped that our citizens will not want to be called upon but will notify some one of the committee by card or by telephone No. 244—13 at the Y. M. C. A., stating how many tickets they desire. This must be settled at once as the date will not be kept open but a very few days. This will be the only chance to get this justly famous orchestra composed of 60 of the leading musicians in New England to visit this city during this season, and those who wish to hear them should interest themselves at once to enable the committee to complete the canvass necessary to cover the cost. Should any funds remain in the treasury it will be added to the building fund of the Association. An alphabetical list of subscribers has been prepared at the rooms and when the sale of reserved seats open only those whose names are found on the subscription list will be allowed the first choice of seats and their names will be checked off when they secure their tickets. For this reason every one who wishes a good seat should be sure that his name is registered [illegible]

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass

Date 2/12

The Symphony Concert.

The committee of the Young Men's Christian Association which has been engaged in the canvass for the sale of tickets for the symphony concert met yesterday. It was found that the committee had secured pledges for the sale of 702 tickets, and it was decided to complete arrangements for the concert. The box office will be opened for the sale of seats to subscribers Feb. 22 when those whose names are on the check lists of the committee will be given the privilege of securing reserved seats. The lists for the subscription will remain open for some time longer. The expenses of the concert now being guaranteed every dollar paid for a ticket to the concert is a dollar for the Y. M. C. A. building fund. Nathaniel Hathaway was chosen chairman of the Opera House committee, William B. Wood chairman of the ticket committee, and W. E. Lougee was chosen treasurer of the committee. The programme has not been arranged as yet. It is settled, however, that Miss Gertrude Edmands will appear as a soloist.

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia Pa

Date 2/13

[78]

THEY'RE ALL ARTISTS.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy Last Night.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Academy of Music. Massenet's overture to "Phedre," which opened the concert, is a work which, opening in a most promising way, is rather disappointing.

The Allegro is almost trivial, and this weakness of the composition has doubtless prevented its earlier performance, although the score has been for many years in the library of several distinguished conductors.

Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra which followed, on the contrary, is a most interesting work.

It is admirably scored for the orchestra, and its performance last night had the additional advantage of being the solo part played by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, who has a fine tone, considerable technique and exquisite taste.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," which has been heard here previously at a Thomas concert some seasons ago, was about as perfect an orchestral performance as it is possible to hear. If there has been any doubt about Mr. Nikisch's preserving the delicacy of the strings, so conspicuous during the former seasons of this orchestra, last night's rendering of the marche funebre of the suite must have entirely removed it.

The quaint finale with its effective accelerando had to be repeated in answer to the enthusiastic applause. Mendelssohn's ever welcome Italian Symphony, also superbly played, closed one of the best concerts which this renowned organization has ever given here.

Clipping from Star
Washington D C

Date 2/14

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra's series was given last evening in Music hall before a very large audience. The program was distinctively a modern one—three of the five composers represented upon it are living—and it was one of rare and sustained interest and vigorous contrast; furthermore it offered two interesting novelties in Grieg's recently published suite to "Peer Gynt" and the first movement of Brahm's violin concerto in D, a very grateful substitute for the Mendelssohn, already three times heard here this winter. The concerto was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel with a dignity and nobility of style that were in fullest accord with the spirit of the composition; it is a work of the significance and importance to be expected from the greatest of living composers and modeled after the loftiest ideals of that classical spirit of which Brahm's is the greatest and almost the last remaining conservator. The "Peer Gynt" suite is as far as possible from this in conception. It is wholly descriptive in its purpose, fantastically and even sensationally so. Of course it gives occasion for many striking and original effects, which Mr. Nikitsh was not slow to take the fullest advantage of. One that showed in an almost unexampled fashion the powers of the orchestra was the marvelous pianissimo at the close of the second movement. The almost comic picture of the imps chasing Peer Gynt, with its eccentricities of rhythm and orchestration, appealed to the audience, so—it must have been to the sense of humor rather than to the musical instinct—that a repetition of it was insisted upon. The Schumann symphony, which closed the concert, brought into play some of the most remarkable attributes of Mr. Nikisch's conducting; it was read in a style that gave the fullest exposition to the composer's idea by the elaboration and contrast given to every detail of the work, the delightful and characteristic setting forth of its rhythmic niceties and the warmth and affluence of tonal beauty in which the whole was clothed.

Clipping from Palladium
New Haven Conn

Date 2/11

Third Symphony Concert.

At [illegible] Mr. Damrosch's audience was transferred almost intact to the Hyperion, and was joined by many others. Those who had just been listening to one of the most sympathetic and earnest musical interpreters the world has yet produced, were now to hear one of its most perfect orchestras, under one of its most inspired leaders. One great charm which both Mr. Damrosch and Herr Nikisch share in common is their youth. They are still fresh in their work, and their enthusiasm is still warm and deep. They are not of the men who, by lives of long and constant study, have in their latter years won a good practical understanding of music and an almost boundless store of technical knowledge. They have music "born in them;" they feel it, and the magetism of their earnest natures is imparted to their musicians and their audience. Both have faces of a marked and expressive character, faces of men who feel and live in the poetic beauty of the compositions they interpret.

Last evening's concert was opened by Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which, being familiar, needs no comment. It is scored almost entirely for the strings, and the preeminence of that position of the Boston orchestra is practically undisputed.

The second selection was a bit of coloratture singing by Mlle. De Vere, whose voice proved to be remarkably sweet, high and clear. She wore a white dress of Grecian design, with gold passamen erie on the bodice and down the front of the dress. She received four recalls after her first appear and was obliged to repeat the selection from "The Pearls of Brazil" after her second.

The Grieg Suite, however, was the feature of the evening. The opening "Daybreak" with the familiar flageolet music imitative of shepherds' pipes was exquisitely played. The second movement, "Asa's Death," however, was the most impressive displaying a softness and volume in th strings that surpassed even all their forme fine work. Many dead marches hav been written, and many glorious ones but none have surpassed the work of thi Norwegian composer in depicting horro and dignity. His is the silent, crushed fea that overpowers its victim, and in the las faint throbs of this great piece, one can al most hear the failing breath of the dying With remarkable versatility the compose takes us from the death bed of the Nor wegian mother to the dance of the Arabia siren, and in the third number we have truly oriental scene, with the languid ac companiment of lutes (a pizzicato on one half of the strings) and a peculiar effect o the triangle, while the dreamy melody o the eastern dance is played on the othe half of the strings. The closing scene "I the Halls of the King of the Doore Moun tains" is one of the weirdest marches eve written. It has a wildness and spirit rem iniscent of the famous "Rackocsy March," but there is a certain supernatural atmos phere, a rumbling the caverns of the imps and sounds of distant thunder, and other effects impossible to describe that give it a fascination all its own. This strange piece was loudly applauded, and, on being repeated, was loudly applauded again.

The last piece on the programme was Schumann's D Minor Symphony, which proved interesting throughout and called for the full resources of Herr Nickisch's musical forces. It was given not only with the proverbial accuracy of this great orchestra, but with a splendid spirit and inspiring volume. At one moment delightful romantic passages, recalling the composer's "Widmung" and other great love songs were heard, and at other, marching measures worthy of Wagner.

It is with regret that we realize there is only one more concert to be given here by this superb orchestra this season, and we hope that in this last appearance Herr Nikisch will give us an opportunity to enjoy some of the noble music Mr. Damrosch is lecturing on, in its full beauty, as interpreted by his great musical organization.

K. H.

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass

Date 2/12

Symphony Concert.

The committee of the Young Men's Christian Association which has been engaged in the canvass for the sale of tickets for the symphony concert met yesterday. It was found that the committee had secured pledges for the sale of 702 tickets, and it was decided to complete arrangements for the concert. The box office will be opened for the sale of seats to subscribers Feb. 22 when those whose names are on the check lists of the committee will be given the privilege of securing reserved seats. The lists for the subscription will remain open for some time longer. The expenses of the concert now being guaranteed every dollar paid for a ticket to the concert is a dollar for the Y. M. C. A. building fund. Nathaniel Hathaway was chosen chairman of the Opera House committee, William B. Wood chairman of the ticket committee, and W. E. Lougee was chosen treasurer of the committee. The programme has not been arranged as yet. It is settled, however, that Miss Gertrude Edmands will appear as a soloist.

Clipping from News
New Haven Conn

Date 2/

WORKED TO FEVER HEAT

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT'S EFFECT ON THE AUDIENCE.

HERR NIKISCH'S MAGIC BATON AT THE HYPERION—THE BRILLIANT SINGING OF CLEMENTINE DE VERE—WALTER DAMROSCH'S LECTURE-RECITAL.

The third of the Boston symphony concerts opened at the Hyperion last evening, under the baton of Herr Nikisch, with the overture to "Coriolanus" by Beethoven, Op. 62. This is considered to be the noblest of Beethoven's overtures, and opens in a very striking and impressive manner, followed by a feverish and forceful phrase, the "first subject." This in turn gives place to a "counter-subject," and throughout the whole is seen the masterly working out of the stringed instruments, with which Beethoven was so familiar. It closes most dramatically, illustrating the dying Coriolanus, and is finally lost in the exquisite pianissimo.

Mlle. Clementine de Vere in her usual brilliant manner rendered the "aria" from the "Magic Flute" by Mozart. She is renowned for her perfect execution and possesses a clear full voice of remarkable range. To continued applause she unfortunately did not respond.

Grieg's Suites, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46, 1 derived from a Norwegian folk legend an is worked out to climaxes most astonishing and interesting. This work fully deserved the reception it received in Boston last winter, and last evening's reception showe that it also captured the New Have musical people. The first movement repre senting "Daybreak"—allegretto pastorale—was very sweet and poetical, the bird song being represented and morning's gentl dawn illustrated by the gradual swelling of the strings to forte.

The second movement, "The death of Aase"—andante doloroso—the death of Peer Gynt's mother, leaves upon the mind the feeling of sadness but not of despair, and is brought to a close by a perfect diminuendo, illustrating the further flight of the spirit soaring into space. "Anitra's dance"—tempo di mazurka—was a bewitching movement and every one seemed filled with the pervading rythm of the dance; but finest of all the movements was the "alla marcia e molto marcato," and pictures the imps tormenting Peer Gynt. This is exceedingly grotesque, and simply worked the audience to fever-heat as it proceeded, increasing in speed till it reached an unmistakable "presto," and ending in a manner perfectly in harmony with the demoniac character of the movement. This was repeated after prolonged applause.

The next number was "Les Perles de Brazil," a vocal number by Mlle. de Vere, and in this she appeared to even greater advantage than in her earlier selection. Most prominent in her execution may be mentioned the duet with the flute in imitation of birds. She was heartily encored and responded by repeating the latter part of the number.

Closing the concert was the Symphony in D minor by Schumann. This shows most unmistakably that composer's peculiar style, and astonishes and confounds the minds of those trained in the usual mode of symphony, for Schumann entirely ignores the general plan in working out his composition. There is but little pause between the movements, and indeed they might be played continuously, they are of such similarity with the exception of the "finale," which works up to a considerable presto and fortissimo. Shumann treats the motifs in the composition in a very disjointed manner, and when repeating a former theme does not satisfy the hearer with its completion, but in a remarkable way reserves part to be played later. The sweetest themes appear in the romance (adagio non troppo) certainly the gem of the work.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Tribune
New York N.Y.

Date 2/12

MUSIC—THE DRAMA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A novelty which was interesting, at times too imposing, rather than beautiful, concluded the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night. It was a kind of symphonic poem entitled "Romeo and Juliet," and described by its composer, Tschaikowsky, as an "overture fantasia," which is a somewhat fantastic designation, but evidently means a piece of music designed as an introduction, but freer in form than the customary overture. There is much effective music in the work though the popular conception of what ought to be the contents of a composition with such a title is little considered. The hatred of the warring houses and a colossal yearning darkly tinged with melancholy seem to have been the elements of the tale which the composer had before him, and as a result the lovers of Verona appear in a profoundly tragic garb in this tone-poem. The audience could not be pleasantly impressed by such a work, but it was evident enough that the professional musicians present (and there were many of them) derived increased admiration for the constructive skill and inventive ingenuity of Tschaikowsky from the performance.

Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second pianoforte concerto in a style which showed a determination to achieve brilliancy at any cost; but as there is precious little poetry or feeling to be sacrificed in the composition, we do not know that there was any cause for disappointment. The brilliant sonority of his performance offered compensation under the circumstances. Not so, however, in the case of the Chopin nocturne, which he played in compliance with an enthusiastic call for more. Here an evident desire to imbue the composition with masculinity and strength resulted in a hard and angular performance, in which we could find no charm. The rest of the programme consisted of Haydn's familiar symphony in G (No. 13 in Breitkopf and Haertel's edition), and the same four numbers from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Thomas has made popular here. In both of the numbers Mr. Nikisch delighted the audience with a display of virtuososhiip in conducting. In the case of the symphony the appeal was made very legitimately through the eloquent beauty of the music. In the other case it partook a little of undignified sensationalism. His working up of the climax in the grotesque march which brings the selection to a close was a splendid feat, but it was rather disappointing to observe that the sharp clashing of cymbals, accentuated by incisive, yet graceful, movements of the arms, should have been accepted by the public as the thing most worthy of demonstrative approval.

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass

Date 2/12

The Boston Symphony.

The committee appointed to canvass the city for the sale of tickets enough to assure the success of the enterprise met Saturday afternoon at the Y. M. C. A. to report progress. It was found that about 550 tickets had been taken, leaving fully 150 more to be subscribed for to make the matter certain. It is hoped that our citizens will not want to be called upon but will notify some one of the committee by card or by telephone No. 244—13 at the Y. M. C. A., stating how many tickets they desire. This must be settled at once as the date will not be kept open but a very few days. This will be the only chance to get this justly famous orchestra composed of 60 of the leading musicians in New England to visit this city during this season, and those who wish to hear them should interest themselves at once to enable the committee to complete the canvass necessary to cover the cost. Should any funds remain in the treasury it will be added to the building fund of the Association. An alphabetical list of subscribers has been prepared at the rooms and when the sale of reserved seats open only those whose names are found on the subscription list will be allowed the first choice of seats and their names will be checked off when they secure their tickets. For this reason every one who wishes a good seat should be sure that his name is registered as early.

Clipping from Call
Pub

Date 2/13

[78]

THEY'RE ALL ARTISTS.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy Last Night.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Academy of Music. Massenet's overture to "Phedre," which opened the concert, is a work which, opening in a most promising way, is rather disappointing.

The Allegro is almost trivial, and this weakness of the composition has doubtless prevented its earlier performance, although the score has been for many years in the library of several distinguished conductors.

Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra which followed, on the contrary, is a most interesting work.

It is admirably scored for the orchestra, and its performance last night had the additional advantage of being the solo part played by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, who has a fine tone, considerable technique and exquisite taste.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," which has been heard here previously at a Thomas concert some seasons ago, was about as perfect an orchestral performance as it is possible to hear. If there has been any doubt about Mr. Nikisch's preserving the delicacy of the strings, so conspicuous during the former seasons of this orchestra, last night's rendering of the marche funebre of the suite must have entirely removed it.

The quaint finale with its effective accelerando had to be repeated in answer to the enthusiastic applause. Mendelssohn's ever welcome Italian Symphony, also superbly played, closed one of the best concerts which this renowned organization has ever given here.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Star
Washington DC

Date 2/14

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra's series was given last evening in Music hall before a very large audience. The program was distinctively a modern one—three of the five composers represented upon it are living—and it was one of rare and sustained interest and vigorous contrast; furthermore it offered two interesting novelties in Grieg's recently published suite to "Peer Gynt" and the first movement of Brahm's violin concerto in D, a very grateful substitute for the Mendelssohn, already three times heard here this winter. The concerto was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel with a dignity and nobility of style that were in fullest accord with the spirit of the composition; it is a work of the significance and importance to be expected from the greatest of living composers and modeled after the loftiest ideals of that classical spirit of which Brahm's is the greatest and almost the last remaining conservator. The "Peer Gynt" suite is as far as possible from this in conception. It is wholly descriptive in its purpose, fantastically and even sensationally so. Of course it gives occasion for many striking and original effects, which Mr. Nikitsh was not slow to take the fullest advantage of. One that showed in an almost unexampled fashion the powers of the orchestra was the marvelous pianissimo at the close of the second movement. The almost comic picture of the imps chasing Peer Gynt, with its eccentricities of rhythm and orchestration, appealed to the audience, so—it must have been to the sense of humor rather than to the musical instinct—that a repetition of it was insisted upon. The Schumann symphony, which closed the concert, brought into play some of the most remarkable attributes of Mr. Nikisch's conducting; it was read in a style that gave the fullest exposition to the composer's idea by the elaboration and contrast given to every detail of the work, the delightful and characteristic setting forth of its rhythmic niceties and the warmth and affluence of tonal beauty in which the whole was clothed.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Criterion Course.

Mechanics' Hall, - - - Worcester.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

CLOSING CONCERT

Thursday Evening, February 20,

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

CONCERT TOUR

1890

HANS VON BÜLOW

March 24th, 27th

Under the Management of

MR. LEO GOLDMARK.

BOSTON AUDITORIUM

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Clipping from Eagle Brooklyn N Y

Date ... 7, 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last night Mr. Nikisch and his Bostonians renewed the strong hold they have gained upon Metropolitan people who care for the best music. The concert was the third of the season and Steinway Hall contained a large audience, perhaps the largest of the series. The interest of the programme was sustained throughout. It began with Haydn's Symphony No. 13, at which even those who insist upon having it smile patronizingly, and which many more, who would willingly dispense with it, boldly describe as childish. The most marked impression was made by Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt." It was written as incidental music for Ibsen's dramatic poem of the same name. Four well contrasted numbers were selected. The first, "Daybreak," produces the effect of having been written out of doors, or thought there, while many descriptive compositions seem to have been evolved from the composer's inner consciousness in a hermetically sealed study. But much of Grieg's work is of this open air quality. A death scene, a dance movement and a mad chase of imps of the mountains completed the group. The last was given with extraordinary dash and vigor and was redemanded with such vehemence that the conductor was constrained to depart from his custom and to repeat a part of it. Tschaikowsky's "Overture Fantasie" concluded two solid and stimulating hours—rather less than two, for this conductor apprehends the importance of leaving his listeners wanting more rather than feeling that there is too much. The Russian writer entitles the work "Romeo and Juliet" and adds the remark, "after Shakspeare." Perhaps some persons present were inclined to recall the familiar and feeble jest and say "a long way after," for there was little of what might have been looked for in a version of the immortal love tragedy. But there was an overshadowing suggestion of fatality, which is as powerful a factor as sentiment in the drama. Mr. Joseffy played Liszt's second concerto with great spirit and force and after many recalls a Chopin nocturne.

Clipping from Post Washington D.C. 2,

Date ...

A MUSICAL FEAST.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall.

Mr. Nikisch demonstrated the catholicity of his taste and the virtuosity of his conductorship at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The concert also evidenced that the popular mind harbors a love for tunefulness and for originality that is not easily eradicated. For the rich harmonies of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the classic grace of a Brahm's concerto, and the refreshing lyrical beauty of a Schumann symphony were almost as nought, beside a somewhat theatrical suite, composed by Edward Grieg to accompany Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt."

Mr. Nikisch did not play all of the music written by Grieg, but the four movements on the programme were sufficiently full of odd and even bizarre effects, which in the last number, "The Dance in the Hall of the King," bordered on sensationalism. The first movement, "Daybreak," was exquisitely poetic, but the remaining three appealed to the ear and not to the intelligence. The pianissimo effect, which concluded the funeral march illustrated the wonderful control and composure of the orchestra, while in the dance the extreme rapidity of tempo and the startling dynamic effects, commingled with a curious melodic rhythm, led to such prolonged applause that Mr. Nikisch repeated the movement just as he did in Boston.

Schumann's familiar symphony in D minor, which was the last number when it should have been heard earlier in the evening, was given an interesting and smooth interpretation, its chief feature apart from those characteristics of perfect playing which are inseparable from this orchestra, being the careful way in which the mellifluous themes were emphasized. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who played the first movement of Brahms' concerto in D for the violin in a thoroughly artistic manner. His tone, which at first seemed small, gradually grew to its accustomed roundness, depth, and purity, and the cadenza proved him to be as musicianly and masterly in composition as in technical execution. In the air "Hongroise" he was less in his element.

The hall was crowded, every seat being occupied, and even standing room being at a premium.

THE TELEGRAM.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1890.

MR. NIKISCH AGAIN.

The Symphony Orchestra's Concert Closes the Criterion Course.

The Criterion course of entertainments, which has been running through the past 12 weeks, was brought to a brilliant close last evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Mechanics hall.

Arthur Nikisch, whatever may have been his thought as to the impression he left with Worcester people at the first concert, last December, could no longer have entertained even a lingering doubt after the prompt and hearty welcome which was accorded him when he came forward. Mr. Nikisch does not look like an enthusiast: he has a very calm, placid demeanor, and when he is off the conductor's stand, it may appear languid even; but when he enters into his work, it is in no uncertain way that he carries it forward.

The opening number, last evening, was the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony in A. A bright and sparkling allegro vivace is the first movement, which is followed by the andante con moto, full of a stately solemnity and especially notable for the delightful parts assigned the wood-wind. The third movement is con moto moderato, and the finale, entitled, "Saltarello," has a gaiety which is not wanton but apparently born of mirthful tendencies long pent up and now given a holiday.

A short and rather stout gentleman, who had the air of a stranger, though he has been here before, hitched about considerably in a most uncomfortable leather covered chair—presumably slippery—before he struck the first chords of the Liszt concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 2, in A major. It was Rafael Joseffy, and he played in a manner so faultless as to challenge the admiration of the dullest perception. "Wonderful technique!" was the comment generally passed. Mr. Joseffy's touch was incisive and firm, or soft and studiously gentle, as might be required. The splendid concerto, with its frequent changes of tempo and variations of the theme, needs a master touch. The rhythm is always perfect, and the poetry of the works shines forth in every cadence. The intelligent accompaniment, not forgetting the 'cello, gave Mr. Joseffy's performance a most satisfactory background. Mr. Joseffy was twice recalled to bow, and Mr. Nikisch gave him a cordial handshake and a pleasant smile.

The audience was pronounced as to one thing, and that was that it liked the "Peer Gynt" suite wonderfully well. There was every reason why it should like it, for it was wonderfully well done, and it has in it elements of everyday popularity. Ibsen, Boston's new idol, wrote a dramatic poem which he called "Peer Gynt," some 20 years ago, and Grieg found in it the material for his suite. It certainly is a charming thing, and will convince those who have not yet become Ibsenized that Grieg's idea of Ibsen is vastly preferable to Ibsen's idea of himself. The suite has four movements. "Daybreak" is an apt title for the first, which is an allegretto pastorale. The second is entitled "The Death of Aase," and is an andante doloroso. The united strings sustained the movement, and, in light and shade, proved all that Mr. Nikisch could wish. The third movement also, "Anitra's Dance," tempo di mazurka, is also sustained by the strings only and proved equally effective. The fourth is entitled "The Hall of the Mountain King," the movement being alla marcia molto marcato, and taxed the resources of the full orchestra. It is a most picturesque movement, beginning with long, soft notes of the wood wind, and ending with a stirring clash of cymbals and drums, and it brought out the brass more than anything else given during the evening. An imperative call for an encore induced Mr. Kikisch to repeat the last movement. There can be no harm in saying that two movements for strings only are a temptation to the clarinets to cast doux yeux at the gallery.

Mr. Joseffy played two solo numbers, Gluck's "Aria di Ballo," and a march of Schubert Faussig, and was three times recalled.

Goldmark's "Sakumtala" overture, as gorgeous as Joseph's coat, and worked out from an andante in the beginning to a brilliant close, closed the program.

Miss Mary Howe and Lucien Howe were with Jerome Marble's party, in the audience.

Miss Mary Howe Sings for Mr. Ellis—Choir Engagements.

Miss Mary Howe sang, privately, at Gorham's music rooms, yesterday afternoon, for Mr. Ellis, the symphony orchestra manager, no one being present besides a friend of Miss Howe, her brother, Lucien Howe, Mr. Ellis and Miss Howe herself. Miss Howe sang the aria, "Regnava vel Silenzio" from "Lucia" and Mr. Ellis expressed his delight in a complimentary way. It is understood that the symphony people have been desirous of securing Miss Howe for a concert, but it is getting well along in the season and no arrangement is known to have been made.

[79]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third subscription concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Steinway Hall on Tuesday night of last week, was as well attended as its predecessors, and the excellent performances of this model band under its model conductor were received with no lack of applause and enthusiasm.

The arrangement of the program was not particularly a felicitous one, the placing of the Tschaikowsy "Romeo and Juliet" at the end being of rather questionable effectiveness, as this difficult and ultra-romantic work needs freshness and closest attention on the part of the listener to insure a sympathetic and appreciative hearing. The composition is rather vague in form, which the composer designates as "Ouverture Fantaisie," and still more so in design; and as for characteristic, it might just as well have been named "Antony and Cleopatra" as "Romeo and Juliet" for all the program meaning it conveys. As absolute music, however, it is quite interesting, especially from a technical point of view, the thematic treatment and orchestral coloring being quite masterly and at times of surprising effectiveness. The work contains, however, but one big and noble theme, and that one, quite suggestive of Gounod, lacks the originality which one is wont to look for and so often to find in Tschaikowsky.

The difficult composition was played with magnificent energy and telling precision under Mr. Nikisch's directions, the only flaw being the fact that the bass tuba was nearly an eighth of a tone higher in pitch than the rest of the orchestra, a fact which became painfully patent to refined musical ears in the low B natural, which that instrument repeatedly gives forth, solo and forte, in the closing episode of "Romeo and Juliet."

The other orchestral numbers were the four now well-known movements, strung together somewhat incoherently as a suite, from Grieg's light waisted but prettily colored and cleverly harmonized "Peer Gynt" music, and Haydn's exquisite little G major symphony (No. 13 in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition), which opened the concert. Both works were played with abundant refinement; the "Minuet" of the symphony, however (with the exception of the trio), was taken in a somewhat angular, stiff jointed manner, not at all as graceful and flexible as we have heard it time and again performed under Theodore Thomas.

The last movement of the Grieg suite, "In the Halls of the Mountain King," the mechanical effect of which is somewhat on the plan of that of the "Turkish Patrol," was enthusiastically redemanded, to which pleasing, if not over-musical, demonstration Mr. Nikisch graciously responded with a da capo performance.

Rafael Joseffy was the soloist of this concert and he played the Liszt A major, the less poor of his two piano concertos, in that finished style for which his performances in general and of this concerto in special are noted, and to which he added in this instance also a power and tonal sonority and brilliancy which he does not always display to like high degree. The orchestral accompaniment to this concerto was one of the master performances of the evening and showed Mr. Nikisch as an orchestral accompanist of most extraordinary merit, intelligence and sympathy.

Joseffy was, of course, most heartily applauded and after a fourfold recall gave as an encore Chopin's B major nocturne, which he played with somewhat less warmth and feeling than we had anticipated.

* * *

What a superb concert was that of Nikisch's last week in Steinway Hall! I will back his band against the world in certain things, chief of which is the perfectly wonderful way his accompaniments are played.

The boom for Tschaikowsky still continues, and we were treated to a most characteristic specimen of his work, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

Joseffy gave us one of his surprises of which he is so fond. When he emerges from his self imposed exile he generally sweeps the field clean, and the dead and dying are numerous. Pianists may come and go, but Joseffy remains as of yore the greatest of them all. The limitations of his art are sharply defined, but within them he is most supreme. He is not so eclectic in his performances as d'Albert, but infinitely the superior pianist.

The fire and finesse he displayed in the Liszt concerto were simply superb. I was quite amused in reading the infallible critic (?) of "Town Topics" to notice that he omitted all mention of the encore Joseffy played. This was wise, for he didn't know that it was a Chopin nocturne. Considering, however, his pungent animadversions on the music critics of the dailies it would have well behooved him to post himself up in the matter of "encores." The fact is that the mote in his neighbor's eye has blinded him to the beam in his own.

Worcester Daily Spy.

The Worcester Spy.
DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.
WORCESTER, FEB. 21, 1890.

A SPLENDID CONCERT.

NIKISCH AND JOSEFFY AROUSE MUCH ENTHUSIASM.

"PEER GYNT" TAKES THE HOUSE BY STORM—QUESTION OF A SYMPHONY COURSE.

The fine, large audience that greeted Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Joseffy and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final Criterion concert, at Mechanics Hall last night, must have reminded every observer of the festival season. It was a substantial encouragement for the establishment of a symphony course in Worcester, and it proves that a symphony concert, with a competent soloist and a program not over heavy, would draw a good house. The people were enthusiastic over Mr. Joseffy's piano playing, and they demanded a repetition of the final movement of the "Peer Gynt" suite. It was, in fact, a splendid concert.

It is not difficult now to observe that the orchestra has lost somewhat of its pristine finish, but it has acquired what is of very much more artistic importance, a facility and force for dramatic expression such as it never before possessed. That facility and that force were admirably demonstrated in all its work, last night. Mendelssohn's A major symphony (Italian) with which the concert was begun, is not only one of the composer's brightest works, but also one of his most perspicuous. Furthermore, it is one of Mr. Nikisch's most delightful readings, and in vivacity, delicacy, poetry and virility his is incomparable.

The Liszt A major concerto (No. 2), which followed, rather elevates the dramatic above the musical, but is nevertheless characterized by more of musical interest than much of the Abbe's music. From a technical point of view it hardly needs to be described. Rafael Joseffy has never played better in this city than he played last night, but even at that he did not reach the topmost heights of his accomplishments. Mr. Joseffy needs the spur of a metropoliton audience to bring out his best endeavors. He gave, nevertheless, an enthusiastic and effective reading of the piano score. Sometimes he played with more energy than discretion, but at other times he was quite electrifying, and he was recalled again and again.

Grieg's unique "Peer Gynt" suite proved no less attractive here than elsewhere. People who have been deterred from wholly admiring it by the somewhat disparaging notices of Boston critics, may be reassured by the success of the suite when played by Von Bulow's orchestra in Berlin, under the composer's direction, by Theodore Thomas' endorsement—and by hearing the music. A prime reason for its popularity is its Haydn-like clearness. The people are never at a loss to know what the much fiddling is all about. Themes are repeated in the various registers and sections of the orchestra, rather than "worked out" with complicated divisions, inversions and imitations. Its musical value and beauty are due chiefly to the ingenious orchestral contrasts, and in some degree to the original and striking (but never coarse) harmonies. It is eminently "modern" music.

The first movement, "Daybreak," is vividly descriptive, the soft coloring contrasts of the wood wind depicting the first blush of morn, while the advent of the strings, culminating in a highly characteristic modulation, denotes the sun bursting through the canopy of veiling morning mists as clearly as could a painting. By common consent no other band comprises so efficient a body of strings as the Boston orchestra. No other could duplicate its exquisite playing of the second movement, "The Death of Aase." The full body of strings, muted, executed with the precision, grace and flexibility of a quintet. "Anitra's Dance," the third movement, received the delicate treatment it deserved, and the final movement, describing the imps chasing and torturing Peer Gynt in the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains, was given with the fire and exaltation of spirit that its fantastic music demanded. The suite was brilliantly played, and anything less than the enthusiasm it evoked was not to be expected.

Mr. Joseffy commonly plays more important music than he offered for solos last night. He played the Gluck "Aria di Ballo" with much deftness and grace. His final number was Carl Tausig's arrangement of a well worn Schubert military march, in which the two hands are made to do the work of four, liberally padded (as usual) with large chunks of Tausig. It is an effective piano piece and Mr. Joseffy's occasionally inaccuracies were certainly born of enthusiasm rather than of listlessness. His second reception was quite as flattering as his first, but he declined to play again.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, with which the concert ended, was played in a manner that really brought out the great beauty of the music. That alone is more than can ordinarily be said of its performance by other bands, but Mr. Nikisch's reading deserves more praise than that. It was a masterfully clear and effective presentation of a misunderstood but beautiful work.

Mr. Loeffler was on the sick list, and Mr. Mullaly was also absent, but the strings seemed not to have been weakened. The listener sometimes yearned for the beautifully pure tone of Mr. Xaver Reiter's horn. Pending the pacification of his Boston wife, the picturesque Lombard is playing in his brother's place, under Seidl, at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, while the brother, who also plays a very good horn, is with Nikisch.

At the conclusion of this Criterion course, it may not be out of place to suggest that next year it may be as profitable, and it will generally be more satisfactory, to give more of the orchestra and less of other organizations. The project of a genuine symphony course is well worth serious and careful consideration.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 22, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Three numbers only make up the programme for this evening—the perennially beautiful "Oberon" overture of Weber, the second pianoforte concerto of Liszt, and the "Irish" symphony of the English composer, Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, which is new to Boston. Of the last of these our present notice, based as usual upon the Friday afternoon rehearsal, can say little more than that it was received well and with much critical approval, as being consistent and characteristic, when it was originally brought out in England. Our press-hour forbade our hearing more than the long first movement, which is able and individual, but needs more than a single hearing to take it in and digest it. The plan of the symphony is to suggest the general character of the Irish scales and the national temperament as indicated in melody, rather than to use special airs as themes for its movements, although two or three are so adopted. The harp is prominent in the orchestration, as might be expected, and a part of the third movement is based upon a prelude by it. The recognized Irish melodies enter chiefly into the last movement, and their use is said to be marked and effective.

There is scarcely need to say that the appearance of Mr. Joseffy—his first in several years—will bring out tonight, as it did yesterday afternoon—an enormous audience and that every admission ticket will be taken up early in the day. Probably no pianist has had and maintained a greater general popularity than he, nor does there appear any sign of its diminution. Not averse in his earlier years to adopt all the devices which might favorably increase the effect of his playing, and not yet entirely without the disposition to sacrifice sense to sensuousness and exposition to sentiment, by no means beyond criticism in the views he takes of his music and the presentments of it which he deliberately makes, there still is so much which is fascinating, beautiful, and astonishing in his technique and so much good art in his reading, that he must be considered to be by merit fixed in that peculiar eminence which he occupies. The work he plays tonight is perhaps as good—certainly it is as striking—an illustration of its author's independence of style as could be found, and it has passages which compel admiration; but, being cast more into the shape of a rhapsody or a fantasia, the impression it leaves is necessarily uneven and fitful. Mr. Joseffy played it yesterday with vigorous assertion, so much so indeed that he forced many hard and harsh tones from the piano in the opening movements. He showed in the comparatively few light and airy passages less fancy and daintiness than would be expected of him, and seemed to depend more upon force of emphasis and sonority for his results. The overture was delightfully played, and the horn tone of the other Reiter, who has replaced his brother, was especially beautiful and smooth. Next week Mr. Arthur Weld's "Italia" suite will have its first Boston hearing, Mozart's E-flat symphony and Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture will be played, and Miss Franklin will sing large, orchestrally accompanied airs from Bize tand Rubinstein.

The fourth concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette will be given in Union Hall on Monday evening next, at eight o'clock. The quartette will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schulz. Tickets are now on sale at Music Hall.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1890.

SEVENTEENTH CONCERT.

At the symphony concert last evening there were three selections, performed as follows:

Weber.....Overture "Oberon"
Liszt, Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2
C. Villiers Stanford.....
Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," Op. 28
1. Allegro moderato,
2. Allegro molto vivace
3. Andante con molto
4. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

Mr. Joseffy played the Liszt concerto with all his wonted mastery and charm. It was not, however a broad and scholarly interpretation of the work, there being but a very meagre acquaintance afforded of all the poetry (?) and charm (?) with which the concerto abounds. Mr. Joseffy however is only a great artist to the extent that his pianissimo technique is as unrivalled as it is thoroughly charming, and his phrasing is seldom at fault, but otherwise his manner of conceiving the composer's meaning is often of the shallowest description, and he is also quite incapable of the full, broad tone which the great masterworks of the present day exactingly demand. The novelty in the concert was the new symphony by Stanford. The work, while by no means impressive of its being the creation of a master spirit, is nevertheless ably scored, and there is a continuity of idea shown in the development of various movements which affords one of the surest signs that its composer, if not a genius, has certainly made the most of the admirable schooling he has received. There is no lack, in the work, of fresh and graceful melody, but most of the composer's writing is simply fine and nothing more.

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was at all points characteristically well balanced, excellent and effective. The recognition is notably due, the performance of the overture, where the artistic sympathy between the performing musicians and the superb interpretation of the conductor was very noticeable.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 22, 1890.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

"The director's life is not a happy one," you are inclined to say plagiaristically, when listening to the fault-finding. They say Mr. Nikisch is homesick. Certainly there are some things to make him so; but then—and then—and then! Why these reflections? Well, in the homeward electric (hang these sardine-box electrics! say I), a man and woman were talking it over—that is, the concert. "All alike! All strings! Nothing interesting, nothing worthy, no Beethoven." This was the burden of their plaint. Well, the next person you meet will say: "No novelties, all ancient music. Give us something French or modern!"

Now what did Nikisch give us that night?

1. Tschaikowsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture, for the first time in Boston,—introducing the feuds of the rival houses, and the Capulet masquerade, with perhaps a touch of the heroine's sentimentality and death.

2. Lalo's Spanish Concerto Symphony for violin and orchestra, written for Sarasate, and played, as in 1887, by C. M. Loeffler; and full of nationality, expressed in diverse orchestral ways. When I thanked a pianist for a short program the other night, Mr. Loeffler (who was present) suggested his greater claim to gratitude, because he has never given a concert here on his own account. Perhaps he is right. It is glory enough to play Lalo's music as he played it, and get four recalls,—though no repeat, thank the stars!

3. Nicodé's Symphonic Variations, op. 27, for the first time by this orchestra,—its introduction, dozen variations, and finale bringing out a million sparkles of music, like some piece of pyrotechnics.

4. Massenet's Phedre Overture, replete with stately gloom.

All the evening I felt, for one, the predominance of horns and flutes, and wind generally, not to mention harp, and muted violin passages; yet people go away saying All strings!

It is noticeable that the director is using the score regularly just now. Is this a convenient yielding to criticism? He seems not to need or look at it much. J. H. W.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 23.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall brought out an immense audience, Mr. Joseffy being the attraction. Of his popularity here the vast attendance and the reception accorded him afforded ample evidence. He played the Liszt concerto in A-major, No. 2, a work which unquestionably has many enthusiastic admirers, but it is a rambling, disjointed, and sensational one at best, and would leave no important gap in piano music if it were to disappear forever. Musically it is of no marked value, is blatant, assertive, garrulous about nothing in particular, and even when read and played to perfection is only interesting as an exhibition of the performer's technique. To Mr. Joseffy it presented no difficulties which he did not overcome with ease and fluency. The artist's style has changed greatly since he was first heard here. It has become more fiery and virile, and these qualities were manifested last night with a spirit almost approaching fury in the more stormy moments of the work. It was a masterly display of technique, and the concerto presents but little opportunity to the artist to display anything else. The orchestral accompaniment was over-noisy, and for the most part rendered the piano playing almost inaudible, causing the listener to hear with his eyes rather than with his ears. In the lighter solo passages, however, the exquisite delicacy and dainty grace that have always been such charming features of Mr. Joseffy's playing, were manifested with all of their familiar fascinating effect. But the artist at other times struck the piano with such aggressive force that he produced anything but an agreeable musical effect. Of his mastery over all the technical resources of his art he gave every evidence, but we wish that he had played a work that was not a mere show-piece and in which the intellectual artist could have come as prominently into the foreground as the master of finger fireworks. The performance excited the audience to great enthusiasm, and Mr. Joseffy was recalled three times amid a storm of plaudits. The other feature of the concert was the "Irish" Symphony, by Stanford C. Villiers, the English composer, which was heard here for the first time. It is a strong and serious work, showing fine and skilful musicianship; but, as a whole, it is very labored, often dry in effect, and the scoring is, as a rule, so full and heavy as to make the work monotonous through lack of contrast in tone color. The first allegro is very long, and not over interesting, and the thematic treatment is carried to a tiresome excess in it. The second movements or scherzo, founded on a jig rhythm is full of sprightliness, and is the first moment in the work when the Irish spirit makes its appearance, the scale, or mode that prevails in the first movement, though that upon which Irish melodies are founded not illustrating the character of Irish music. The andante has some beautiful moments but is, on the whole dull and pedantic. The crowning success of the symphony is the finale which is full of fire, dignity and impressiveness. The melodies "Remember the Glories of Brian the Brave" and "Let Erin remember the days of old," are treated with great skill and stirring effect, and the movement throughout is marked by a flow, a freedom and a freshness that are not to be found elsewhere in the work. A second hearing may possibly modify the force of some of the criticism we have made on the symphony, but we doubt if it will greatly change the general result. The effect upon the audience was not very profound. The other piece on the programme was the "Oberon" overture, which was beautifully read and played. In fact, the orchestra was at its best in the symphony and in this selection. The programme for the next concert is Mozart's symphony in E flat; an aria from Rubinstein's "The Demon"; "Italia" dramatic suite, by Arthur Weld, first time; an aria from Bizet's "Carmen," and Meyerbeer's overture to "Struensee." The soloist will be Miss Gertrude Franklin.

[80]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third subscription concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Steinway Hall on Tuesday night of last week, was as well attended as its predecessors, and the excellent performances of this model band under its model conductor were received with no lack of applause and enthusiasm.

The arrangement of the program was not particularly a felicitous one, the placing of the Tschaikowsy "Romeo and Juliet" at the end being of rather questionable effectiveness, as this difficult and ultra-romantic work needs freshness and closest attention on the part of the listener to insure a sympathetic and appreciative hearing. The composition is rather vague in form, which the composer designates as "Ouverture Fantaisie," and still more so in design; and as for characteristic, it might just as well have been named "Antony and Cleopatra" as "Romeo and Juliet" for all the program meaning it conveys. As absolute music, however, it is quite interesting, especially from a technical point of view, the thematic treatment and orchestral coloring being quite masterly and at times of surprising effectiveness. The work contains, however, but one big and noble theme, and that one, quite suggestive of Gounod, lacks the originality which one is wont to look for and so often to find in Tschaikowsky.

The difficult composition was played with magnificent energy and telling precision under Mr. Nikisch's directions, the only flaw being the fact that the bass tuba was nearly an eighth of a tone higher in pitch than the rest of the orchestra, a fact which became painfully patent to refined musical ears in the low B natural, which that instrument repeatedly gives forth, solo and forte, in the closing episode of "Romeo and Juliet."

The other orchestral numbers were the four now well-known movements, strung together somewhat incoherently as a suite, from Grieg's light waisted but prettily colored and cleverly harmonized "Peer Gynt" music, and Haydn's exquisite little G major symphony (No. 13 in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition), which opened the concert. Both works were played with abundant refinement; the "Minuet" of the symphony, however (with the exception of the trio), was taken in a somewhat angular, stiff jointed manner, not at all as graceful and flexible as we have heard it time and again performed under Theodore Thomas.

The last movement of the Grieg suite, "In the Halls of the Mountain King," the mechanical effect of which is somewhat on the plan of that of the "Turkish Patrol," was enthusiastically redemanded, to which pleasing, if not over-musical, demonstration Mr. Nikisch graciously responded with a da capo performance.

Rafael Joseffy was the soloist of this concert and he played the Liszt A major, the less poor of his two piano concertos, in that finished style for which his performances in general and of this concerto in special are noted, and to which he added in this instance also a power and tonal sonority and brilliancy which he does not always display to like high degree. The orchestral accompaniment to this concerto was one of the master performances of the evening and showed Mr. Nikisch as an orchestral accompanist of most extraordinary merit, intelligence and sympathy.

Joseffy was, of course, most heartily applauded and after a fourfold recall gave as an encore Chopin's B major nocturne, which he played with somewhat less warmth and feeling than we had anticipated.

* * *

What a superb concert was that of Nikisch's last week in Steinway Hall! I will back his band against the world in certain things, chief of which is the perfectly wonderful way his accompaniments are played.

The boom for Tschaikowsky still continues, and we were treated to a most characteristic specimen of his work, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

Joseffy gave us one of his surprises of which he is so fond. When he emerges from his self imposed exile he generally sweeps the field clean, and the dead and dying are numerous. Pianists may come and go, but Joseffy remains as of yore the greatest of them all. The limitations of his art are sharply defined, but within them he is most supreme. He is not so eclectic in his performances as d'Albert, but infinitely the superior pianist.

The fire and finesse he displayed in the Liszt concerto were simply superb. I was quite amused in reading the infallible critic (?) of "Town Topics" to notice that he omitted all mention of the encore Joseffy played. This was wise, for he didn't know that it was a Chopin nocturne. Considering, however, his pungent animadversions on the music critics of the dailies it would have well behooved him to post himself up in the matter of "encores." The fact is that the mote in his neighbor's eye has blinded him to the beam in his own.

Worcester Daily Spy.

The Worcester Spy.

DAILY—SUNDAY—WEEKLY.

WORCESTER, FEB. 21, 1890.

A SPLENDID CONCERT.

NIKISCH AND JOSEFFY AROUSE MUCH ENTHUSIASM.

"PEER GYNT" TAKES THE HOUSE BY STORM—QUESTION OF A SYMPHONY COURSE.

The fine, large audience that greeted Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Joseffy and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final Criterion concert, at Mechanics Hall last night, must have reminded every observer of the festival season. It was a substantial encouragement for the establishment of a symphony course in Worcester, and it proves that a symphony concert, with a competent soloist and a program not over heavy, would draw a good house. The people were enthusiastic over Mr. Joseffy's piano playing, and they demanded a repetition of the final movement of the "Peer Gynt" suite. It was, in fact, a splendid concert.

It is not difficult now to observe that the orchestra has lost somewhat of its pristine finish, but it has acquired what is of very much more artistic importance, a facility and force for dramatic expression such as it never before possessed. That facility and that force were admirably demonstrated in all its work, last night. Mendelssohn's A major symphony (Italian) with which the concert was begun, is not only one of the composer's brightest works, but also one of his most perspicuous. Furthermore, it is one of Mr. Nikisch's most delightful readings, and in vivacity, delicacy, poetry and virility his is incomparable.

The Liszt A major concerto (No. 2), which followed, rather elevates the dramatic above the musical, but is nevertheless characterized by more of musical interest than much of the Abbe's music. From a technical point of view it hardly needs to be described. Rafael Joseffy has never played better in this city than he played last night, but even at that he did not reach the topmost heights of his accomplishments. Mr. Joseffy needs the spur of a metropoliton audience to bring out his best endeavors. He gave, nevertheless, an enthusiastic and effective reading of the piano score. Sometimes he played with more energy than discretion, but at other times he was quite electrifying, and he was recalled again and again.

Grieg's unique "Peer Gynt" suite proved no less attractive here than elsewhere. People who have been deterred from wholly admiring it by the somewhat disparaging notices of Boston critics, may be reassured by the success of the suite when played by Von Bulow's orchestra in Berlin, under the composer's direction, by Theodore Thomas' endorsement—and by hearing the music. A prime reason for its popularity is its Haydn-like clearness. The people are never at a loss to know what the much fiddling is all about. Themes are repeated in the various registers and sections of the orchestra rather than "worked out" with complicated divisions, inversions and imitations. Its musical value and beauty are due chiefly to the ingenious orchestral contrasts, and in some degree to the original and striking (but never coarse) harmonies. It is eminently "modern" music.

The first movement, "Daybreak," is vividly descriptive, the soft coloring contrasts of the wood wind depicting the first blush of morn, while the advent of the strings, culminating in a highly characteristic modulation, denotes the sun bursting through the canopy of veiling morning mists as clearly as could a painting. By common consent no other band comprises so efficient a body of strings as the Boston orchestra. No other could duplicate its exquisite playing of the second movement, "The Death of Aase." The full body of strings, muted, executed with the precision, grace and flexibility of a quintet. "Anitra's Dance," the third movement, received the delicate treatment it deserved, and the final movement, describing the imps chasing and torturing Peer Gynt in the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains, was given with the fire and exaltation of spirit that its fantastic music demanded. The suite was brilliantly played, and anything less than the enthusiasm it evoked was not to be expected.

Mr. Joseffy commonly plays more important music than he offered for solos last night. He played the Gluck "Aria di Ballo" with much deftness and grace. His final number was Carl Tausig's arrangement of a well worn Schubert military march, in which the two hands are made to do the work of four, liberally padded (as usual) with large chunks of Tausig. It is an effective piano piece and Mr. Joseffy's occasionally inaccuracies were certainly born of enthusiasm rather than of listlessness. His second reception was quite as flattering as his first, but he declined to play again.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, with which the concert ended, was played in a manner that really brought out the great beauty of the music. That alone is more than can ordinarily be said of its performance by other bands, but Mr. Nikisch's reading deserves more praise than that. It was a masterfully clear and effective presentation of a misunderstood but beautiful work.

Mr. Loeffler was on the sick list, and Mr. Mullaly was also absent, but the strings seemed not to have been weakened. The listener sometimes yearned for the beautifully pure tone of Mr. Xaver Reiter's horn. Pending the pacification of his Boston wife, the picturesque Lombard is playing in his brother's place, under Seidl, at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, while the brother, who also plays a very good horn, is with Nikisch.

At the conclusion of this Criterion course, it may not be out of place to suggest that next year it may be as profitable, and it will generally be more satisfactory, to give more of the orchestra and less of other organizations. The project of a genuine symphony course is well worth serious and careful consideration.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 22, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Three numbers only make up the programme for this evening—the perennially beautiful "Oberon" overture of Weber, the second pianoforte concerto of Liszt, and the "Irish" symphony of the English composer, Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, which is new to Boston. Of the last of these our present notice, based as usual upon the Friday afternoon rehearsal, can say little more than that it was received well and with much critical approval, as being consistent and characteristic, when it was originally brought out in England. Our press-hour forbade our hearing more than the long first movement, which is able and individual, but needs more than a single hearing to take it in and digest it. The plan of the symphony is to suggest the general character of the Irish scales and the national temperament as indicated in melody, rather than to use special airs as themes for its movements, although two or three are so adopted. The harp is prominent in the orchestration, as might be expected, and a part of the third movement is based upon a prelude by it. The recognized Irish melodies enter chiefly into the last movement, and their use is said to be marked and effective.

There is scarcely need to say that the appearance of Mr. Joseffy—his first in several years—will bring out tonight, as it did yesterday afternoon—an enormous audience and that every admission ticket will be taken up early in the day. Probably no pianist has had and maintained a greater general popularity than he, nor does there appear any sign of its diminution. Not averse in his earlier years to adopt all the devices which might favorably increase the effect of his playing, and not yet entirely without the disposition to sacrifice sense to sensuousness and exposition to sentiment, by no means beyond criticism in the views he takes of his music and the presentments of it which he deliberately makes, there still is so much which is fascinating, beautiful, and astonishing in his technique and so much good art in his reading, that he must be considered to be by merit fixed in that peculiar eminence which he occupies. The work he plays tonight is perhaps as good—certainly it is as striking—an illustration of its author's independence of style as could be found, and it has passages which compel admiration; but, being cast more into the shape of a rhapsody or a fantasia, the impression it leaves is necessarily uneven and fitful. Mr. Joseffy played it yesterday with vigorous assertion, so much so indeed that he forced many hard and harsh tones from the piano in the opening movements. He showed in the comparatively few light and airy passages less fancy and daintiness than would be expected of him, and seemed to depend more upon force of emphasis and sonority for his results. The overture was delightfully played, and the horn tone of the other Reiter, who has replaced his brother, was especially beautiful and smooth. Next week Mr. Arthur Weld's "Italia" suite will have its first Boston hearing, Mozart's E-flat symphony and Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture will be played, and Miss Franklin will sing large, orchestrally accompanied airs from Bize tand Rubinstein.

The fourth concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette will be given in Union Hall on Monday evening next, at eight o'clock. The quartette will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schulz. Tickets are now on sale at Music Hall.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1890.

SEVENTEENTH CONCERT.

At the symphony concert last evening there were three selections, performed as follows;

Weber.....Overture "Oberon"
Liszt, Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2
C. Villiers Stanford.....
Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," Op. 28
1. Allegro moderato,
2. Allegro molto vivace
3. Andante con molto
4. Finale; Allegro vivace.

(First time in Boston.)

Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

Mr. Joseffy played the Liszt concerto with all his wonted mastery and charm. It was not, however a broad and scholarly interpretation of the work, there being but a very meagre acquaintance afforded of all the poetry (?) and charm (?) with which the concerto abounds. Mr. Joseffy however is only a great artist to the extent that his pianissimo technique is as unrivalled as it is thoroughly charming, and his phrasing is seldom at fault, but otherwise his manner of conceiving the composer's meaning is often of the shallowest description, and he is also quite incapable of the full, broad tone which the great masterworks of the present day exactingly demand. The novelty in the concert was the new symphony by Stanford. The work, while by no means impressive of its being the creation of a master spirit, is nevertheless ably scored, and there is a continuity of idea shown in the development of various movements which affords one of the surest signs that its composer, if not a genius, has certainly made the most of the admirable schooling he has received. There is no lack, in the work, of fresh and graceful melody, but most of the composer's writing is simply fine and nothing more.

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was at all points characteristically well balanced, excellent and effective. The recognition is notably due, the performance of the overture, where the artistic sympathy between the performing musicians and the superb interpretation of the conductor was very noticeable.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 22, 1890.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

"The director's life is not a happy one," you are inclined to say plagiaristically, when listening to the fault-finding. They say Mr. Nikisch is homesick. Certainly there are some things to make him so; but then—and then—and then! Why these reflections? Well, in the homeward electric (hang these sardine-box electrics! say I), a man and woman were talking it over—that is, the concert. "All alike! All strings! Nothing interesting, nothing worthy, no Beethoven." This was the burden of their plaint. Well, the next person you meet will say: "No novelties, all ancient music. Give us something French or modern!"

Now what did Nikisch give us that night?

1. Tschaikowsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture, for the first time in Boston,—introducing the feuds of the rival houses, and the Capulet masquerade, with perhaps a touch of the heroine's sentimentality and death.

2. Lalo's Spanish Concerto Symphony for violin and orchestra, written for Sarasate, and played, as in 1887, by C. M. Loeffler; and full of nationality, expressed in diverse orchestral ways. When I thanked a pianist for a short program the other night, Mr. Loeffler (who was present) suggested his greater claim to gratitude, because he has never given a concert here on his own account. Perhaps he is right. It is glory enough to play Lalo's music as he played it, and get four recalls,—though no repeat, thank the stars!

3. Nicodé's Symphonic Variations, op. 27, for the first time by this orchestra,—its introduction, dozen variations, and finale bringing out a million sparkles of music, like some piece of pyrotechnics.

4. Massenet's Phedre Overture, replete with stately gloom.

All the evening I felt, for one, the predominance of horns and flutes, and wind generally, not to mention harp, and muted violin passages; yet people go away saying All strings!

It is noticeable that the director is using the score regularly just now. Is this a convenient yielding to criticism? He seems not to need or look at it much. J. H. W.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 23.

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall brought out an immense audience, Mr. Joseffy being the attraction. Of his popularity here the vast attendance and the reception accorded him afforded ample evidence. He played the Liszt concerto in A major, No. 2, a work which unquestionably has many enthusiastic admirers, but it is a rambling, disjointed, and sensational one at best, and would leave no important gap in piano music if it were to disappear forever. Musically it is of no marked value, is blatant, assertive, garrulous about nothing in particular, and even when read and played to perfection is only interesting as an exhibition of the performer's technique. To Mr. Joseffy it presented no difficulties which he did not overcome with ease and fluency. The artist's style has changed greatly since he was first heard here. It has become more fiery and virile, and these qualities were manifested last night with a spirit almost approaching fury in the more stormy moments of the work. It was a masterly display of technique, and the concerto presents but little opportunity to the artist to display anything else. The orchestral accompaniment was over-noisy, and for the most part rendered the piano playing almost inaudible, causing the listener to hear with his eyes rather than with his ears. In the lighter solo passages, however, the exquisite delicacy and dainty grace that have always been such charming features of Mr. Joseffy's playing, were manifested with all of their familiar fascinating effect. But the artist at other times struck the piano with such aggressive force that he produced anything but an agreeable musical effect. Of his mastery over all the technical resources of his art he gave every evidence, but we wish that he had played a work that was not a mere show-piece and in which the intellectual artist could have come as prominently into the foreground as the master of finger fireworks. The performance excited the audience to great enthusiasm, and Mr. Joseffy was recalled three times amid a storm of plaudits. The other feature of the concert was the "Irish" Symphony, by Stanford C. Villiers, the English composer, which was heard here for the first time. It is a strong and serious work, showing fine and skilful musicianship; but, as a whole, it is very labored, often dry in effect, and the scoring is, as a rule, so full and heavy as to make the work monotonous through lack of contrast in tone color. The first allegro is very long, and not over interesting, and the thematic treatment is carried to a tiresome excess in it. The second movements or scherzo, founded on a jig rhythm is full of sprightliness, and is the first moment in the work when the Irish spirit makes its appearance, the scale, or mode that prevails in the first movement, though that upon which Irish melodies are founded not illustrating the character of Irish music. The andante has some beautiful moments but is, on the whole dull and pedantic. The crowning success of the symphony is the finale which is full of fire, dignity and impressiveness. The melodies "Remember the Glories of Brian the Brave" and "Let Erin remember the days of old," are treated with great skill and stirring effect, and the movement throughout is marked by a flow, a freedom and a freshness that are not to be found elsewhere in the work. A second hearing may possibly modify the force of some of the criticism we have made on the symphony, but we doubt if it will greatly change the general result. The effect upon the audience was not very profound. The other piece on the programme was the "Oberon" overture, which was beautifully read and played. In fact, the orchestra was at its best in the symphony and in this selection. The programme for the next concert is Mozart's symphony in E flat; an aria from Rubinstein's "The Demon"; "Italia" dramatic suite, by Arthur Weld, first time; an aria from Bizet's "Carmen," and Meyerbeer's overture to "Struensee." The soloist will be Miss Gertrude Franklin.

[80]

[illegible] Standard Cross.

[illegible] TY-FOUR PAGES.

[illegible] Y, FEB. 23, 1890.

[illegible] he Soloist at the [illegible] hony Offering.

[illegible] th concert of the Symphony course [illegible] ed, as soloist, an artist who has long been absent from the concert stage of Boston—Rafael Joseffy. A good many people will recall how often this distinguished pianist was announced to appear, and how often the expectation of hearing him was disappointed, seasons ago. That Joseffy had by no means been forgotten in Boston, however, the unusually large demand of tickets for yesterday's concert gave abundant evidence.

Delicacy of touch and great power are equally at Joseffy's command. Yet it is now, as before, the peculiar "singing quality" of his tone that commands especial admiration. The Liszt concerto in A major does not give great opportunities for this characteristic of the artist's playing, but the opportunities were never neglected. Liszt's brilliant work was throughout interpreted with a great deal of power and effect. In the closing passages of the exacting concerto the audience was roused to unwonted enthusiasm by the dash and spirit of Joseffy's performance. At the close, he was much applauded and recalled.

The orchestral part of the concerto was given almost faultlessly: for the most part the accompaniment was exactly what it should have been—a support, not a dominating volume of sound. Altogether, the Liszt concerto was quite a triumph for orchestra not less than soloist.

It was an Irish composer—Villiers Stanford, who has done such valued work in the cause of music at Cambridge University, England—who furnished the symphony. Naturally, no little interest marked the first presentation in Boston of his "Irish" symphony; and, if there was felt a certain disappointment in the work, the musicianly skill which the symphony shows on almost every page of the long score was by no means unrecognized.

But to attempt to put the wild, free, characteristic Irish music into the conventional bounds of a symphony is to sacrifice much of its spirit, no matter how skilfully the task of arrangement is carried out. It is like taking one of the characteristic Hungarian dances and trying to set forth its theme in the slow measures of an old-fashioned minuet. Had Stanford composed a suite or a "symphonic poem"—to use a convenient term—his purpose would assuredly have found much more effective illustration in the greater freedom offered, both as regards method and manner.

Of the four movements that make up the "Irish" symphony, the first produces the least favorable impression. After a few measures have sounded interest lapses; the movement is as a whole distinctly uninteresting. The second, a curious allegro movement, which takes the form of a "hop-jig," comes as a most agreeable relief; and it is not prolonged beyond the point of interest. While the student of theme-development may admire the skill with which Stanford utilizes the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" in the third movement, to the average auditor the effect is scarcely inspiring. But the final movement, the allegro vivace, is at times certainly vivid and expressive. Two ancient Irish airs form the subjects—"Remember the Glories of Brian the Brave," and "Let Erin Remember the Days of Old." Now and again the harp and trumpets are used with unique and striking effect, and the climax, with its strongly emphasized theme of glory and exultation, is something to be remembered indeed. Mr. Nikisch directed the performance with his usual care and the orchestra fulfilled its task with characteristic fidelity.

Weber's "Oberon" overture, gloriously performed, opened the programme. It would be difficult to excel the dainty and perfectly appreciative interpretation given to this familiar overture. Often as it has been heard, Nikisch's magic baton evoked new beauties yesterday.

A Boston musician, who is a Boston musical critic as well—Arthur Weld—holds a place of honor upon the list of selections for the concert next Saturday. Mr. Weld's "Italia," described as a dramatic suite for orchestra, has not been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch's appointments for the orchestra include the Mozart symphony in E flat and Meyerbeer's overture, "Struensee." Miss Gertrude Franklin is to be the soloist, and her selections comprise Tamara's air from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," and Micaela's song from Bizet's "Carmen." An interesting offering, truly, for Mr Nikisch's 18th concert here.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The patrons of the series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet enjoyed another excellent programme of chamber music at Union Hall last evening, the quartet being assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, and Mr. Leo Schulz, violinist. The programme consisted of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's piano quintet in E flat, Haydn's quartet in G major, No. 41, and Schubert's quintet in C major. The quintet by Mr. Chadwick had its first hearing in these concerts on this occasion, and the composer and the performers are alike to be complimented upon the results attending its performance. Happy the composer whose works find a place upon these programmes, for he is thus assured that they will be heard in public only after the most intelligent and conscientious preparation. The performers are also to be congratulated in having so worthy a work to present as a tribute to the American composer, as Mr. Chadwick's quintet represents him at his best, the impression gained of its merits at its performance two years ago being fully confirmed in last evening's performance. Mr. Whiting proved an excellent assisting artist in the quintet, and fully sustained his share of the admirable work done in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's composition. The Haydn quartet and the Schubert quintet filled out the evening's programme most happily, and these enjoyable chamber music numbers had a most attentive hearing.

[illegible] STON [illegible]

[illegible] TON, FRIDAY, FEB. 28, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Rafael Joseffy Soloist.

Stanford's Irish Symphony—The Handel and Haydn Festival—The Society's First Concert—The Boston Singers' and Orchestral Club's Programmes—Patti and German Opera.

The programme played at the 17th of the season's Symphony concerts, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at Music Hall, last evening, consisted of Weber's overture "Oberon," Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2, and C. Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony. The selection of Dr. Stanford's symphony as one of the season's novelties gives evidence of the willingness of Mr. Nikisch to allow the patrons of these concerts an opportunity to hear from a class of composers that have had scant recognition in Boston's high class programme of late years. The symphony is the third of the four works of this class made public by Dr. Stanford, and may be taken as a recognition, upon the composer's part, of the beauty of the melodies dear to the hearts of his countrymen. Its leading themes have been taken from the folk songs of the "Emerald Isle," and the simple melodies have been treated in a way to enhance their enjoyment. A genuine Irish hop jig makes the groundwork of the second movement, the andante gives snatches of the harp prelude, "Try if It's in Tune," and the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" and in the finale the leading subjects are borrowed from "Let Erin Remember" and "Brian the Brave." The plaintive introductory measures of the opening movement give the key to the character of the work, but this portion of the symphony soon becomes wearisome by reason of the repeated use of the leading theme in part, or in phrases to illustrate the composer's ability in reproducing the characteristics of the music of his native land. The movement is interesting enough as an orchestral study, but it is hardly calculated to inspire the average listener with an admiration of the composer's music. The introduction of the jig, which takes the place of the scherzo, may be justified by the use of the national dance tunes of France, Spain and the north of Europe countries by other composers, but it is unfortunate that the natives of the Green Isle have to dance to such ungraceful measures. If such a tune can be accepted as a proper subject for symphonic treatment by Mr. Nickisch, it seems a little illogical to draw the line so sharply as to exclude the spirited marches and graceful waltzes that were once used in orchestral programmes as a relief to the more serious music. The andante is an interesting and pleasing portion of the symphony, the beautiful, flowing melody which makes its leading theme being instrumented, so as to give full scope to the wood, wind and harp, the flute passages being especially fascinating. The best work of the composer, both in the choice of his themes and in their treatment, has, however, been done in the finale, the dignity of the ideas and the noble manner in which they are treated alike giving a grand ending to the symphony. It has been very aptly said that the symphony answers most strikingly to the characterization of Irish music to be found in "Dr. Norman Macleod's Notebook": "My father once saw some emigrants from Lochaber dancing on the deck of an emigrant ship, and weeping their eyes out! This feeling is the mother of Irish music. It expresses the struggle of a buoyant, merry heart to get quit of thoughts that often lie too deep for tears." It is the music of an oppressed, conquered but deeply feeling, impressible, fanciful and generous people. It is for the harp in Tara's Halls." Mr. Nikisch entered into the spirit of the symphony most heartily, and the work could hardly have had a better performance, the merits of the work done by the trumpets, the first flute and the harp being especially prominent. Mr. Joseffy has not been heard here for so long a time that his appearance made quite an event, and he gave an admirable exhibition of his capabilities in the Liszt concerto. His playing has lost nothing in the way of delicacy and refinement, and it has gained a breadth and strength which place him in the advance guard of the players of the day. The excessive technical difficulties of the concerto were mastered with great apparent ease, and the soloist was most ably supported by the orchestra throughout the composition. The "Oberon" overture was given with a theatrical effect, which quite captivated the audience.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1890.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience on Saturday evening. Great interest was felt in hearing Joseffy again, and he was very warmly received. The programme was of very agreeable length, in fact, the concert occupied less than an hour and a half.

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte. A major, No. 2..Liszt
Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," op. 28.....C. Villiers Stanford

The ever fresh and beautiful "Oberon" overture received a most interesting and sympathetic reading, and the admirable manner in which the new horn player performed the solo passages again proved that there is no very great difference between the two Reiter brothers. "A fair exchange is no robbery," and, in any case, either of them is very far above the other first horn players in this country certainly. Joseffy's playing was glorious. He has gained in power and virility of expression and interpretation, without losing any of the delicacy and grace so peculiarly his own. His technique is so prodigous that it is unnecessary to speak of it in detail, but mention should be made of the faultlessly artistic manner in which he used the pedal, an accomplishment which many otherwise fine pianists have decidedly neglected. The concerto itself is by no means as interesting as its predecessor in E flat major, but it was indeed so superbly played that one was only too glad to overlook the shallowness of the work itself. At the close there was a tremendous burst of applause which was kept up until Mr. Joseffy had three times reappeared to bow his acknowledgments.

Dr. Charles Villiers Stanford is very little known in this country as a composer. Of late years a group of young composers have become celebrated in England, and whose efforts have considerably increased the national interest felt in music in that country. The most prominent of these men are Mackenzie, Stanford, Cowen, Parry, Hamish, McCurm, and most especially the young genius Frederic Cliffe, whose first symphony, which has won him such fame, is soon to be heard in Boston. Of this group of composers, Dr. Stanford is one of the most active and productive, but by no means the most interesting. All his music has a tendency towards unnecessary pedantry, and his themes are apt to be cold, and lacking in plasticity. The work in question, which was performed Saturday night for the first time in this city, makes a decidedly mixed impression. The first movement is long, and, if the truth must be told, deadly stupid; all manner of elaborate devices are used to give a local coloring to the music, but without success, and the instrumentation is hard and coarse. The second movement, on the other hand, is quite delightful. It is in the form of a true Irish hop-jig, and both the themes themselves and the clever manner in which they are used, as well as the brilliant instrumentation, at once catch the attention of the audience, and this interest is maintained without flagging throughout the whole movement.

The third movement, andante con moto, is again dull and uninteresting. It begins with an imitation of a well-known Irish harp prelude, "Try if it's in tune," which is anything but a diverting musical passage. Later on we are struck by a passage which is note for note the same as the theme of the slow movement of Brahms's fourth symphony. Dr. Stanford's friends probably called his attention to this parallelism, as he elaborately explains on the title page of his score that the motive in question is an old Irish tune called "The Lament of the Sons of Usnach." This he regards as a sufficient explanation; but it does not alter the fact that this similarity produces an unfortunate effect on the listener. The fourth and last movement, on the contrary, is a splendid piece of bold and stirring orchestral writing. It is built upon the themes of two fine old Irish folk-songs, "Remember the glories of Brian the brave" and "Let Erin remember the days of old." Both of these tunes are excellently adapted for use as themes, and Dr. Stanford has indeed made the best of his opportunities. The orchestration is always brilliant, and in places very broad and grand, and the closing passages, where the second of the tunes is scored fortissimo for the whole orchestra, produce a really magnificent effect. Mr. Nikisch deserves the thanks of the public for giving them opportunities to become familiar with compositions from so many different schools and countries, and we ought all to be glad that we have so good a programme maker in charge of our orchestra.

ARTHUR WELD.

Clipping from Standard
New Bedford Mass
Date 2/2

BIG SALE.—The sale of reserved seats for the Boston Symphony concert began promptly at 9 o'clock in the Y. M. C. A. rooms this forenoon, at which time the rooms were well filled by subscribers anxious to secure the best seats. From 9 o'clock to 12 o'clock the crowd continued pouring in, keeping Messrs. W. E. Lougee, W. H. Wood, Charles S. Kelley and Lieut. Simms of the committee busy waiting upon them in an improvised office in the boys' room. The sale was very large, about $900 having been received up to 2 o'clock this afternoon. The sale will continue through to-day up to 10 p. m. By 7 30 this morning the subscribers began to gather in force, though we hear of instances of some presenting themselves as early as 8 this morning. There are some good seats yet unsold, and we would advise subscribers to hasten if they would secure them, as enough have been subscribed for to insure the occupancy of about all the desirable seats in the house. It is calculated the entire sale of tickets will aggregate $1250. The estimate is made from the subscriptions already handed in.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB, 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Joseffy as Soloist.

The concert of Saturday was of especial interest in two of its numbers, and the fact that Joseffy appeared as the soloist was sufficient to fill the hall to overflowing. The programme began with the overture to "Oberon," which was given with excellent effect, the shading and unity of attack being all that could be desired, and if the contrasts were a little sharply drawn, such dramatic effects are quite legitimate in a Weber work, which scarcely admits of the calm balance of a Brahms' composition.

Mr. Joseffy made a grand success in the A major concerto by Liszt. It is not as popular a work as the one in E flat, but its themes are more refined, and the whole work is more poetic and inspired. Mr. Joseffy is evidently broadening in his style, and his massive playing in the first part was as successful as his delicacy in the later portions. The passages between oboe and piano were especially dainty, and the celestial effects with the violins in the highest positions and afterwards pizzicato, were splendidly given, both by the orchestral strings and the pianist. The form of the work is rather that of a rhapsody than of a concerto, and the continuous development is somewhat abstruse for the non-musician. It was all the more remarkable therefore that the pianist was called out time after time at the conclusion of the work, but the great enthusiasm was fully merited.

The symphony which closed the programme was also a success. Mr. Nikisch gives proof that he is not bound up in prejudice by giving us many different schools of composition, and the appearance of the "Irish Symphony" on the programme was a further proof of his catholic tastes. The work of Dr. Villiers Stanford has received the approval of such men as Richter and von Bülow, and it is unquestionably one of the best specimens of the large instrumental forms that England has yet given us. To make an appropriate bull, the three best English instrumental composers of the present are German, Irish and Scotch. Cowen, Stanford and Hamish MacCunn are all noticeably founding their works on the solid basis of the folksong, and there is more than a possibility that the Scandinavian Symphony, the Welsh Symphony and the present Irish one will be followed by a Scottish work in the same mould by a Scotchman. In the first movement of the Irish Symphony there is no direct folksong influence, but Dr. Stanford contents himself with picturing the sombre tints of the Celtic music. The development here is rather prolix, which is an important defect. Only Brahms can launch into extended development without becoming prosy. The Scherzo is placed second in this work, a proceeding which is amply justified by the dark tints of the first movement. It is a hop-jig, full of the most characteristic expression. What a fine collection of folk-dances the moderns are getting in the latterday music! Brahms and Liszt have idealized the Hungarian dances, Dvorak gives us the Bohemian Furiant, Tschaikowsky presents the Kamarinskaia, Grieg and Svendsen bring in the Halling, and this hop-jig with its finely contrasted trio is a worthy addition to the list. The third movement has the weird wailing character of some of the old Celtic minor strains and is indeed founded on an Irish melody, "The lament of the sons of Usnach," and here it is curious how extremes meet, for the figure which is made so prominent during this movement is precisely the same that Brahms uses so effectively in the slow movement of his fourth symphony. The finale is the worthiest movement of all, and presents two Irish themes worked up finely together. The culmination is in a broad treatment of "Let Erin Remember," which is brought out with the full power of the brasses. It is doubly appropriate, both because of Moore's words, and the fact that they are associated with an old melody, "The Red Fox." The performance of the work was all that could be desired, the strings doing excellent work in the jig, the horns giving fine contrasts, the harp being appropriately prominent in the third movement, and the brasses majestic in the finale. Nor must I forget to chronicle the superb orchestral work and its leadership in the concerto, few conductors could have achieved such power and elasticity.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

---

[81]

[81]

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

...AY, FEB. 23, 1890.

...the Soloist at the ...phony Offering.

The 17th concert of the Symphony course presented, as soloist, an artist who has long been absent from the concert stage of Boston—Rafael Joseffy. A good many people will recall how often this distinguished pianist was announced to appear, and how often the expectation of hearing him was disappointed, seasons ago. That Joseffy had by no means been forgotten in Boston, however, the unusually large demand of tickets for yesterday's concert gave abundant evidence.

Delicacy of touch and great power are equally at Joseffy's command. Yet it is now, as before, the peculiar "singing quality" of his tone that commands especial admiration. The Liszt concerto in A major does not give great opportunities for this characteristic of the artist's playing, but the opportunities were never neglected. Liszt's brilliant work was throughout interpreted with a great deal of power and effect. In the closing passages of the exacting concerto the audience was roused to unwonted enthusiasm by the dash and spirit of Joseffy's performance. At the close, he was much applauded and recalled.

The orchestral part of the concerto was given almost faultlessly; for the most part the accompaniment was exactly what it should have been—a support, not a dominating volume of sound. Altogether, the Liszt concerto was quite a triumph for orchestra not less than soloist.

It was an Irish composer—Villiers Stanford, who has done such valued work in the cause of music at Cambridge University, England—who furnished the symphony. Naturally, no little interest marked the first presentation in Boston of his "Irish" symphony; and, if there was felt a certain disappointment in the work, the musicianly skill which the symphony shows on almost every page of the long score was by no means unrecognized.

But to attempt to put the wild, free, characteristic Irish music into the conventional bounds of a symphony is to sacrifice much of its spirit, no matter how skilfully the task of arrangement is carried out. It is like taking one of the characteristic Hungarian dances and trying to set forth its theme in the slow measures of an old-fashioned minuet. Had Stanford composed a suite or a "symphonic poem"—to use a convenient term—his purpose would assuredly have found much more effective illustration in the greater freedom offered, both as regards method and manner.

Of the four movements that make up the "Irish" symphony, the first produces the least favorable impression. After a few measures have sounded interest lapses; the movement is as a whole distinctly uninteresting. The second, a curious allegro movement, which takes the form of a "hop-jig," comes as a most agreeable relief; and it is not prolonged beyond the point of interest. While the student of theme-development may admire the skill with which Stanford utilizes the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" in the third movement, to the average auditor the effect is scarcely inspiring. But the final movement, the allegro vivace, is at times certainly vivid and expressive. Two ancient Irish airs form the subjects—"Remember the Glories of Brian the Brave," and "Let Erin Remember the Days of Old." Now and again the harp and trumpets are used with unique and striking effect, and the climax, with its strongly emphasized theme of glory and exultation, is something to be remembered indeed. Mr. Nikisch directed the performance with his usual care and the orchestra fulfilled its task with characteristic fidelity.

Weber's "Oberen" overture, gloriously performed, opened the programme. It would be difficult to excel the dainty and perfectly appreciative interpretation given to this familiar overture. Often as it has been heard, Nikisch's magic baton evoked new beauties yesterday.

A Boston musician, who is a Boston musical critic as well—Arthur Weld—holds a place of honor upon the list of selections for the concert next Saturday. Mr. Weld's "Italia," described as a dramatic suite for orchestra, has not been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch's appointments for the orchestra include the Mozart symphony in E flat and Meyerbeer's overture, "Struensee." Miss Gertrude Franklin is to be the soloist, and her selections comprise Tamara's air from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," and Micaela's song from Bizet's "Carmen." An interesting offering, truly, for Mr Nikisch's 18th concert here.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 23, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Rafael Joseffy Soloist.

Stanford's Irish Symphony—The Handel and Haydn Festival—The Society's First Concert—The Boston Singers' and Orchestral Club's Programmes—Patti and German Opera.

The programme played at the 17th of the season's Symphony concerts, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at Music Hall, last evening, consisted of Weber's overture "Oberon," Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2, and C. Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony. The selection of Dr. Stanford's symphony as one of the season's novelties gives evidence of the willingness of Mr. Nikisch to allow the patrons of these concerts an opportunity to hear from a class of composers that have had scant recognition in Boston's high class programme of late years. The symphony is the third of the four works of this class made public by Dr. Stanford, and may be taken as a recognition, upon the composer's part, of the beauty of the melodies dear to the hearts of his countrymen. Its leading themes have been taken from the folk songs of the "Emerald Isle," and the simple melodies have been treated in a way to enhance their enjoyment. A genuine Irish hop jig makes the groundwork of the second movement, the andante gives snatches of the harp prelude, "Try if It's in Tune," and the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" and in the finale the leading subjects are borrowed from "Let Erin Remember" and "Brian the Brave." The plaintive introductory measures of the opening movement give the key to the character of the work, but this portion of the symphony soon becomes wearisome by reason of the repeated use of the leading theme in part, or in phrases to illustrate the composer's ability in reproducing the characteristics of the music of his native land. The movement is interesting enough as an orchestral study, but it is hardly calculated to inspire the average listener with an admiration of the composer's music. The introduction of the jig, which takes the place of the scherzo, may be justified by the use of the national dance tunes of France, Spain and the north of Europe countries by other composers, but it is unfortunate that the natives of the Green Isle have to dance to such ungraceful measures. If such a tune can be accepted as a proper subject for symphonic treatment by Mr. Nickisch, it seems a little illogical to draw the line so sharply as to exclude the spirited marches and graceful waltzes that were once used in orchestral programmes as a relief to the more serious music. The andante is an interesting and pleasing portion of the symphony, the beautiful, flowing melody which makes its leading theme being instrumented, so as to give full scope to the wood, wind and harp, the flute passages being especially fascinating. The best work of the composer, both in the choice of his themes and in their treatment, has, however, been done in the finale, the dignity of the ideas and the noble manner in which they are treated alike giving a grand ending to the symphony. It has been very aptly said that the symphony answers most strikingly to the characterization of Irish music to be found in "Dr. Norman Macleod's Note-book": "My father once saw some emigrants from Lochaber dancing on the deck of an emigrant ship, and weeping their eyes out! This feeling is the mother of Irish music. It expresses the struggle of a buoyant, merry heart to get quit of thoughts that often he too deep for tears. It is the music of an oppressed, conquered but deeply feeling, impressible, fanciful and generous people. It is for the harp in Tara's Halls." Mr. Nikisch entered into the spirit of the symphony most heartily, and the work could hardly have had a better performance, the merits of the work done by the trumpets, the first flute and the harp being especially prominent. Mr. Joseffy has not been heard here for so long a time that his appearance made quite an event, and he gave an admirable exhibition of his capabilities in the Liszt concerto. His playing has lost nothing in the way of delicacy and refinement, and it has gained a breadth and strength which place him in the advance guard of the players of the day. The excessive technical difficulties of the concerto were mastered with great apparent ease, and the soloist was most ably supported by the orchestra throughout the composition. The "Oberon" overture was given with a theatrical effect, which quite captivated the audience.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1890

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience on Saturday evening. Great interest was felt in hearing Joseffy again, and he was very warmly received. The programme was of very agreeable length, in fact, the concert occupied less than an hour and a half.

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte. A major, No. 2..Liszt
Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," op. 28.....C. Villiers Stanford

The ever fresh and beautiful "Oberon" overture received a most interesting and sympathetic reading, and the admirable manner in which the new horn player performed the solo passages again proved that there is no very great difference between the two Reiter brothers. "A fair exchange is no robbery," and, in any case, either of them is very far above the other first horn players in this country certainly. Joseffy's playing was glorious. He has gained in power and virility of expression and interpretation, without losing any of the delicacy and grace so peculiarly his own. His technique is so prodigous that it is unnecessary to speak of it in detail, but mention should be made of the faultlessly artistic manner in which he used the pedal, an accomplishment which many otherwise fine pianists have decidedly neglected. The concerto itself is by no means as interesting as its predecessor in E flat major, but it was indeed so superbly played that one was only too glad to overlook the shallowness of the work itself. At the close there was a tremendous burst of applause which was kept up until Mr. Joseffy had three times reappeared to bow his acknowledgments.

Dr. Charles Villiers Stanford is very little known in this country as a composer. Of late years a group of young composers have become celebrated in England, and whose efforts have considerably increased the national interest felt in music in that country. The most prominent of these men are Mackenzie, Stanford, Cowen, Parry, Hamish, McCurm, and most especially the young genius Frederic Cliffe, whose first symphony, which has won him such fame, is soon to be heard in Boston. Of this group of composers, Dr. Stanford is one of the most active and productive, but by no means the most interesting. All his music has a tendency towards unnecessary pedantry, and his themes are apt to be cold, and lacking in plasticity. The work in question, which was performed Saturday night for the first time in this city, makes a decidedly mixed impression. The first movement is long, and, if the truth must be told, deadly stupid; all manner of elaborate devices are used to give a local coloring to the music, but without success, and the instrumentation is hard and coarse. The second movement, on the other hand, is quite delightful. It is in the form of a true Irish hop-jig, and both the themes themselves and the clever manner in which they are used, as well as the brilliant instrumentation, at once catch the attention of the audience, and this interest is maintained without flagging throughout the whole movement.

The third movement, andante con moto, is again dull and uninteresting. It begins with an imitation of a well-known Irish harp prelude, "Try if it's in tune," which is anything but a diverting musical passage. Later on we are struck by a passage which is note for note the same as the theme of the slow movement of Brahms's fourth symphony. Dr. Stanford's friends probably called his attention to this parallelism, as he elaborately explains on the title page of his score that the motive in question is an old Irish tune called "The Lament of the Sons of Usnach." This he regards as a sufficient explanation; but it does not alter the fact that this similarity produces an unfortunate effect on the listener. The fourth and last movement, on the contrary, is a splendid piece of bold and stirring orchestral writing. It is built upon the themes of two fine old Irish folk-songs, "Remember the glories of Brian the brave" and "Let Erin remember the days of old." Both of these tunes are excellently adapted for use as themes, and Dr. Stanford has indeed made the best of his opportunities. The orchestration is always brilliant, and in places very broad and grand, and the closing passages, where the second of the tunes is scored fortissimo for the whole orchestra, produce a really magnificent effect. Mr. Nikisch deserves the thanks of the public for giving them opportunities to become familiar with compositions from so many different schools and countries, and we ought all to be glad that we have so good a programme maker in charge of our orchestra.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB, 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Joseffy as Soloist.

The concert of Saturday was of especial interest in two of its numbers, and the fact that Joseffy appeared as the soloist was sufficient to fill the hall to overflowing. The programme began with the overture to "Oberon," which was given with excellent effect, the shading and unity of attack being all that could be desired, and if the contrasts were a little sharply drawn, such dramatic effects are quite legitimate in a Weber work, which scarcely admits of the calm balance of a Brahms' composition.

Mr. Joseffy made a grand success in the A major concerto by Liszt. It is not as popular a work as the one in E flat, but its themes are more refined, and the whole work is more poetic and inspired. Mr. Joseffy is evidently broadening in his style, and his massive playing in the first part was as successful as his delicacy in the later portions. The passages between oboe and piano were especially dainty, and the celestial effects with the violins in the highest positions and afterwards pizzicato, were splendidly given, both by the orchestral strings and the pianist. The form of the work is rather that of a rhapsody than of a concerto, and the continuous development is somewhat abstruse for the non-musician. It was all the more remarkable therefore that the pianist was called out time after time at the conclusion of the work, but the great enthusiasm was fully merited.

The symphony which closed the programme was also a success. Mr. Nikisch gives proof that he is not bound up in prejudice by giving us many different schools of composition, and the appearance of the "Irish Symphony" on the programme was a further proof of his catholic tastes. The work of Dr. Villiers Stanford has received the approval of such men as Richter and von Bülow, and it is unquestionably one of the best specimens of the large instrumental forms that England has yet given us. To make an appropriate bull, the three best English instrumental composers of the present are German, Irish and Scotch. Cowen, Stanford and Hamish MacCunn are all noticeably founding their works on the solid basis of the folksong, and there is more than a possibility that the Scandinavian Symphony, the Welsh Symphony and the present Irish one will be followed by a Scottish work in the same mould by a Scotchman. In the first movement of the Irish Symphony there is no direct folksong influence, but Dr. Stanford contents himself with picturing the sombre tints of the Celtic music. The development here is rather prolix, which is an important defect. Only Brahms can launch into extended development without becoming prosy. The Scherzo is placed second in this work, a proceeding which is amply justified by the dark tints of the first movement. It is a hop-jig, full of the most characteristic expression. What a fine collection of folk-dances the moderns are getting in the latterday music! Brahms and Liszt have idealized the Hungarian dances, Dvorák gives us the Bohemian Furiant, Tschaikowsky presents the Kamarinskaia, Grieg and Svendsen bring in the Halling, and this hop-jig with its finely contrasted trio is a worthy addition to the list. The third movement has the weird wailing character of some of the old Celtic minor strains and is indeed founded on an Irish melody, "The lament of the sons of Usnach," and here it is curious how extremes meet, for the figure which is made so prominent during this movement is precisely the same that Brahms uses so effectively in the slow movement of his fourth symphony. The finale is the worthiest movement of all, and presents two Irish themes worked up finely together. The culmination is in a broad treatment of "Let Erin Remember," which is brought out with the full power of the brasses. It is doubly appropriate, both because of Moore's words, and the fact that they are associated with an old melody, "The Red Fox." The performance of the work was all that could be desired, the strings doing excellent work in the jig, the horns giving fine contrasts, the harp being appropriately prominent in the third movement, and the brasses majestic in the finale. Nor must I forget to chronicle the superb orchestral work and its leadership in the concerto, few conductors could have achieved such power and elasticity.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The patrons of the series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet enjoyed another excellent programme of chamber music at Union Hall last evening, the quartet being assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, and Mr. Leo Schulz, violinist. The programme consisted of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's piano quintet in E flat, Haydn's quartet in G major, No. 41, and Schubert's quintet in C major. The quintet by Mr. Chadwick had its first hearing in these concerts on this occasion, and the composer and the performers are alike to be complimented upon the results attending its performance. Happy the composer whose works find a place upon these programmes, for he is thus assured that they will be heard in public only after the most intelligent and conscientious preparation. The performers are also to be congratulated in having so worthy a work to present as a tribute to the American composer, as Mr. Chadwick's quintet represents him at his best, the impression gained of its merits at its performance two years ago being fully confirmed in last evening's performance. Mr. Whiting proved an excellent assisting artist in the quintet, and fully sustained his share of the admirable work done in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's composition. The Haydn quartet and the Schubert quintet filled out the evening's programme most happily, and these enjoyable chamber music numbers had a most attentive hearing.

Clipping from Standard
New Bedford Mass
Date 2/25

BIG SALE.—The sale of reserved seats for the Boston Symphony concert began promptly at 9 o'clock in the Y. M. C. A. rooms this forenoon, at which time the rooms were well filled by subscribers anxious to secure the best seats. From 9 o'clock to 12 o'clock the crowd continued pouring in, keeping Messrs. W. E. Lougee, W. H. Wood, Charles S. Kelley and Lieut. Simms of the committee busy waiting upon them in an improvised office in the boys' room. The sale was very large, about $900 having been received up to 2 o'clock this afternoon. The sale will continue through to-day up to 10 p. m. By 7 30 this morning the subscribers began to gather in force, though we hear of instances of some presenting themselves as early as 3 this morning. There are some good seats yet unsold, and we would advise subscribers to hasten if they would secure them, as enough have been subscribed for to insure the occupancy of about all the desirable seats in the house. It is calculated the entire sale of tickets will aggregate $1950. The estimate is made from the subscriptions already handed in.

[81]

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

...AY, FEB. 23, 1890.

...ffy the Soloist at the ...mphony Offering.

The 17th concert of the Symphony course presented, as soloist, an artist who has long been absent from the concert stage of Boston—Rafael Joseffy. A good many people will recall how often this distinguished pianist was announced to appear, and how often the expectation of hearing him was disappointed, seasons ago. That Joseffy had by no means been forgotten in Boston, however, the unusually large demand of tickets for yesterday's concert gave abundant evidence.

Delicacy of touch and great power are equally at Joseffy's command. Yet it is now, as before, the peculiar "singing quality" of his tone that commands especial admiration. The Liszt concerto in A major does not give great opportunities for this characteristic of the artist's playing, but the opportunities were never neglected. Liszt's brilliant work was throughout interpreted with a great deal of power and effect. In the closing passages of the exacting concerto the audience was roused to unwonted enthusiasm by the dash and spirit of Joseffy's performance. At the close, he was much applauded and recalled.

The orchestral part of the concerto was given almost faultlessly: for the most part the accompaniment was exactly what it should have been—a support, not a dominating volume of sound. Altogether, the Liszt concerto was quite a triumph for orchestra not less than soloist.

It was an Irish composer—Villiers Stanford, who has done such valued work in the cause of music at Cambridge University, England—who furnished the symphony. Naturally, no little interest marked the first presentation in Boston of his "Irish" symphony; and, if there was felt a certain disappointment in the work, the musicianly skill which the symphony shows on almost every page of the long score was by no means unrecognized.

But to attempt to put the wild, free, characteristic Irish music into the conventional bounds of a symphony is to sacrifice much of its spirit, no matter how skilfully the task of arrangement is carried out. It is like taking one of the characteristic Hungarian dances and trying to set forth its theme in the slow measures of an old-fashioned minuet. Had Stanford composed a suite or a "symphonic poem"—to use a convenient term—his purpose would assuredly have found much more effective illustration in the greater freedom offered, both as regards method and manner.

Of the four movements that make up the "Irish" symphony, the first produces the least favorable impression. After a few measures have sounded interest lapses; the movement is as a whole distinctly uninteresting. The second, a curious allegro movement, which takes the form of a "hop-jig," comes as a most agreeable relief; and it is not prolonged beyond the point of interest. While the student of theme-development may admire the skill with which Stanford utilizes the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" in the third movement, to the average auditor the effect is scarcely inspiring. But the final movement, the allegro vivace, is at times certainly vivid and expressive. Two ancient Irish airs form the subjects—"Remember the Glories of Brian the Brave," and "Let Erin Remember the Days of Old." Now and again the harp and trumpets are used with unique and striking effect, and the climax, with its strongly emphasized theme of glory and exultation, is something to be remembered indeed. Mr. Nikisch directed the performance with his usual care and the orchestra fulfilled its task with characteristic fidelity.

Weber's "Oberon" overture, gloriously performed, opened the programme. It would be difficult to excel the dainty and perfectly appreciative interpretation given to this familiar overture. Often as it has been heard, Nikisch's magic baton evoked new beauties yesterday.

A Boston musician, who is a Boston musical critic as well—Arthur Weld—holds a place of honor upon the list of selections for the concert next Saturday. Mr. Weld's "Italia," described as a dramatic suite for orchestra, has not been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch's appointments for the orchestra include the Mozart symphony in E flat and Meyerbeer's overture, "Struensee." Miss Gertrude Franklin is to be the soloist, and her selections comprise Tamara's air from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," and Micaela's song from Bizet's "Carmen." An interesting offering, truly, for Mr Nikisch's 18th concert here.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 23, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Rafael Joseffy Soloist.

Stanford's Irish Symphony—The Handel and Haydn Festival—The Society's First Concert—The Boston Singers' and Orchestral Club's Programmes—Patti and German Opera.

The programme played at the 17th of the season's Symphony concerts, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at Music Hall, last evening, consisted of Weber's overture "Oberon," Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2, and C. Villiers Stanford's "Irish" symphony. The selection of Dr. Stanford's symphony as one of the season's novelties gives evidence of the willingness of Mr. Nikisch to allow the patrons of these concerts an opportunity to hear from a class of composers that have had scant recognition in Boston's high class programme of late years. The symphony is the third of the four works of this class made public by Dr. Stanford, and may be taken as a recognition, upon the composer's part, of the beauty of the melodies dear to the hearts of his countrymen. Its leading themes have been taken from the folk songs of the "Emerald Isle," and the simple melodies have been treated in a way to enhance their enjoyment. A genuine Irish hop jig makes the groundwork of the second movement, the andante gives snatches of the harp prelude, "Try if It's in Tune," and the "Lament of the Sons of Usnach" and in the finale the leading subjects are borrowed from "Let Erin Remember" and "Brian the Brave." The plaintive introductory measures of the opening movement give the key to the character of the work, but this portion of the symphony soon becomes wearisome by reason of the repeated use of the leading theme in part, or in phrases to illustrate the composer's ability in reproducing the characteristics of the music of his native land. The movement is interesting enough as an orchestral study, but it is hardly calculated to inspire the average listener with an admiration of the composer's music. The introduction of the jig, which takes the place of the scherzo, may be justified by the use of the national dance tunes of France, Spain and the north of Europe countries by other composers, but it is unfortunate that the natives of the Green Isle have to dance to such ungraceful measures. If such a tune can be accepted as a proper subject for symphonic treatment by Mr. Nickisch, it seems a little illogical to draw the line so sharply as to exclude the spirited marches and graceful waltzes that were once used in orchestral programmes as a relief to the more serious music. The andante is an interesting and pleasing portion of the symphony, the beautiful, flowing melody which makes its leading theme being instrumented, so as to give full scope to the wood, wind and harp, the flute passages being especially fascinating. The best work of the composer, both in the choice of his themes and in their treatment, has, however, been done in the finale, the dignity of the ideas and the noble manner in which they are treated alike giving a grand ending to the symphony. It has been very aptly said that the symphony answers most strikingly to the characterization of Irish music to be found in "Dr. Norman Macleod's Notebook": "My father once saw some emigrants from Lochaber dancing on the deck of an emigrant ship, and weeping their eyes out! This feeling is the mother of Irish music. It expresses the struggle of a buoyant, merry heart to get quit of thoughts that often lie too deep for tears. It is the music of an oppressed, conquered but deeply feeling, impressible, fanciful and generous people. It is for the harp in Tara's Halls." Mr. Nikisch entered into the spirit of the symphony most heartily, and the work could hardly have had a better performance, the merits of the work done by the trumpets, the first flute and the harp being especially prominent. Mr. Joseffy has not been heard here for so long a time that his appearance made quite an event, and he gave an admirable exhibition of his capabilities in the Liszt concerto. His playing has lost nothing in the way of delicacy and refinement, and it has gained a breadth and strength which place him in the advance guard of the players of the day. The excessive technical difficulties of the concerto were mastered with great apparent ease, and the soloist was most ably supported by the orchestra throughout the composition. The "Oberon" overture was given with a theatrical effect, which quite captivated the audience.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1890

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience on Saturday evening. Great interest was felt in hearing Joseffy again, and he was very warmly received. The programme was of very agreeable length, in fact, the concert occupied less than an hour and a half.

Overture to "Oberon"..... Weber
Concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2..Liszt
Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," op. 28.....C. Villiers Stanford

The ever fresh and beautiful "Oberon" overture received a most interesting and sympathetic reading, and the admirable manner in which the new horn player performed the solo passages again proved that there is no very great difference between the two Reiter brothers. "A fair exchange is no robbery," and, in any case, either of them is very far above the other first horn players in this country certainly. Joseffy's playing was glorious. He has gained in power and virility of expression and interpretation, without losing any of the delicacy and grace so peculiarly his own. His technique is so prodigous that it is unnecessary to speak of it in detail, but mention should be made of the faultlessly artistic manner in which he used the pedal, an accomplishment which many otherwise fine pianists have decidedly neglected. The concerto itself is by no means as interesting as its predecessor in E flat major, but it was indeed so superbly played that one was only too glad to overlook the shallowness of the work itself. At the close there was a tremendous burst of applause which was kept up until Mr. Joseffy had three times reappeared to bow his acknowledgments.

Dr. Charles Villiers Stanford is very little known in this country as a composer. Of late years a group of young composers have become celebrated in England, and whose efforts have considerably increased the national interest felt in music in that country. The most prominent of these men are Mackenzie, Stanford, Cowen, Parry, Hamish, McCurm, and most especially the young genius Frederic Cliffe, whose first symphony, which has won him such fame, is soon to be heard in Boston. Of this group of composers, Dr. Stanford is one of the most active and ...oductive, but by no means the most interes...ng. All his music has a tendency towards unnecessary pedantry, and his themes are apt to be cold, and lacking in plasticity. The work in question, which was performed Saturday night for the first time in this city, makes a decidedly mixed impression. The first movement is long, and, if the truth must be told, deadly stupid; all manner of elaborate devices are used to give a local coloring to the music, but without success, and the instrumentation is hard and coarse. The second movement, on the other hand, is quite delightful. It is in the form of a true Irish hop-jig, and both the themes themselves and the clever manner in which they are used, as well as the brilliant instrumentation, at once catch the attention of the audience, and this interest is maintained without flagging throughout the whole movement.

